An emergency school was built at Uma Metan on the orders of Infantry Battalion 700, Nanggala [Kopassandha] and the Koramil. The building was made of traditional materials and was 12 metres long. It was built so that the population that wanted to learn Indonesian could. The process was that each evening all women in Uma Metan washed themselves and then took Indonesian language classes, which were of course taught by [ABRI] from the area. The unusual thing was that the school was also used by Nanggala, Infantry Battalion 700 and Koramil to give free rein to their sexual desires on every woman that they took a liking to...this was known about by their commander – in fact the commander also took part.[55]

Where there were schools, the extreme conditions in the camps, which made sheer survival the highest imperative, ensured both that education would be low on the list of children's priorities and that attending school for children suffering from malnutrition and severe emotional stress would be a taxing experience.

Children's education also suffered on Ataúro. The Indonesian authorities told a visiting delegation that 17 teachers were available: yet the delegation observed that few children were in class at the time of the their visit.[56]

Housing and land

62. The peaceful enjoyment of one's home and property is an essential ingredient of human dignity and security of person, in both a physical and emotional sense. In agrarian societies, such as Timor-Leste, land is the fundamental commodity needed to survive. As such, rights to housing and land are integral to the rights to an adequate livelihood, including food, health and the ability to earn a decent living. Land also has deep social, cultural and spiritual value,[57] and is symbolic of "rootedness" and origin.*

63. Land tenure and conflicts over housing and land are complex issues. The Commission is barred by its mandate from dealing with specific disputes.[58] The discussion that follows, therefore, sets out in general terms the nature of the problem and its origins in the conflicts that occurred between 1974 and 1999.

64. Conflict was named as motivating 50.7% of forced displacements, but the range of circumstances in which people were forced off their land over the period of the Commission's mandate indicates the complexity of the problem:

* This is particularly true in conflict and post-conflict situations, where land and the connections (or lack thereof) between certain groups and the land become central organising rhetoric behind violence. See for example, Liisa Malkki, Purity in Exile: Violence, Memory, and National Cosmology among Hutu Refugees in Tanzania, University of Chicago, Chicago, 1997.

- During the UDT armed movement and the Fretilin armed insurrection, members and supporters of both political parties participated in house burnings, property destruction and violence that drove civilians from their villages. In some instances, civilians in the western districts fled or were forced across the international border into West Timor, Indonesia.
- There is evidence that Fretilin and Falintil forces moved some civilians into the mountains. Of displacement cases reported to the Commission, 12.8% of deponents say Falintil asked them to move. Qualitative evidence suggests that sometimes this was motivated by concerns for civilian safety, but sometimes was politically motivated. Hundreds of thousands of civilians were evacuated with the Fretilin forces, although there had been little planning to ensure that they were fed or provided with shelter. Fretilin also burnt some civilian houses and crops.
- The Indonesian military repeatedly unlawfully displaced civilians. In 30.7% of displacement cases, victims stated that the Indonesian military asked them to move. In 1999, militia groups were also responsible for forcefully displacing people, and were named in 6% of cases overall.
- Displacement out of Timor-Leste included forcible displacement into camps in West Timor. This occurred both before the Indonesian invasion and after the 1999 Popular Consultation.
- Indiscriminate attacks on towns by Indonesian security forces and their proxies drove civilians from their homes into the mountains, where they had no food or shelter. Indonesian military forces and their proxies also deliberately drove civilians out of their villages by burning their homes and gardens and looting possessions.
- After they surrendered to the Indonesian military, the Indonesian military held civilians in internment camps, where shelter and sanitation facilities were dangerously inadequate.
- In the early 1980s individuals suspected of supporting the independence movement were sent to Ataúro Island, often for several years.
- Forced displacement was both internal and external: 54.7% were within a sub-district; 16.5% within a district; 15.2% within a region; 9.0% within Timor-Leste; and 4.1% were outside of Timor-Leste. Although most displacement was local, displacement was usually for long periods of time – 50% of displacements lasted more than two years.

65. The impacts of these displacements were wide-ranging. They included, not only violations of rights to housing and property (including land), but also violations of the rights to food and livelihood. The repeated displacement of large numbers of people rent Timor-Leste's social fabric with consequences that are likely to be long-lasting. Each of these events clearly had a retrogressive impact on people's right to adequate shelter and housing.

66. Military data put the number of displaced people who had been put in camps, as of 6 December 1978 (that is, immediately after the fall of the zonas libertades on Mount Matebian) at 318,921, almost half the estimated total pre-invasion population of Timor-Leste.[*] After the referendum some 250,000 people were forcibly displaced into West Timor, often onto land claimed by the local population of West Timor. Displacement not only uprooted those who were forcibly moved but those whose land was occupied by large numbers of incoming refugees. According to one observer:

> People still living in their customary areas who have resettled people living among them all expressed a willingness to accept the settlers in their midst during the Indonesian period, since under crisis conditions there were no alternatives for the displaced people. In addition, protesting land claims under those circumstances could draw unwelcome military attention, and the atmosphere of intimidation suppressed any expressed dissatisfaction with the resettlements. While some traditional landowners were consulted about locations for resettled people, more report that the migrants were placed on their land without consultation or compensation.[59]

67. This displacement, sometimes for decades, meant that many villagers felt they had more invested in their new location than in their original home, where fields and gardens were left neglected or occupied by others. As a result, many displaced people preferred to stay, rather than return to their homes and try to rehabilitate houses and gardens.[60] Fitzpatrick cites three examples from Manatuto District. One village decided to return en masse to its original location. Another wanted to stay even though the surrounding village still claimed the land on which people were resettled. A third wanted to move to a transmigration village vacated by Indonesian migrants.[61] Whether they stayed or returned, the displacement of so many has caused widespread land and resource conflicts and uncertainty as to the proper legal standards to apply.[62]

68. Rather than taking measures to allow people secure tenure and peaceful enjoyment of homes and land in Timor-Leste, at best the Indonesian authorities “did not consider it a priority when compared to security and development” and at worst they exacerbated the problem.[63] Accordingly, land was one of the greatest sources of dispute in Timor-Leste during the occupation and remains so today. Apart from the mass displacements described above, disputes have also been inflamed by the non-recognition of traditional claims by either the state or state-protected private interests, and the redrawing of traditionally recognised or administrative boundaries.[64]

69. As well as failing to manage land disputes, Indonesia contributed to the shortage of housing and lack of security of tenure by arbitrarily appropriating large swathes of customary land. The appropriation of customary land by the state, or by private business interests protected by the state, is common in Indonesia. The state views any land not under formal title as belonging to the state, to be managed by the state “in the public interest". However, there is little recourse or compensation for those whose land has been seized for commercial investments deemed by the state to be good for "development".

* Alex Dirdja SJ, “Timor Timur: Beberapa Pengamatan dan Pemikiran”, (“Timor-Leste: Some Observations and Reflections”), Dili, 25 April 1979, p. 2 (citing figures given by the Assistant for Territorial Affairs, DaHanKam).] Deponents who gave statements to the Commission about forced displacement rarely described the place that they were displaced to and thus the Commission cannot provide comparable figures of its own on this issue.

70. Although the arbitrary use of state power to appropriate land was not unique to Timor-Leste, the degree of militarisation and the level of violence and intimidation exercised by the security forces made the process of land appropriation in Timor-Leste that much more menacing. A report by the East Timorese legal aid NGO, Yayasan HAK, contains cases in which local people were displaced from land by the state for government offices, housing for civil servants, a market, a logging concession, a sugar plantation and a plywood plantation, all with little or no compensation. If people protested, the military intimidated them into acquiescing.[65] In one of these cases, in 1997, a planned 200,000ha sugar plantation, involving a US$800million investment by interests that were reported to have included President Soeharto's son, Tommy, would have absorbed the whole village of Lore I (Lospalos, Lautém).[66] The village's 240 families all signed a letter of protest to the district head, which was ignored. Yayasan HAK was asked to intervene on behalf of the village in the courts, but security forces sealed the village to outside visitors.[67] This case illustrates the nature of land dispossession in Timor-Leste:

> Under the Indonesian occupation, there was little or no compensation to occupiers, very few independent mechanisms for valuation, no effective right of appeal to an independent judiciary, harassment and intimidation of complainants, no natural justice in either determining the status of land or in the lodging of complaints, and no clear definition of what constituted a "public purpose" development.[68]

71. The Indonesian occupation authorities considered that with the passage of Law 7/76 proclaiming Timor-Leste part of the Indonesian state, all national legislation came into force in the territory. This included land and forestry laws that deemed all land not under statutory private title to be state property. This land passed to the UN Transitional Administration in 1999 and then to the independent state of Timor-Leste in 2002. Fitzpatrick notes that in Dili alone, 40% of total land area was classified as "free state land" (not having recognised informal occupiers). It is unlikely that under the occupation this land was indeed unoccupied.

72. Indonesian records from the districts of Bobonaro, Covalima, Oecussi, Baucau, Manatuto, Aileu and Liquiçá show a total of 189,660 ha, or 55% of the total land area of these seven districts, as "free state land". A further 50,440 ha, 14.6% of the total land area, were classified as "occupied state land". This left just 7.4% of land in the seven districts that was classified as customary land.[69]

Economic effects of the 1999 scorched earth policy

To discuss the economic effects of the wave of violence unleashed by the TNI and the militias following the 1999 referendum is to risk understating the terror of the period and the chilling gravity of the human rights violations against the Timorese people. Nevertheless, the scorched-earth policy that accompanied the pull-out had severe and long-lasting economic effects.

The 1999 World Bank-led Joint Assessment Mission to East Timor estimated that the post-referendum destruction:

- Destroyed virtually every modern piece of equipment and physical infrastructure
- Effectively eliminated all administrative structures through the flight of staff, and the destruction of over 70% of buildings and all government records
- Displaced 75% of the population
- Caused massive inflation, including a sevenfold increase in the price of cooking oil, a fivefold increase in the price of salt, a six-fold increase in the price of canned milk and a tenfold increase in the price of laundry soap
- Severely disrupted telecommunications by badly damaging transmission towers and many switchboards and cables
- Rendered 80-90% of housing in the main towns and many rural areas uninhabitable
- Caused massive urban unemployment
- Caused a decline in real GDP of 40-45% in 1999 alone.

In addition, agricultural output was reduced by some 30-40% due to:

- Shortages of agricultural labour due to displacement,
- The loss of traction due to the killing of livestock and the destruction or looting of farm equipment, and
- The unavailability of seeds because of the consumption of seeds as food in the absence of alternatives.[70]

The violence caused a total breakdown of the health system. Hospitals and clinics were destroyed, all drugs and equipment lost, and almost all senior health staff, including 130 of the 160 doctors left the territory.[71] The situation was similar in the education system: 95% of schools and other educational institutions were destroyed; buildings furniture and materials were lost and 70-80% of administrative and high school teaching staff fled.[72]

Given the destruction wrought by the Indonesian military and its proxies as they left Timor-Leste, it is a bitter irony to note the statement in the Indonesian Regional Government's "Twenty years of East Timor Development":

> "Development in the former Portuguese colony had to begin right from the ground. Nothing of any significance was left behind by the colonial administration. Development of the region was to be undertaken step by step".[73]

Right to health

The meaning of the "right to health"

73. The right to health is essential for the enjoyment of many other human rights. The right is expressed in the ICESCR as not a right to be healthy, but:

> The right of everyone to the enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of physical and mental health (Article 12(1)).

74. The steps to be taken by governments to achieve realisation of this right include:

- provision for reduction of the stillbirth-rate and infant mortality and for the healthy development of the child
- the improvement of all aspects of environmental and industrial hygiene
- the prevention, treatment and control of epidemic, endemic, occupational and other diseases
- the creation of conditions which would assure access to all medical services and medical attention in the event of sickness. (ICESCR, Article 12(2))

75. The right to health includes freedoms such as the right of everyone to control his or her own health and body, including sexual and reproductive freedom, and to be free from interference such as torture or non-consensual medical treatment.[74]

76. It also involves entitlements: a right to information and education on healthcare and maintenance. For women, adequate information on reproductive services must be provided.[75] Fulfilment to a minimum standard of rights discussed above, such as access to essential food, housing and sanitation are also core obligations of states in realising the right to health.[76]

77. The Commission is satisfied that Indonesia violated the right to health in several ways. The primary reason for the failure of the Indonesian state to respect and fulfil the right to health was the priority it gave to security without regard to the impact of its security policies on public health. Many security measures were clearly retrogressive in relation to public health, for example:

- The use of "resettlement camps" to isolate the Resistance and punish their relatives and supporters
- The widespread use of torture to gather information and to intimidate*
- The forcible recruitment of children as "operations assistants" (tenaga bantuan operasi, TBOs), endangering their health and lives by exposing them to combat and gruelling forms of forced labour and by neglecting their nutritional and medical needs.

78. Although the amounts invested by Indonesia in health in Timor-Leste were large both in absolute terms and certainly by comparison with Portuguese spending, the greater part of government investment in Timor-Leste was directed towards spending intended to enhance military control. Indonesia also failed to take steps to realise progressively fulfilment of the general population's right to achieve the highest attainable standard of health. As Table 8 (par. 82, below) demonstrates, Indonesian investment in health in Timor-Leste was ineffective in overcoming chronic public health problems and early mortality. One reason for this was the failure to address poverty as the underlying cause of disease and poor health. Another was an approach to healthcare delivery that was top-down and paternalistic. This approach provided patients with little information about the healthcare being offered and little opportunity for choice.

79. In Indonesia itself, people were treated with the same paternalism. The difference was that in Timor-Leste the degree of militarisation was unusually high and the level of fear and distrust correspondingly intense. The harmful effects of these structural factors were particularly obvious in the area of reproductive rights, where women and girls were exposed to health risks by an overemphasis on targets and the consequent neglect of their individual health needs.

Public health under Portuguese rule

80. Even in the absence of armed conflict, persistent poverty coupled with non-participatory, unaccountable government meant that under both Portugal and Indonesia East Timorese did not enjoy "progressive realisation…to the maximum of [the state's] available resources" of their right to health.[77] Although there is little public health data from the Portuguese period, the tiny investment of the colonial government in public services, the harsh climate and endemic malaria all indicate that the state of health of the general population must have been very poor. There was one well-equipped hospital in Dili,† a rudimentary health facility in every district with four nurses and one doctor, and every sub-district (posto) had a health post with one nurse (for roughly 10,000 people). One health policy expert told the Commission that her estimate of the total number of medical personnel at the end of Portuguese rule – roughly 14 doctors and 88-120

* Note that both UDT, and more particularly Fretilin, also used torture to obtain information or to intimidate civilians. [See Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment].

nurses – was "generous". She added that even these few staff were poorly trained and often absent from their workplace.[78] Health services were clustered around the main towns and were virtually unavailable at the village level.* One observer reported that there were "vast areas with no medical care whatsoever, including medicines".[79] Thus, the Portuguese healthcare system was primarily geared to the needs of expatriates and the local elite in urban centres, rather than to those of the general population living in rural areas, whose health was most at risk.

The Indonesian occupation

81. When it invaded in 1975, therefore, Indonesia undoubtedly encountered a population already in a dire state of health. Indonesia subsequently devoted some 5% of its development budget for Timor-Leste to investment in healthcare. However, Indonesia's comparatively large investment notwithstanding, late in the occupation most public health indicators remained poor, even in comparison with Indonesian provinces. Life expectancy was only 55 years in 1999,[80] lower than in any Indonesian province and lower than in any country in Asia and the Pacific, except Laos.[81]

Infant and mother mortality and child development

82. Over the period of Indonesian occupation, infant and child mortality rates declined but not to the extent that they should have done. From the extremely high rates of 14% and 24% respectively in 1980, the rate fell to 13.5% and 15.7% respectively in 1996.[82] The 1996 levels were still high by any standard, higher, for example, than in any Indonesian province. Infant mortality was still more than triple the Indonesian average (see Table 8).

* This was confirmed by John Whitehall, from Australian Society for Intercountry Aid – Timor (ASIAT), who noted that typhoid was endemic, malaria malignant, and TB "absolutely untapped." [EN: Major General CM Gurner, Joint Services medical advisor, 25 November 1975. John Whitehall, presentation made to the East Timor Consultation, Melbourne, 26 September 1975].

83. Like child and infant mortality, maternal mortality remained high under the Indonesian occupation. Even by 1990-94, the period officially dubbed the "long-term development phase", maternal mortality in Timor-Leste was still 8.3%, the fifth highest for any country in the world.* This was due in part to the high birth rate among mothers in Catholic Timor-Leste. On average East Timorese women have 7.4 births during their lifetime, but even as the risks associated with pregnancy become higher with each birth, according to World Bank data, in 1999, 75% of births were not attended by a trained medical professional. This added to the dangers mothers faced during delivery[83] and also meant that the rate of mortality in childbirth may have been significantly under-reported.[84] The large number of unattended births may well be due to women's widespread distrust of Indonesian medical staff imbued through the highly militarised birth control programme (see par. 92-108 below).

84. Poor health conditions during the political conflicts not only threatened the lives of children but also stunted the development of those who survived. The effects of chronic malnutrition and micronutrient shortages have long-lasting detrimental effects on physical and mental development.[85] They are almost certainly one of the reasons for the close correlation between low education and poverty in Timor-Leste (see Table 10 par. 120 below).[86] With impaired development, children in poverty are vulnerable to experiencing problems in education and employment later in life. These obstacles make it very difficult for children to break out of poverty in adulthood. The Commission believes that the problems of poverty, illness and lack of education were intimately linked in a self-perpetuating cycle under the Indonesian occupation.

Reduction of disease

85. Preventable infectious disease remained the leading cause of death in Timor-Leste.[87] A range of sources reporting between 1993 and 1997 said that malaria, tuberculosis, pneumonia, and gastroenteritis were endemic, and were the leading causes of death in Timor.† The same sources reported that people suffering from malaria accounted for one third of all medical visits during the same period.[88] Cholera was also commonly reported in statements and testimonies given to the Commission, particularly in the period of famine and forced displacement in the late 1970s, but also during the 1980s. The East Timor Relief Association (ETRA) reported that in 1988 a cholera epidemic caused the deaths of hundreds of children.‡ The prevalence of infectious diseases is an indicator of Timor-Leste's poverty; they are opportunistic diseases that prey on the poor, who live in crowded and unsanitary conditions without access to potable water or sufficient food. According to Pederson and Arneberg the prevalence of tuberculosis reflects a deeper † Pederson and Arneberg, pp. 70-72. The World Health Organisation's 2000 East Timor Health Sector Report also estimates that infectious disease accounts for 60% of deaths.

‡ Reportedly, this was partly because hospitals and clinics were giving children under two too high a dosage of the medicine for treating cholera. problem: "The fact that TB is a main killer in Timor-Leste paints a picture of a health system which fails to provide even the most basic level of health to the population."[89]

86. On the other hand, the coverage of immunisation programmes expanded dramatically during the Indonesian occupation. Indonesian WHO sources, quoting government data, report that by 1997, 99.6% of infants born in that year received their first DPT vaccination, 100% received their BCG vaccination, 92% received inoculation against measles and 94% had had their fourth polio vaccination. The Indonesian National Socio-economic Household Survey (Susenas) reported lower but not necessarily inconsistent numbers: only 49% of children under five in 1995 and 1996 had full immunisation coverage, while by 1998 full coverage for this age group had increased to 59%. If these different figures are mutually consistent, they indicate a dramatic increase in vaccination. Whatever the case, the low prevalence of measles, tetanus, diphtheria, whooping cough and polio suggest a successful immunisation programme.

Access to health services

87. Between 1975 and 1999, the number of general practitioners working in the territory increased from 14 to 160 (of whom 25 were East Timorese). In the same period the number of nurses rose from 88-120 to some 1,000. By the end of the Indonesian occupation, there were eight district hospitals, 67 sub-district community health centres and 309 satellite health posts.[90]

88. Despite the increased physical presence of the health system, access to medical care continued to be seriously constrained. Over nearly 20 years of occupation (a full run of budget figures is available only until the 1993/94 fiscal year) an estimated US$13.5m was allocated to the sector.* However, health facilities under Indonesia remained remote, poorly equipped and understaffed. The World Bank country poverty assessment report dated May 2003 showed that most East Timorese lived over an hour from the nearest basic healthcare facility and that the trip cost them Rp6,700,[91] about the cost of a kilogramme of rice.[92] The average health facility was open only eight days a month and staffed for only four of those days.[93] In addition, medical personnel were generally poorly trained and inexperienced, often being new graduates sent by Indonesia on compulsory tours of duty.[94]

89. Other sources cite cultural barriers between the predominantly Indonesian medical staff and East Timorese patients as an obstacle to effective healthcare delivery (according to Indonesian government statistics, in 1999 only 26 of the 141 doctors were East Timorese)[95] and a patronising style of service that offered little of the information necessary for informed patient choice.[96] Medicines were unavailable and often prohibitively expensive.† Clearly, in all but the most desperate cases, there was little incentive to make the long expensive trip to the health post. This resulted in lack of preventive care, and patients finally arriving at poor medical facilities with already advanced conditions.

* This calculation is drawn from "Sectoral Projects" development funds allocated from FY1976/77 through 1993/4. Allocation figures and sectoral breakdown was drawn from Saldanha, 1994, pp. 160-162. and assumes that healthcare represented a consistent 5% of the budget, as it did in FY 1993/94.

† Medicines were often diverted from aid shipments to the military and then sold in local shops in Dili. Pat Walsh, "East Timor in transition: briefing paper," unpublished paper presented on behalf of ACFOA at the CNRT Strategic Development Planning for East Timor Conference. Melbourne, April 5-9, 1999.

90. The persistence of poor health conditions begs the question of why this large investment was so ineffective in improving health. One reason for the ineffectiveness of the health system was that investment in "bricks-and-mortar" health facilities did not address the causes of illness: persistent poverty, itself reinforced by poor health and education.

91. The priority given to security also played an important role. There are sharp variations in infant and child mortality rates from district to district, the highest being in Baucau, Manufahi, Ainaro and Covalima Districts.* One report notes that elevated child mortality in Baucau District in the period 1990-1994 may be related to the relatively higher concentration of "guided villages" in that district.[97] This observation, although inconclusive without further investigation, is significant, as it highlights what the Commission considers to be the highly likely correlation between the strength of resistance to the occupation and increased poverty and mortality rates. "Guided villages" were used to control the population. They were often new villages built in areas that had previously been avoided because of their infertile soils or high incidence of malaria. The high rate of child mortality prevalent in Baucau may illustrate once again the economic and social impact of an overriding concern with security. In addition, in areas where the political conflict was most intense and where killings, disappearances and detentions were most frequent,† the resulting absence of household heads was likely to have had a range of economic and social impacts, including a decrease in families' ability to provide for their children.

Economic and social impact of displacement to West Timor in 1999

The roughly 250,000 Timorese forcibly deported to West Timor after the announcement of the result of the referendum in September 1999 were exposed to extremely harsh conditions in the camps where they were placed. There was insufficient food provided to camp internees and what was provided was controlled by the military and the militias, which channelled it as they saw fit, discriminating against families whose loyalty to the pro-integration cause was in doubt.

* It should be noted, however, that district level mortality rates are subject to significant sampling error – especially for the 1985 and 1998 Sample Surveys on which the FAFO analysis is based upon.

† One way of measuring the strength of the Resistance is by the number of civilian killings and arbitrary detentions in a district relative to other districts. The Commission's statistical research has found that 64.3% (788/1224) of reported civilian killings between 1979 and 1984 occurred in the eastern districts, which includes Baucau. Reported detentions between 1977 and 1984 are concentrated both in the eastern and central districts (which includes Ainaro and Manufahi) - with 43.0% (4220/9815) of reported detentions between 1979 and 1984 occurring in the East and 47.8% (4695/9815) in the Central districts.

One local NGO monitoring the camps described how violence and the threat of violence affected the day-to-day life of the refugees:

> Several cases…corroborate a widely held belief that these armed (or potentially armed) men are the ones actually in charge of the camps, often holding positions of power as food distributors, camp leaders or guards at security posts...There can be no doubt that the real and threatened presence of firearms contributes to a climate of violence in the camps.
> Clearly, those who control the camps also control the aid flowing into them. Team members in one camp reported seeing what appeared to be stockpiles of rice. Although food aid has generally been distributed according to a quota system, it has been difficult to follow the distribution path once the rice is in the camps. If there have been stockpiles of food or other aid, they have probably benefited armed East Timorese.[98]

Conditions in the camps were especially hard for children. UNICEF estimated that in the camps 25% of refugee children were malnourished.*

The children forced to West Timor flooded local schools, which were unprepared to meet the increased needs of tens of thousands of new pupils. The trauma of displacement, the malnutrition and illness rampant in the camps and added burden of having to look for food put the refugee schoolchildren at a severe disadvantage compared with their West Timorese peers.[99]

Coerced birth control

92. In 1980, soon after Indonesia established control over the territory, one of the first development and health policies it launched was a territory-wide birth control programme.† From the start the programme was rife with violations of women's reproductive rights. The fact that 80-90% of Timor-Leste's population was Roman Catholic meant that birth control was culturally unacceptable to the vast majority.‡ Rather than seeking participants' informed consent, the programme's administrators presented it as compulsory and made little effort to provide women with information about potential benefits and risks. In their zeal to reach "acceptor" targets, programme workers exerted strong pressure on women to accept birth control, with little attention given to side-effects or health risks. The coercive nature of the programme was increased by the prominent role played by the military in implementing it.

* The UNICEF press release stated that a malnourishment percent of over 15% is considered a "serious nutritional emergency". UNICEF, press release CF/DOC/PR/2000/03UNICEF, 18 January 2000, available at <www.unicef.org/newsline/00pr03.htm> as of 3 March 2005.

† Family planning in Indonesia is referred to as KB (keluarga berencana) and is managed centrally by the National Coordinating Agency on Family Planning referred to as BKKBN

93. While these aspects of the programme were also found throughout Indonesia, its coercive dimension was more than usually pronounced in Timor-Leste. This was because Indonesian militarisation reached its highest expression in Timor-Leste, involving extreme levels of surveillance and control, and a general climate of fear and intimidation. The concept of dwifungsi (dual function), under which ABRI/TNI combined defence and civil functions, legitimised its central role in the programme, which was called "ABRI Manunggal KB" (ABRI United with Family Planning).* "ABRI Manunggal KB" was not unique to Timor-Leste, but what distinguished its operation in the territory were the circumstances in which the military had come to be there and the traumatic consequences of its presence. The behaviour of the military since the invasion, including its treatment of women, needs to be borne in mind when trying to understand the impact of ABRI's involvement in promoting family planning in Timor-Leste.

94. The Commission has documented how the Indonesian military was involved in maximising the number of "acceptors", which became the leading indicator of the success of the programme. Again, the national programme was also target-driven. A report of the National Coordinating Agency on Family Planning issued in 1995 noted that "regional competitions based on the number of "acceptors" provide prestige and may contribute to officials' promotions, and regions are judged on eight aspects of success, one of which is quantitative achievement in family planning."† In the cases documented by the Commission, women talked of the frequent changes in the method of birth control that they were prescribed.[100] According to a World Bank document Report 7760, "contraceptive acceptors" were defined as the number of women who become (or whose husbands become) users of a contraceptive method they have not used in the months immediately prior, for a given time period."[101] Aside from medical reasons, it seems highly likely that women were switched from one method to another because each time they would be registered as new acceptors.

95. John Fernandes was an Indonesian member of staff of the Indonesian family planning agency (Badan Kordinasi Keluarga Berencana Nasional, BKKBN) in Manufahi District from 1983 to 1999. His criticisms of the family planning programme echo those of others with direct exposure to the programme as it was implemented in both Timor-Leste and Indonesia:

> The Indonesian government…was more interested in numbers than in taking an individual's physical condition into consideration – was the person too thin (and therefore better exempted from the KB programme) or was she healthy enough to take part in it. The important thing was the pursuit of targets.

* This was a variation of "ABRI Manunggal Rakyat" (ABRI United with the People), which was the title for military involvement in village development projects.

† Indonesian Co-ordinating Agency for Family Planning, Government Report 2, October 1995. An independent commentator also states: "Family planning was placed on a list of select policy sectors, established in 1982, for evaluation of gubernatorial performance. Governors were assessed on nine numerical family planning targets, including the crude birth rate, the number of active users of family planning methods and the number of village family planning groups created." Jeremy Shiffman, "Political Management in the Indonesian Family Planning Program", International Family Planning Perspectives, Vol. 30(1), March 2004.

I can say that the programme was "compulsory" because that was how it was organised from above. The family planning programme was a national programme and it therefore had been given legal backing by the government that ran from provincial to district level. Whatever they might want, the East Timorese had to take part in the programme just like in any other province.

ABRI's involvement in the promotion of birth control was based on a directive from the Udayana [regional] commander. The Babinsas [village-level NCO] and Bimpoldas [village-level policeman] became Village Family Planning Assistants and received Rp3,000 a day from the BKKBN. When they were promoting family planning in the villages, they wore their military uniforms.

Everybody, but especially the wives of civil servants and people living in transmigration sites, had to join the programme. Civil servant families were allowed to have no more than three children because that was the number fixed in their contracts. If they had more than three children, the extra ones would be called a "Hansip child" or a "private child".

The government and ABRI also forced ordinary people living in remote areas to take part in the programme, telling them that they had to raise [their other children's] educational standards and reduce maternal and child mortality. The reality was that when people did take part in the programme, maternal and child mortality rates were higher than their previous levels. [There were cases of women who] took part in the programme and then once they became pregnant exhibited symptoms such as dizziness, ectopic pregnancies, yeast infections, loss of appetite, weight loss, swelling and rheumatism. There were also cases of women who when they were about to give birth had unexpected loss of amniotic fluid. The babies too were affected.[102]

96. John Fernandes said that BKKBN promoted and implemented birth control by working with ABRI through a programme called KB Manunggal/KB Kes ABRI.[*] This district programme was devised by the commander and usually implemented through the District military command. Women belonging to Persit (Persatuan Isteri Tentara, the Association of Military Wives) were an integral part of the programme, visiting villages in their Persit uniforms to recruit participants. They also took part in the programme themselves:

* It is highly likely that John Fernandes was explaining the Safari Manunggal KB Kesehatan Programme. According to the official definition given by BKKBN: "the term 'safari' means the collaboration of village-level offices in encouraging the recruitment of acceptors …In practical terms, 'safari' is the mass distribution or more accurately the mass fitting of contraceptive devices, which directly involved other officials and was carried out on special days like Armed Forces' Day, Mothers' Day or Independence Day." [EN: See for example: Nirwan Dewanto, "Coersion in Family Planning still exists in the Family Planning Movement," paper presented at the 8th INGI Conference on Society in Economic Liberalisation, 21-23 March 1992, Odawara, Japan; Sita Aripurnami, Hak reproduktif antara kontrol dan perlawanan: wacana tentang kebijakan kependudukan Indonesia, Kalyanamitra, Jakarta, 1999, p. 36.]

It was not just women unconnected to the military who were forced to take part in the programme. The military also drove up the number of acceptors by making women from within its own structures participate. Just because a woman was a member of Persit did not mean that she did not have to take part in the programme. On the contrary, she would be a front-line target, subject to both direct and indirect pressures to ensure her participation.[103]

97. Natalia dos Santos was the wife of a member of Infantry Battalion 744, Saturnino Maubuti, when in 1979 she was told she had to enrol in the family planning programme. Natalia was brave enough to argue with an army doctor from Java, pointing out that as a childless woman her participation should not be mandatory. However, when the doctor told her that those were the rules, she realised that continued resistance could, at the very least, put her husband's career at risk. For almost 20 years she was prescribed various forms of contraception, all of which had unpleasant side-effects. Now and again, she furtively stopped using the contraceptives in an attempt to get pregnant or to end the discomfort they caused. On two occasions, she did get pregnant. On the first occasion she miscarried; on the second she was forced to have an abortion after a doctor diagnosed a "thin womb". She felt free to abandon birth control only after being evacuated to Atambua, West Timor (Indonesia) after the 1999 referendum, when the programme was no longer being strictly implemented. In her interview with the Commission, she summed up her experience:

When I was being told to keep using different forms of contraception by the doctors, it was very stressful because I felt like I was being treated like a guinea pig for the sake of the family planning programme. But there was not much I could do about it because of my husband's position; I just had to do what they wanted. I am very disappointed because I still don't have a child. The effect of the different kinds of birth control that they used was that I have constant irritation in my vagina… and every day I become thinner.[104]

98. Natalia's fears that her refusal to join the programme could have serious consequences were well-founded. Women were induced to join up through a system of rewards and punishments. John Fernandes explained how the rice ration that civil servants' families received from the government depended on how many children they had. Other incentives included the granting of scholarships to the children of families participating in the programme.[105]

99. There were also negative incentives. Like Natalia, Lucia Maria Pereira understood that her husband, Carlito das Regras, a Hansip from Same, would have been punished if she did not agree to use birth control. She told the Commission that the wives of the Same, Manufahi Hansips were all pressured into joining the programme, irrespective of whether they were still of child-bearing age. If a wife refused to take part, Indonesian soldiers would plunge her husband in water.[106] Another kind of punishment, non-promotion, was experienced by Florindo da Conceição Mendonça da Costa. For six years, from 1980 to 1986, Florindo and his wife, Raimunda da Conceição, refused to join the programme. He remained a private first class during that time, while his colleagues, whose wives had accepted birth control, were being promoted. In 1986, the couple finally relented. Raimunda registered for the birth control programme. Her husband immediately won promotion and then rose through the ranks to end up as company sergeant major in 1999. However, the consequences of their decision were painful for Raimunda. She was prescribed implants, the pill and the coil but suffered serious side-effects from all of them. In early 1989, shortly after she had started using the coil, she collapsed:

> Luckily, my husband came back from the office at that moment. When he saw me sprawled on the floor, he took me to the public health centre in Oecussi Town and looked for a doctor who could give me first aid, but no doctor was willing to attend to me, causing a commotion in the clinic. My husband gave an ultimatum to the doctor: "If anything happens to my wife, it will be your responsibility." At first the doctor didn't want to remove the [coil], but my husband kept on demanding that they refer me to the public hospital to remove the coil from my body. In the end, the coil was taken out.

100. Only then was Raimunda prescribed contraception by injection, from which she experienced no side-effects. John Fernandes suggested that the failure to treat side-effects like those suffered by Raimunda might have been systematic. He also said that when there were side-effects, medical attention was discriminatory, giving preference to Indonesian over Timorese women:

> In fact, there was a special drug to treat the side-effects, but the nurses who worked at the hospital discriminated in favour of the wives of Indonesians, leaving East Timorese who suffered side-effects untreated.

101. There have been frequent allegations that Indonesia's intent in instituting the birth control programme was not to improve the health of East Timorese women, but to achieve a much more sinister objective.[107] The charge is that the programme was intended as a part of a strategy of genocide aimed at wiping out an indigenous population that had already been seriously depleted by displacement and famine and to transfer more Indonesian transmigrants to the territory.[*] Allegations of the forced sterilisation of women without their knowledge or consent of the woman have also been made. The Commission has investigated these serious allegations. It has found no evidence to support them. It does appear that in the early 1980s young East Timorese girls were given a course of three injections over a period of one year. Boys and Indonesian girls of the same age were not included in the programme. Neither the girls nor their parents received any explanation for the injections other than that they were "good for their health", and the injections were administered in a coercive manner. Isabel Galhos describes what happened to her and her classmates when she was in her fourth year of primary school:

> [My younger sister and older brother and I] went to Tuana Laran primary school in Vila Verde (Dili). One day, around lunchtime, we were about to go home. The boys were already outside; it was just the girls inside. There was no announcement made but the teachers, mainly male teachers, came in with the headmistress. Suddenly the doors and the windows were shut… We all screamed because the doors were shut so suddenly. We jumped up, and ran here and there. We were caught and held and then given the injection. I am someone who is really afraid of injections. I was held by two male teachers, who said to me: "If you don't want it, then you'll get the injection in your thigh." All of the girls were injected.[108]

102. Some East Timorese concluded that the girls were being sterilised. Even prominent East Timorese were suspicious. The former governor of Timor-Leste, Mario Carrascalão, told the Commission that in the early 1980s (he could not recall the date) he received several visits from parents wanting to know why their high-school-age daughters had been vaccinated and whether the purpose of the injections was to sterilise them. He in turn asked the Indonesian head of the local health department to explain why only girls were being vaccinated and why the programme was being conducted surreptitiously. The official said that the girls were being vaccinated against tetanus, but was unable to explain the secretiveness surrounding the programme or allay the suspicion that the government might be conducting an experimental sterilisation programme. Bishop Belo believed that women who had not registered in the birth control programme, for whatever reason, were routinely being sterilised when they went into hospital for operations. According to Isabel Galhos, he issued a pastoral letter on the issue.[109]

103. The Commission consulted Dr José Guterres, of Family Health International[*] for clarification on why health workers might have separated Timorese girls for immunisation in the way Isabel Galhos describes it. Dr Guterres said that WHO guidelines recommend that girls in developing countries, who are at particular risk of contracting tetanus during childbirth, be immunised against tetanus on the following schedule:

- First immunisation as early as possible in childbearing years or as soon as possible during pregnancy;
- Second immunisation at least four weeks after the first;
- Third Immunisation at least six months after the second.

104. According to Dr Guterres, the schedule described by women who had been injected would be in accordance with WHO guidelines for tetanus. Dr Guterres also suggested that, in principle, it would be reasonable for Indonesian girls not to be innoculated since they had probably received tetanus shots as part of their childhood immunisations, while East Timorese children, particularly those who in early childhood had joined the general evacuation to the bush, were unlikely to have been immunised.

* Dr. José Guterres received his medical degree in an Indonesian university and had a medical practice in a health post in Ainaro.

105. The allegation that birth control was intended to reduce the Timorese population, while the transmigrant population would be allowed to grow unchecked, is not supported by the testimony of Carlito das Regras, who noted that, like army wives, transmigrants were also required to use birth control. In the case of transmigrants their agreement to take part in the programme was a precondition of their becoming transmigrants.[110]

106. Finally, the most conclusive evidence that there was not a sterilisation programme is perhaps that East Timorese women, including ones who were injected in the early 1980s in the circumstances described above, were not subsequently infertile.[111]

107. The allegations about forced sterilisation may not stand up, but what is indisputable is that the style in which innoculation programmes were conducted did nothing to allay the worst fears of East Timorese about what their purpose might be. As Miranda Sissons has noted:

> Whether or not the extensive rumours of coercive injections are justified, this series of incidents has rendered most East Timorese women extremely suspicious of any kind of injection, including those in the regular government vaccination programme. In some cases, girls have been withdrawn from high school as a result.[112]

108. The prevalence of the belief among East Timorese people that the Indonesians tried to reduce their population growth as part of a strategy to commit genocide obviously contributed significantly to resentment of the occupation and distrust of the intentions of the Indonesian state regarding the well-being of the East Timorese people. In addition, the allegation, at a minimum, illustrates the lack of information given patients in a very paternalistic style of health service delivery. This lack of information and health education makes informed patient consent impossible and further deepened the prevailing climate of fear. The distrust of Indonesian medical staff and services also had consequences for the general health of the population by discouraging them from seeking treatment or preventive health advice.

Mental health and trauma

109. Psychological trauma is one of the lingering legacies of any conflict. The Commission cannot estimate precisely the number of East Timorese people who were subjected to, were forced to commit or witnessed acts of extreme violence, including torture, rape, and murder. Months of daily aerial bombing and the resulting carnage continue to haunt those who sheltered in the mountains. Vast numbers of people were displaced from their homes, many repeatedly. Tens of thousands of people had their homes burned and personal property looted or destroyed, many of them more than once. Witnesses often told the Commission of having to leave behind children and the elderly to die, as they fled attacks by the Indonesian military and their auxiliaries.

110. Research in other countries emerging from conflict suggests that between 1% and 2% of those who suffer war-related trauma will develop serious mental illness. A further 5-15% will develop post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD), exhibited through a variety of symptoms, from long-term debilitating depression to disrupted sleep patterns. PTSD may develop immediately, or can manifest itself months or even years after the triggering event. The remainder of the population will recover with the help of community, or family-based support mechanisms, traditional healing, religious beliefs and rituals, or simply because the routines of daily life, in which employment plays a crucial part, restore their sense of identity.[113]

111. In 2000, an independent preliminary survey of trauma and torture was conducted in communities across all districts in Timor-Leste, through interviews with heads of households. Of the 1,033 respondents surveyed, 97% said that they had experienced some traumatic event and 34% were classified as having PTSD.[114] Some of the findings include:

- 76% were exposed to a combat situation
- 64% found themselves without shelter
- 60% found themselves in ill-health without access to medical care
- 57% had experienced some form of torture*
- 31% lost a father to political violence
- 24% lost a mother to violence
- 22% witnessed the murder of a family member or friend
- 22% had children who were injured or from whom they had been separated
- 14% lost a spouse to violence
- 12% lost a child to violence
- 20% believed they would never recover from their experiences
- 41% believed they would recover only with help.

112. Some of these events are part of the sorrow of war. However, others were the result of the security policies employed by the Indonesian military, purposely designed to harm the mental well-being of those suspected of resisting the occupation. Torture techniques during detention, in addition to inflicting unimaginable pain, are at their core designed to make the detainee feel completely disempowered and at the mercy of their captors, and to destroy their sense of dignity and personal security. The long-term effects of such treatment cannot be overestimated. In the general population, a climate of fear was sown intentionally and systematically as part of a policy of terrorisation. There can be no clearer example of policies whose impact was retrogressive. Mass forced displacement, long periods of severe food insecurity and hunger, separation from family, and authoritarian government also placed severe psychological and emotional pressure on members of the community.

* Only 5% of respondents said they had been raped, but rape is a crime that is notoriously under-reported [see Vol. III, Part 7.8: Sexual Violence].

113. The severity of these violations of the right to health were made all the worse by the Indonesian administration's failure to provide mental health services. Under the occupation there were no mental health services, and according to some sources, mental disorders were not considered a health issue.[115] The Commission has not heard of any steps taken by Indonesia to improve the mental health situation in Timor-Leste, either through formal hospital services or counselling.

Forced recruitment

Forced recruitment by the TNI, as operational assistants (Tenaga Bantuan Operasi, TBO) and as human shields in operations to flush out guerrillas, of which the best known was Operation Security, is covered elsewhere in this report (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict, section on : Operation Security; Vol. III, Part 7.5: Violations of the Laws of War and Part 7.8: The Rights of the Child).

The Commission documented 2,157 individual cases of forced recruitment. As Figure 2 shows, the bulk of these cases were reported as taking place in 1999 and between 1977 and 1984. An analysis of the victims of these forced recruitment reveals that 92.1% (1987/2157) were males and the most frequently documented age group was military age (between the ages of 20 and 34). However, relative to their share of the population, males in the 50-54 age group had the highest reported rate of forced recruitment. Of the forced recruitments documented by the Commission, institutional responsibility was attributed almost exclusively to the Indonesian military, police and their East Timorese collaborators. This is shown in Figure 3.

Narrative statements received by the Commission reveal that individuals forcefully recruited, such as TBOs, were generally not paid for their services and were often taken away from their homes and families for months at a time, in some cases for more than a year. Victims of forced recruitment were primarily in the most productive years of their lives and, in many cases, were responsible for the livelihood of their families. This official government policy therefore had a clear retrogressive measure in respect to the right to choose work and receive an adequate wage, and to have a livelihood.

Further, it had a retrogressive impact on the right to health. TBOs and other forced recruits were exposed to harsh and often dangerous conditions. They walked long distances carrying heavy loads, and often found themselves under fire. There are also reports that TBOs were used as human shields, forced to walk out in front of their unit when on patrol. There are a few reports of deaths from crossfire, and recruits also died from hunger, exhaustion, and illness.

Finally, where children were recruited, the policy and practice clearly violated their right to an education. One of the explicit aims of the right to education is to protect children from exploitative and hazardous labour. The military's policy of recruiting children, often as young as 12 and some even as young as ten, to assist in combat operations achieved the opposite by deliberately placing children in danger. The Commission has found that a military guideline stating that TBOs should be returned to school after their service was over was often flouted: in practice, they could be left stranded or could be abducted to Indonesia to work as servants to their soldiers.

Right to education

The right to education

Education, like health, is a right that is indispensable for the realisation of other rights, and is vital for both individuals and societies. The Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights General Comment 13 observes that:

[E]ducation is the primary vehicle by which economically and socially marginalised adults and children can lift themselves out of poverty and obtain the means to participate fully in their communities."[116]

The right to education entails the "essential features" of availability, accessibility, acceptability and adaptability:

- "Availability" is interpreted by the Committee as being measured by the quantity and quality of instruction, including buildings, sanitation facilities and drinking water, as well as by trained teachers receiving domestically competitive salaries, teaching materials and so on.[117]
- "Accessibility" is interpreted as both physical and economic, and without discrimination on any of the prohibited grounds.[118]
- "Acceptability" requires education to be relevant, culturally appropriate and of high quality.[119]
- "Adaptability" requires that it should be flexible so that it continues to meet the needs of students in diverse social and cultural settings.[120]

In addition, the ICESCR states the overall principle that:

[E]ducation shall be directed to the full development of the human personality and the sense of its dignity, and shall strengthen the respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. [The State Parties] further agree that education shall enable all persons to participate effectively in a free society, promote understanding, tolerance and friendship among all nations and all racial, ethnic or religious groups, and further the activities of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace.[121]

114. During all but the last decade of Portuguese colonial rule, education was unavailable to the vast majority of East Timorese. Like the health system, the education system under the Portuguese primarily served the needs of the colonial and indigenous elite.[122] Secondary schools were virtually non-existent for most of the colonial period.[123]

115. However, in the early 1960s, Portuguese policy changed and a school-building programme got underway. The main impulse for this change was the rebellion of 1959, which the state believed would not have happened had the people not been so "backward". Saldanha notes that from the early 1960s to the end of the colonial period, both the Catholic Church and the Portuguese government used education "as a 'psycho-social strategy' (accão psico-social) to embrace the population".[124] This view of development as a means to win "the hearts and minds" of the people was also an explicit rationale for Indonesian development programmes.[*]

116. From 4,898 in the 1959/60 school year, the number of primary school pupils rose to 57,579 in 1971/2, while the number in secondary schools increased from 175 to 1,275 in the same period. Yet, even after this investment, because the base was so low, at the time of the Indonesian invasion only about 10% of the population was literate.[125]

117. The consolidation of Indonesian control over the territory in late 1979 was quickly followed by a sharp increase in investment intended to bring Timor-Leste's development up to the level of the rest of Indonesia. One of the key priorities of Indonesia's development programme for Timor-Leste was the education sector.[†] Investment was immediately directed toward building schools and bringing in Indonesian teachers to raise enrolment. Rp3.3bn was allocated for education in fiscal years 1982/83-1988/89.[‡] In terms of enrolment, the results were dramatic (see Table 9 below). The number of primary school pupils rose to 167,181 in 1998. This amounted to an enrolment rate of 70% of the relevant age group. Every village had at least one primary school (although not all were operating). There were 6,672 primary-school teachers serving the 788 primary schools.[126] There was a huge increase in the number of secondary schools: by 1998 there were 114 lower secondary schools, 37 academic higher secondary schools and 17 vocational higher secondary schools. In the same year, there were 32,197 pupils in junior secondary schools and 18,973 attending higher secondary schools. A national university was established. This rapid expansion created staffing problems, particularly at the secondary and tertiary levels where shortages of teachers were most acute.[127]

118. Despite the greatly increased intake of pupils, about 30% of primary school-age children (7-12 years) were not enrolled in school in 1998. This was partly due to late enrolments and high repetition rates.[128] Direct educational costs were also high. In 1995, for the poorest 20% of the population, monthly spending on education was US$0.82 per capita.[129]

119. As with health, the large investment in education increased the physical availability of facilities, but did not produce a corresponding improvement in its quality. In 1998, the percentage of the working age population who had never received any education was still 58% in Timor-Leste compared with 18% in West Timor.* After 20 years of heavy investment, the literacy rate had increased significantly but was still only 40%. Timor-Leste's literacy rate was thus lower than the rate in any Indonesian province and lower than that in any country in the Asia Pacific region.[130]

120. Part of the problem was the quality of instruction. Between 1983 and 1998, there was a substantial increase in the number of teachers, most of whom came from Indonesia. However, student-teacher ratios were still high at primary, middle school, high school and especially university levels (see Table 9 par. 117 above). Further, a large percentage of teachers did not have the minimum teaching qualification.† In addition, as with health workers, many of the teachers were assigned to Timor-Leste immediately after graduating from colleges in Indonesia. They often did not like life in the villages they were sent to. Many took second jobs to supplement their low salaries (of between US$28–145 per month in 1999).[131] As a result, teachers were often absent.[132] Instruction

* Susenas 1998. Gomes cites this percentage not as those with no schooling as in the original, but as "illiterate". However, the actual illiteracy rate might be much higher, as schooling is no guarantee of literacy. Gomes, 2002, p. 205.

† Estimates range from 30% (Gomes, 1999) to 90% of primary school teachers did not have the minimum teaching qualification. J.N.D. was conducted in Indonesian, which was poorly understood;[133] unlike in Indonesia, local languages were banned in schools although Tetum could be used in the first three years of primary school to ease pupils into fully Indonesian instruction.[134] There were few books or teaching materials, and so pupils' progress was almost entirely dependent on the highly variable quality of their teachers.[135]

121. One researcher who interviewed East Timorese who grew up during the occupation, noted that they often described their experience in Indonesian schools as an important influence in the development of their pro-independence views:

> Nearly all those interviewed spoke of the poor quality of the education provided by the Indonesians. This was particularly the case in areas outside Díli. In the Ponta Leste region…Honorio de Araújo reflected that when he left school at thirteen, "I really had nothing of value in my head. It was a very primitive form of education, where the pupils were physically abused. There was constant corporal punishment. It was a sort of boot camp school, very rough and ready.[136]

122. In addition to the poor facilities and teaching, a fundamental problem with the education system under the Indonesians was what was taught. Rather than focusing on basic learning needs,* the curriculum was explicitly oriented towards pro-Indonesian propaganda. The curriculum was guided by educational objectives set out in Indonesian Law No. 2 1989:

- Formation of Pancasila citizens who have a high quality and would be able to stay independent;
- Contribution to the development of the Indonesian community, nation and state that is materialised in a solid national resilience;

* The World Declaration, Article 1, defines "basic learning needs" as literacy, numeracy, oral expression, and problem solving. Committee for ESCR General Comment 13, paragraph 9, further states that primary education "must…take into account the culture, needs, and opportunities of the community." World Declaration on Education for All-World Conference, Thailand 5-9 March 1990

- Increase people's capacity to protect the nation from the intrusion of any ideology, concept and teaching that is against Pancasila.[137]

123. The institutional problems described above and a curriculum in which indoctrination played a major part were not unique to Timor-Leste; they are in fact the rule in Indonesian education more generally. Morning recitals of the five Pancasila principles are a daily ritual in schools throughout the country, and courses on the "Full Understanding and Culturalisation of the Principles of Pancasila" are required for graduation from primary and secondary schools. Rote learning of nationalist slogans and songs, the teaching of an approved version of history, and conformity and unquestioning respect for authority are emphasised at the expense of basic skills development, especially of critical thinking and problem solving.* Communal unrest in Indonesia is often officially explained as arising from a poor understanding of the principles underlying the unified state of Indonesia. It is routinely followed by official public statements about the need for the local population to be better educated in Pancasila and the Archipelago Concept.

124. However, as with the birth control programme, the context of invasion and occupation added an extra dimension to these policies. While the explicit use of propaganda in an educational setting is contrary to the spirit of the right to education in any context,† in an occupied territory indoctrination that aims at advancing the occupying power's integrationist goals takes on a more repressive hue.

125. Military documents and government reports both stressed the need to "socialise" development, which was described as one of the two ways of overcoming resistance to integration with Indonesia (the other being the Security Defence Approach).[138] The military had responsibility for pursuing both of these approaches. In many rural areas military personnel served as teachers.[139]

126. Official documents such as the Act respecting the National Educational System also make it clear that teaching the Indonesian language was to be a core task of the educational system, both as a means to communicate the benefits of integration and as a

* Carol Warren examines the New Order's approaches to institutionalising Pancasila ideals through school curriculum that includes "Pancasila Studies" and village role-playing games. In the latter, villagers were encouraged to practice applying the Pancasila principles through "simulation games" in which villagers role-play local officials and members of the public to deal with situations including: "Mr Putu refuses to join in gotong royong (group unpaid work projects) for road repair because he says only a few people in the village benefit from the road concerned. As village head, how would you deal with it? Ibu Kartini is having trouble with her IUD and comes to you, her neighbor, for advice. What would you tell her?" † CRC, Article 29(1). The Committee on the Rights of the Child states: "Article 29 (1)…insists upon the need for education to be child-centred, child-friendly and empowering…The education to which every child has a right is one designed to provide the child with life skills, to strengthen the child's capacity to enjoy the full range of human rights and to promote a culture which is infused by appropriate human rights values," and, "it emphasizes the need for education to be designed and provided in such a way that it promotes and reinforces the range of specific ethical values enshrined in the Convention, including education for peace, tolerance, and respect for the natural environment, in an integrated and holistic manner." Committee on the Rights of the Child, General Comment 1: Aims of Education, UN Doc. CRC/GC/2001/1, 17 April 2001, paras 2 and 13.

way of establishing control.* The strong bias towards inculcating the occupiers' values is reflected in a breakdown of the textbooks procured for use in schools: between 1984 and 1989 the government bought 161,560 textbooks on the Indonesian language, 39,926 on the Indonesian governmental and administrative systems, and 9,398 on natural history and physics.[140] There is no doubt that the campaign to teach Indonesian in schools was effective: by 1998, 99% of children aged 10-19 and 85% of those aged 20-29 could speak Indonesian (compared with 20% of those 60 and older).[141]

127. Propaganda was not limited to schoolchildren. Adult community education programmes taught "reading, writing, and arithmetic including the Indonesian language…adapted to the principles of daily social intercourse, modernisation, and development".[142] Propaganda campaigns were aimed not just at influencing those who were undergoing formal education, but also the younger generation as a whole. For example, a document setting out educational goals for Timor-Leste in 1996, as part of the Sixth Five-Year Development Plan, contains a section entitled "Fostering Consciousness of Nationalism, Especially of the Younger Generation" (that comes just after another section called "Coping with Social Problems"):

> Recently problems in the development of the social-economic situation have been brought about by the younger generation who seem dissatisfied with the present situation. To handle such social and political unrest, the regional government, among other things, has given guidance to the…students of junior and senior high school by socialising the history of East Timor's integration into the Republic of Indonesia. In addition, guidance has also been given to university students studying at universities in and outside East Timor province… and to youth organisations.[143]

128. These statements from official documents provide insight not only into official thinking about education, but also into the depth of the state's misunderstanding of the source of Timorese discontent and the ineffectiveness of the Indonesian "development" solution in a highly militarised and repressive setting. To illustrate this point, in his defence against charges of subversion in connection with the demonstration held in Jakarta on 19 November 1991 after the Santa Cruz massacre, the chairman of the student organisation Renetil, Fernando de Araújo, argued that self-determination could not be traded for paved roads and other symbols of development:

> Only if the people of Timor-Leste were materialistic would it be possible that they would exchange their fundamental right to be free for development…The right to freedom, the right to independence cannot be traded for a car with a red licence plate, asphalted roads and other material things…Our right to have relations with other states, our right to manage our own natural resources, our right to ask foreign countries for assistance on the grounds that the people of Timor-Leste have many shortcomings (as this [the Indonesian] government has frequently done) – all these rights have been taken from us. Don't just look at what we have, but also please consider how we got it.[144]

* "[T]he development of national education is aimed, first, at building a skilled and self-reliant Pancasila society, and, second, at supporting the development of Indonesian society and social relations so that a durable national resilience becomes the foundation for establishing the nation's capacity to resist any doctrine, opinion or ideology that is inconsistent with Pancasila." KORPRI Timor Timur, 1996, p. 181 (official translation).

Findings

General findings

The Commission finds that:

129. Taking the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR) and other relevant international instruments as the standard, that Indonesia failed both to fulfil its core responsibilities as a State with regard to economic and social rights and to do its utmost to realise progressively those rights to the extent that its resources allowed.

130. Indonesia repeatedly failed to carry out its core responsibilities with regard to economic and social rights. It failed to meet the basic needs of the population for food, shelter and essential medicines. By dispensing its resources selectively, whether by channelling them to favoured groups or by withholding resources from those in dire need of them, it acted in a discriminatory fashion. It repeatedly took measures that placed members of the population in situations that caused their economic and social situations to deteriorate, that is, it took measures that were retrogressive.

131. Instances where Indonesia failed to fulfil its core responsibilities to the people of Timor-Leste occurred with regularity throughout the occupation. For example, the treatment of East Timorese who were "resettled" after surrender or capture in the late 1970s and the effects of the scorched earth policy implemented by the TNI and its militia allies in 1999 were clear examples of policies which resulted in the denial of the population's economic and social rights, with extreme impact on its rights to an adequate standard of living, livelihood, to the highest attainable standard of health, to education, and to undertake work freely chosen.

132. Despite its claim to be bringing development to Timor-Leste, in fact the Indonesian government also failed to realise the economic and social rights of the East Timorese to the maximum extent possible.

133. The Indonesian authorities, both civilian and military, disregarded those provisions of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and the Hague Convention of 1907 bearing on an occupying power's obligations to respect defined economic and social rights of the people of an occupied territory. They were in breach of specific obligations not to destroy or seize property arbitrarily, not to profit from the resources of the occupied territory, and not to subject members of the population to compulsory service with the occupying forces. As already noted, they failed in their duty to meet basic needs for food, medical supplies and shelter, violating not just the standards set out in the ICESCR but also their obligations under international humanitarian law.

134. Many of the actions of the Indonesian authorities during the occupation had long-lasting impacts on the economic and social conditions of the people of Timor-Leste and, in many cases, continue to this day. The plunder of resources such as timber depleted to precariously low levels, assets that are essential to the long-term well-being of the population. No less damaging was the social impact of these measures. The discriminatory use of resources served to create new divisions and to entrench existing ones. The arbitrary use of powers to move the population and evict them forcibly has left an unresolved legacy of uncertain tenure and landlessness. The exposure of the overwhelming majority of the population to terror of various kinds, including torture, killings and rape, has undermined the mental health of an unknown number of East Timorese. The Commission takes the view that all of these social impacts are impediments to reconciliation and need to be addressed within that context.

135. Timor-Leste was not the only area under Indonesian control in which violations of economic and social rights occurred during the occupation period. Many of the violations reported above were also commonplace in Indonesia itself during this period. However, the exceptional degree of military control and the context of invasion and occupation of Timor-Leste often made these violations more intense and limited the population's ability to rectify them through seeking redress or by other means.

Specific findings

The right to an adequate standard of living

Development and government spending

136. Despite the Indonesian Government's large investment in Timor-Leste and the rapid economic growth that it produced, particularly when compared with the performance of the Portuguese colonial power, government security concerns rather than the interests of the majority of the population guided the distribution of that investment. The contrast between investment and growth in such sectors as transport and communications and government administration, and that in agriculture on which the vast majority of the population depended for its livelihood, strikingly illustrates the occupying power's distorted priorities. Income and poverty indicators at the end of the Indonesian occupation, which show Timor-Leste lagging behind most other countries and all the provinces of Indonesia itself, provide strong evidence of the harmful effects that this choice of priorities had on the living conditions of the majority of East Timorese.

Rights over natural resources

137. The Commission is satisfied that trading companies with direct links to the military and the Indonesian government deliberately and systematically underpaid coffee smallholders, thereby abridging their right to an adequate livelihood.

138. The arrangements that the Indonesian authorities put in place in the coffee industry was one of several instances where Indonesia denied the people of Timor-Leste an essential component of their right to self-determination, namely their right to dispose of their natural wealth and resources freely. The Indonesian authorities committed similar violations by exploiting other resources, including sandalwood and timber, without regard to sustainability and by failing to regulate the exploitation of these resources by others. These forms of exploitation of natural resources were also positively harmful to the well-being of the population and were sometimes used to fund military operations, and as such violated the duties of an occupying power.

139. In a further breach of the people of Timor-Leste's right to dispose of its natural resources, the Commission finds that Indonesia and Australia concluded the Timor Gap Treaty in 1989 without consulting the people of Timor-Leste or paying due regard to their interests.

The right to adequate food

140. The Indonesian government took measures that worsened the food situation of the people of Timor-Leste. Timor-Leste's climate and the uneven quality of its soils make the food situation precarious at the best of times, and survival dependent on the population's ability to move freely. The Commission has found that the Indonesian authorities did not just neglect agriculture; they also took security measures that positively worsened the chances of the farming population to make a living, primarily by forcibly settling them in infertile areas under conditions in which their movement was restricted.

Housing and land

141. The Commission finds that all sides to the conflict – Fretilin, UDT and the Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries – engaged in activities, including forcible displacement, the destruction of houses and other property, and the looting of possessions, that violated the right to housing.

142. The Commission finds that repeated displacements, the redrawing of administrative boundaries and the non-recognition of customary land-ownership and land-use practices produced a legacy of landlessness and highly complex land disputes. Although security considerations played an important part in producing this outcome, the unchecked pursuit of economic interests by military and civilian officials and their business associates were also crucial factors. The disruption of landholding and land-use patterns has had, and will continue to have, profoundly damaging effects on the economic, social and cultural fabric of East Timorese society.

Rights to health and education

143. Although Indonesian investment in health and education was significant and resulted in the physical installation of territory-wide health and education systems, the Commission found that it was ineffective in overcoming chronic public health problems or meeting basic learning needs.

144. Many factors contributed to this outcome. Among the side-effects of extreme violations, such as torture and forced recruitment, were ill-health and the disruption of education. The skewed economic development promoted by the Indonesian authorities created a self-perpetuating cycle in which poverty, on the one hand, and poor health and low educational achievement, on the other, fed on each other. The highly militarised context and other structural factors, such as the lack of expertise and commitment of the Indonesian medical personnel and teachers assigned to Timor-Leste, resulted in services that were sub-standard and mistrusted by the local population. Basic health and educational needs were often subordinated to security considerations, as exemplified by the forced settlement of large numbers of the population in disease-ridden areas that had previously been shunned and the heavy emphasis on propaganda in schools.

145. The implementation of the family planning programme in Timor-Leste was wholly at odds with principles that are integral to the right to health, namely the freedom to control one's health and body and the right to information that will enable one to have such control. The Commission has found that the programme contained a strong element of compulsion, which was reinforced by a target-driven approach and direct military involvement in the programme's design and implementation. The programme was also pursued without regard to the possible and actual side-effects of the birth-control methods that were prescribed.

146. The suspicions generated by the authoritarian approach to patient care were reflected in the widespread credence given to allegations that the Indonesians were secretly engaged in a campaign of forced sterilisation whose intent was genocidal. The Commission has not found these allegations compelling, but they do highlight the kind of suspicions fostered by an authoritarian approach to medical care in which medical personnel felt no obligation to give patients information about their treatment.

147. The use of schools for propaganda and indoctrination severely interfered with the education of an entire generation of East Timorese youth. Education was used in this way as part of an integrated security approach whose overriding objective was to ensure that pro-independence sentiment did not take root in a new generation. In this context, teaching children the skills that would enhance their prospects and enable them to fulfil their human potential was secondary.

After looking at forty truth commissions world-round, I concluded that the truth commission of East Timor was among the five strongest. It was an impressive, passionate and scrupulous exercise. And its report, Chega!, stands in testament to this careful and rigorous exercise, honestly re ecting the victims' stories as well as the far-reaching conclusions that emerged from this work. It is wonderful that this will now be available, in full, in English; it will be an important reference for others embarking on a similar path.

Priscilla Hayner,
Author, Unspeakable Truths: Transitional Justice and the Challenge of Truth Commissions (2nd ed., 2011)

"The extensive CAVR Report is an encyclopedia of our history, rich in both teachings and suffering. We must utilise its great teachings to better understand today's crisis and to help prevent future crises."

Jose Ramos-Horta,
Nobel Peace Laureate, former President and Prime Minister of Timor-Leste (July 2006)

"Chega! is troubling testimony. This report will jolt Indonesian readers who think that under the Soeharto regime everything was peaceful in Indonesia's then 27th province. Page after page recounts the stories of victims of massacres, rape, forced disappearances, torture and other unimaginable crimes ... Indonesia can learn from Chega! This report is an important contribution to democratisation and security sector reform in Indonesia."

Ifdhal Kasim,
Chair, Indonesian Commission on Human Rights (August 2010)

"The CAVR Report constitutes an important milestone in the search for justice, truth and reconciliation in Timor-Leste. It is my sincere hope that (it) will be an enduring contribution to building the Timorese nation and will help to prevent the recurrence of such tragic events in Timor-Leste and elsewhere."

Kofi Annan,
UN Secretary-General (July 2006)

8. Responsibility and Accountability

Introduction

State, institutional and individual responsibility*

1. Regulation 10/2001 provided the Commission with a mandate that included a duty to inquire into the context, causes and commission of human rights violations which occurred in Timor-Leste from 25 April 1974 to 25 October 1999.† Within this framework the Commission was specifically given the duty to inquire into and make findings as to which persons, authorities, institutions and organisations were involved in the violations, and whether they were the result of a deliberate plan or policy by a state, political organisation, militia group, liberation movement, or other group or individual.[1]

2. As it is not a judicial institution, the Commission has not made any findings of law. However, its findings in relation to responsibility for human rights violations have been guided by the principles of customary international law.‡ The Commission has also considered political, moral and historical responsibility.

3. In accordance with its mandate the Commission has made findings of responsibility in respect of states, institutions, organisations and individuals.

4. States are legally and morally responsible for the conduct of their organs and agents. This includes not only those who are officials and employees of the state, but also individuals whose actions are controlled by the state. A state will be accountable under international law when its conduct (through its organs or agents) breaches an international obligation owed by that state under treaty or international law. This can occur through the commission of positive acts. It may also occur when the state fails to prevent violations or to investigate and prosecute the individuals responsible.

* A full account of the laws giving rise to accountability on the part of states, organisations and individuals can be found in Vol. I, Part 2: The Mandate of the Commission.

† See Vol. I, Part 2: The Mandate of the Commission, for a thorough discussion of the Commission's mandate.

‡ The mandate of the Commission required it to use the standards of international humanitarian law, international human rights law and domestic criminal law in deciding what constitutes the commission of a human rights violation.

5. The Commission has held organisations and institutions, including political parties, to be institutionally responsible for violations committed by their members or agents while acting as representatives of the organisation, institution or party.

6. Individuals have been held to be responsible where, in the opinion of the Commission, there is sufficient evidence to establish that they have a case to answer for crimes recognised under customary international law or domestic criminal law which was applicable at the time of the violation.

7. Individuals can be held to account in any of three situations. The first of these is where he or she intentionally commits, plans, orders, aids or abets the planning, preparation or execution of a crime. Secondly, an individual will be accountable for taking part in a common plan or conspiracy to facilitate the commission of a crime. Thirdly, an individual may be held responsible according to the principle of command responsibility.

8. Under international law a person who is in the position of a superior (either in law or in fact) and who has effective control over his or her subordinates[2] will have command responsibility where a crime is committed by a subordinate and the superior knew or should have known of the crime but did nothing to prevent it, or to punish those responsible.[3]

Crimes under international law

9. Although it is not a court the Commission has made findings where it considers that certain international crimes have been committed and has identified who it believes to be responsible for these crimes. Although many international crimes provide a legal remedy only against individuals who violate them, the Commission has made more general findings about the responsibility of institutions which individual perpetrators represented, including state responsibility for the actions of its agents. In making these findings the Commission has applied the legal standards which are described in Vol. I, Part 2: The Mandate of the Commission. These can be summarised as follows.

Crimes against humanity

10. A crime against humanity occurs when certain prohibited acts are committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population. The civilian population in question may be any civilian group. It might be, for example, a group connected through ideological, political or cultural association and gender,[4] including civilian groups advocating liberation or supporting resistance to occupation. Prohibited acts include: murder; extermination (including by deprivation of food); enslavement; deportation or forcible transfer of population; forced labour; imprisonment; torture; rape; persecution on political, racial, or religious grounds; enforced disappearances; and other inhumane acts "of a similar character intentionally causing great suffering, or serious injury to body or to mental or physical health". These prohibited acts must be committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against the civilian population. "Widespread" refers to the large-scale nature of the attack and the number of targeted persons, while the phrase "systematic" refers to the organised nature of the acts of violence and the improbability of their random occurrence.*

War crimes

11. Two categories of war crimes exist in the context of an international armed conflict, such as that between the Indonesian security forces and those of the East Timorese national liberation movement between 1975 and 1999.† The first are "grave breaches" of the Geneva Conventions.‡ A "grave breach" occurs when certain criminal acts are committed against vulnerable persons, namely the wounded, the sick, prisoners of war and civilians. These acts include:

- Wilful killing, torture or inhuman treatment, intentionally causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health
- Extensive destruction and appropriation of property not justified by military necessity and carried out unlawfully and wantonly
- Compelling a prisoner of war or a civilian to serve in the forces of a hostile power
- Wilfully depriving a prisoner of war or a civilian of the rights of fair and regular trial
- The unlawful deportation or transfer or unlawful confinement of a civilian; and the taking of civilians as hostages.

12. The second category consists of serious breaches of the laws and customs of war. These include, for example, the murder, torture, ill-treatment or deportation of civilians; the murder or ill-treatment of prisoners of war; the plunder of public or private property; and the wanton destruction of towns or villages or devastation not justified by military necessity.

* Kunarac Appeal Judgement, para. 94. According to the ICTR an attack is "widespread" if it is a massive, frequent, large scale action, carried out collectively with considerable seriousness and directed against a multiplicity of victims. [Prosecutor v Akayesu, Judgement, No. ICTR-96-4-T, para. 580 ,Sept. 2, 1998]. The ICTR defined "systematic" as constituting "organised action, following a regular pattern, on the basis of a common policy and involving substantial public or private resources …[T]here must exist some preconceived plan or policy." [Prosecutor v Musema, Judgement, No. ICTR-96-13-T, para. 204, Jan. 27, 2000]. The plan or policy need not be formally articulated; it may be inferred from the circumstances, including "the scale of the acts of violence perpetrated." [Prosecutor v Blaskic, Judgment, No. IT-95-14-T, para. 204, March 3, 2000].

† For a full discussion of the legal basis for the Commission's finding that the conflict between Indonesian forces and Fretilin/Falintil was an "international armed conflict" see Vol. I, Part 2: The Mandate of the Commission.

‡ Both Indonesia and Portugal ratified the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and Additional Protocol I.

13. In an internal armed conflict, such as that between the followers of Fretilin and UDT in 1975, war crimes consist only of the most serious violations as set out in Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions or under the laws and customs of war.[5] Serious violations of Common Article 3 are specified to include crimes committed against persons taking no active part in the hostilities, such as members of armed forces who have laid down their arms or who are sick, wounded or in detention. These crimes include murder, violence to the person, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture; committing outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment; the taking of hostages; and the issuing of sentences and the carrying out of executions without affording due process.

Genocide

14. Genocide is defined as any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnic, racial or religious group as such by:

- Killing members of the group
- Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group
- Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part
- Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group
- Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group.

15. Although there has been much criticism of this definition, including that it is too narrow, it is almost universally accepted that the definition reflects the position under customary law.

16. The legal definition of the international crime of genocide does not include actions directed at political groups, such as a movement supporting political independence. The issue of whether the victims of the attacks of the Indonesian security forces constituted a national group seeking to uphold their right to self-determination is one which would require highly technical legal consideration by a court with relevant jurisdiction. The Commission does not consider making such highly technical decisions of international jurisprudence to be within its mandate. It has, therefore, chosen not to reach any findings on whether the actions of the Indonesian security forces did or did not amount to genocide. It has, however, reached findings on crimes against humanity and war crimes, both of which clearly apply to the facts under consideration.

Legal killings and detentions

17. The killing and detention of combatants by members of opposing forces are not considered to be violations of international humanitarian law if they fall within the limits of acceptable methods of warfare. Such acts have therefore not been included in the definition of human rights violations used by the Commission. They do not form part of this Report, and are not included in the acts defined as violations for the purposes of statistical analysis.*

* See Vol. I, Part 2: The Mandate of the Commission, for a summary of the principles of humanitarian law adopted by the Commission.

The focus on institutional responsibility

18. The Commission was designed as part of a larger enterprise aimed at satisfying the needs both of justice for past crimes and of reconciliation after 25 years of conflict in Timor-Leste. It was created as a mechanism that would be complementary to the United Nations-sponsored Serious Crimes process. Before the creation of the Commission, the Serious Crimes Investigations Unit and the Special Panels of the Dili District Court were established, in accordance with UN Security Council Resolution 1272,[*] with a mandate to investigate and prosecute those responsible for serious crimes committed between 1 January and 25 October 1999.[†] Because of the principle of universal jurisdiction (not limited by time or place), the Serious Crimes Investigation Unit was also given the authority to investigate and prosecute those responsible for crimes against humanity, war crimes and genocide throughout the entire period of the Commission's mandate, from April 1974 to October 1999.[‡]

19. Rather than duplicate the work of the UN Serious Crimes Investigations Unit, whose focus was the investigation of individual cases, the mandate of the Commission included the duty to inquire into the broader patterns of violations, including their context and background, which had taken place during the entire 25-year period of conflict. The inquiries and deliberations of the Commission have therefore been primarily focused on establishing the truth about the responsibility of states and other institutions for broad patterns of violations, particularly those committed as part of an organised plan or programme.

Principal findings

The State of Indonesia and the Indonesian security forces

20. The Commission finds that:

The military invasion of Timor-Leste by Indonesia on 7 December 1975 was a violation of one of the most fundamental and universally accepted principles of international law – the prohibition on the illegal use of force by one state against another. The Commission holds the State of Indonesia to be accountable for this violation and responsible for its consequences.

21. Throughout the period of the illegal military occupation of Timor-Leste, members of the Indonesian security forces committed massive, widespread and systematic human rights violations against the civilian population of the territory. The Commission is satisfied that these violations amounted to crimes against humanity and war crimes.

* Security Council Resolution 1272 (1999) established UNTAET on 25 October 1999, granting a mandate to "exercise all legislative and executive authority, including the administration of justice".

† UNTAET Regulation 16/2000, Regulation on the Establishment of a Public Prosecution Service (6 June 2000); UNTAET Regulation 15/2000, Section 22 (6 June 2000) provided that panels of judges sitting on "Serious Crimes" cases, and on the Appeal Court, would be made up of two international judges and one East Timorese judge.

22. Integral to the military operations designed to overcome resistance to the Indonesian invasion and occupation was official acceptance of the commission of gross violations including widespread and systematic executions, arbitrary detention, torture, and rape and sexual slavery.

23. The Commission finds that the Government of Indonesia and the Indonesian security forces are primarily responsible and accountable for the death from hunger and illness of between 100,000 and 180,000 East Timorese civilians who died as a direct result of the Indonesian military invasion and occupation. The Commission received conclusive evidence that between the years 1976–1979 the Indonesian security forces systematically:

- Failed to discriminate between civilian and military targets in conducting repeated large-scale bombardments from land, sea and air and other military operations which caused large numbers of East Timorese civilians to flee their homes and once having done so to flee again, often repeatedly, with the result that their capacity to make a livelihood was severely curtailed.
- Destroyed food sources by burning and poisoning crops and food stores, slaughtering herds of livestock. Forced tens of thousands of East Timorese who surrendered or been captured by Indonesian forces to move into designated settlements from which they were not free to leave.
- Failed to supply those interned in these settlements with sufficient food or medicines to ensure their survival, even though the needs of the internees were entirely foreseeable since the Indonesian forces' military campaigns had aimed precisely at achieving the outcome they did in fact achieve – namely the mass surrender of the population under Fretilin control into areas under Indonesian control.
- Denied those who had been interned in these settlements the freedom to search for food.
- Refused to allow access by international aid organisations which offered to provide food to those confined to the settlements.
- Continued to implement these policies even after thousands of men, women and children had starved to death in the camps and restricted areas.

24. The Commission finds that the only logical conclusion that can be drawn from these actions is that the Indonesian security forces consciously decided to use starvation of East Timorese civilians as a weapon of war, as part of its strategy for destroying resistance to the military occupation.

25. The Commission finds that the intentional imposition of conditions of life which could not sustain tens of thousands of East Timorese civilians amounted to extermination as a crime against humanity committed against the East Timorese civilian population.

26. The Commission finds that during the invasion and occupation members of the Indonesian security forces summarily executed thousands of East Timorese non-combatants. The executions included mass executions and massacres, the killing of prisoners who had been captured or had surrendered, and collective and proxy punishment for actions carried out by others who had evaded capture. Collective punishment was a central and systematic component of an Indonesian military strategy designed to overcome resistance to the military occupation. These illegal killings amounted to crimes against humanity and war crimes.

27. The Commission finds that throughout the entire period from the Indonesian invasion in 1975 to the arrival of international peacekeepers in 1999, members of the Indonesian security forces implemented a programme of widespread and systematic arbitrary detention, which routinely involved the torture of thousands of East Timorese non-combatants. These practices were systematic and were condoned and encouraged at the highest levels of the security apparatus and the civil administration. The use of torture amounted to crimes against humanity and war crimes.

28. Throughout the period of the conflict members of the Indonesian security forces systematically raped and imposed conditions of sexual slavery on thousands of East Timorese women, often inside military facilities, police stations and government offices. Gang rape by military personnel inside military facilities was common, as was sexual torture. The Commission finds that the systematic rape of these mostly young women by members of the Indonesian security forces amounted to crimes against humanity and war crimes. The Commission bases these findings on the first-hand accounts of hundreds of individual, unrelated victims who courageously told of their experiences despite the significant personal sacrifice involved in providing such evidence.

29. The Commission finds that all of the major categories of human rights violations committed by members of the Indonesian security forces against adults were also committed against children. Children (persons under 18 years of age) were systematically killed, detained, tortured, raped and otherwise violated on a widespread scale by members of the Indonesian security forces inside military facilities and at other official locations.

30. The Commission finds that commanders and personnel of ABRI/TNI committed significant violations of their obligations under international law by using illegal methods of warfare in their campaign in Timor-Leste. Actions routinely carried out which were in violation of the Geneva Conventions included:

- The targeting of civilians in military attacks
- A failure to discriminate between civilian and military targets
- The collective punishment of civilians for the actions of members of the Resistance forces
- The killing, torture and ill-treatment of civilians who had surrendered and been taken prisoner
- The use of prohibited weapons including napalm and chemical weapons
- Large-scale forced recruitment, including of children
- The deliberate destruction of civilian food sources.

31. The Commission finds that Indonesian judges, prosecutors, defence counsel, police, and military intelligence operatives collaborated to conduct sham trials of several hundred East Timorese after their arrest for engaging in pro-independence political activities. These trials involved the systematic use of torture to produce confessions, the fabrication of evidence and the manipulation of judicial proceedings. Those who participated in the preparation and conduct of these trials are responsible and accountable for the illegal imprisonment of hundreds of supporters of independence for Timor-Leste.

32. The Commission finds that the State of Indonesia violated the right of the East Timorese to use and enjoy the benefits flowing from their own natural resources. This right was violated in a variety of ways including: by allowing the Indonesian security forces and their business associates to control the East Timorese coffee crop and to remove large quantities of resources, such as sandalwood and other types of timber, from the territory. Indonesia also violated the rights of the East Timorese people by illegally entering into an agreement with the Government of Australia to exploit the oil and gas resources in the Timor Sea.

33. The Commission finds that senior members of the Indonesian military, police and civil administration were involved in the planning and implementation of a programme of mass human rights violations intended to influence the outcome of the United Nations-organised Popular Consultation conducted in Timor-Leste in 1999. One of the main ways in which this programme was implemented was through the creation of new East Timorese militia groups and the strengthening of existing ones.

34. The Commission finds that the militia groups were formed, trained, armed, funded, directed and controlled by the Indonesian security forces. Indonesian military personnel served as commanders of some militia groups, senior commanders endorsed the militias, they operated from Indonesian military bases, and commonly committed atrocities in the presence of or under the direction of uniformed members of the TNI.

35. The programme conducted by members of the Indonesian security forces used violence and terror, including killing, torture, beatings, rape and property destruction in an attempt to force East Timorese voters to opt formally to "integrate" with Indonesia. When this strategy failed to produce the intended result, the security forces and their auxiliaries went on a rampage of violence, directed against people and property, and forcibly deported several hundred thousand East Timorese to West Timor.

36. The Commission finds that the massive human rights violations committed during 1999 were not the result of a conflict between East Timorese groups with different political preferences. Nor was it the result of "rogue elements" of the TNI acting out of the control of their superiors. The violations were committed in execution of a systematic plan approved, conducted and controlled by Indonesian military commanders up to the highest level.

37. The systematic violations that occurred in 1999 were facilitated through both the direct participation and the inaction of members of the Indonesian police force, who systematically failed to intervene to prevent the violations taking place and to punish perpetrators when they did.

38. Members of the local civil administration in Timor-Leste and national-level government officials, including ministers, knew of the strategy being pursued on the ground, and rather than taking action to halt it, directly supported its implementation.

39. The violations committed by the members of the Indonesian security forces during 1999 included thousands of separate incidents which constituted crimes against humanity. The Commission holds the leadership of the Indonesian security forces at the highest levels responsible and accountable for their role in planning and executing a strategy of which violations of human rights were an integral part, for failing to prevent or punish perpetrators under their command, and for creating a climate of impunity in which military personnel were encouraged to commit abhorrent acts against civilians known or perceived to be supporters of East Timorese independence.

Principal findings on the responsibility of Fretilin

40. The Commission finds that representatives of Fretilin were justified in taking up arms to defend themselves and the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination in response to the actions of representatives of the UDT party during the armed movement in August 1975.

41. However, representatives of Fretilin responded by committing serious human rights violations against members and leaders of UDT and, on a smaller scale, of Apodeti which are inexcusable under any circumstances. In particular members of Fretilin were responsible for the arbitrary detention, beating, torture, ill-treatment and execution of civilians who were known or thought to be members of UDT and Apodeti. These acts were violations of their obligations under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which applies to internal armed conflicts.

42. Representatives of Fretilin executed prisoners in Aileu (Aileu), Maubisse (Ainaro) and Same (Manufahi) between December 1975 and February 1976. The Commission finds that in addition to local-level Fretilin and Falintil leaders and commanders in Aileu, Maubisse and Same, senior leaders and commanders, including members of the Fretilin Central Committee present in these areas at the time, were responsible for the torture and execution of prisoners in these places in late 1975 and early 1976. While accepting that the Fretilin Central Committee did not take a formal decision to commit these violations, the Commission finds that these senior leaders and commanders were either aware that they were taking place, were directly involved in deciding that they should take place, or were present when they did take place.

43. The Commission finds that when differences over military strategy and ideology emerged within the Resistance during 1976 and 1977–1978, leaders of Fretilin belonging to the dominant faction within the party and their supporters responded in a grossly intolerant manner. This intolerance manifested itself in serious human rights violations, including the torture and ill-treatment of detainees and the execution of leaders and members of Fretilin and Falintil who disagreed with the mainstream Fretilin leadership. The victims were often treated in this way after being accused of collaborating with, spying for or otherwise acting as agents of the Indonesian security forces. The Commission finds that these accusations were often politically-motivated, and that Fretilin/Falintil subjected victims accused of these crimes to severe punishments, including indefinite periods of detention in deplorable conditions and execution, without any form of due process which in any way met international standards for procedural fairness.

44. The Fretilin leadership is also responsible for the detention of hundreds of persons in Renals and other detention centres established by Fretilin. The Renals were established to "re-educate" persons who differed from the leadership in their political views or whose loyalty was in doubt. Those detained included many ordinary people living in Fretilin-controlled areas who were believed, often on tenuous grounds, to be planning to surrender to Indonesian forces or to have had contact with Indonesian forces or their East Timorese collaborators. They also included those accused of common criminal offences. These people were often subjected to inhumane conditions, beatings and torture, which led to their death in detention, and many were executed.

45. The Commission finds that to the extent that it subjected persons it detained during the period 1976–1978 to a process of "popular justice", the Fretilin leadership within Timor-Leste was responsible for sanctioning a trial process which was grossly unfair in that it denied the accused their rights to be informed of the nature of the accusations beforehand, to be presumed to be innocent and to reply to the accusations made. As a result of these "non-trials" the accused persons were often subjected to further severe violations, including execution.

46. The question of whether individuals should or should not have been prevented from surrendering to Indonesian forces in the years following the invasion is complex, and some decisions are understandable when the totality of the situation is considered. However, the Commission found that the severe ill-treatment, torture, and, in some cases, killing of persons who favoured surrender was always inexcusable. Whatever the rights and wrongs of the debate over surrender, the Fretilin leaders who condoned and in some cases implemented these practices remain responsible for these extreme violations of victims' rights, which cannot be justified under any circumstances.

47. The Commission finds that the actions of the members of the Fretilin, and those associated with it, in cases of detention, torture and killing of civilians, prisoners, the wounded and the sick, were violations of their duties under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions.

Principal findings on the responsibility of the UDT political party

48. The Commission finds that on 11 August 1975 the leadership of the UDT party launched an armed movement, the purpose of which was to gain control of the political leadership of the territory of Timor-Leste. UDT had no legal authority to undertake this action, and by doing so acted in violation of the rights of the East Timorese people to determine voluntarily their own political destiny.

49. During the armed movement UDT committed widespread human rights violations against members of the civilian population and combatants not engaged in combat, and particularly against individuals believed to be leaders and supporters of Fretilin. Hundreds of civilians were arbitrarily detained, many of whom were tortured, killed and otherwise mistreated.

50. The Commission finds that the actions of the leaders and members of the UDT party, and those associated with the party, in cases involving the detention, torture and killing of civilians, prisoners, the wounded and the sick, were violations of their obligations under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions.

51. The Commission finds that the leadership of UDT at the time are responsible for inciting their members to participate in an armed action without putting in place systems of command and control which could effectively regulate the behaviour of their members. They also did not prepare adequate facilities for the hundreds of prisoners who were detained. The Commission therefore finds the leaders of the UDT party at the time of the armed movement responsible for the violations committed by the members of UDT who were acting under their overall command.

52. The Commission finds that the local UDT leaders who incited hatred and who ordered victims to be detained, beaten, tortured or killed to be responsible and accountable for the consequences of these actions. The most extreme forms of abuse reported to the Commission occurred at the UDT headquarters in Dili, and in the districts of Ermera and Liquiçá, which were UDT strongholds.

53. The Commission holds the UDT district party leaders in Dili, Ermera and Liquiçá Districts in August 1975 to be responsible and accountable for the serious mass violations committed by those acting under their command and control. These violations included ordering or allowing the torture and summary execution of groups of unarmed civilians by party members acting under their authority.

54. The Commission finds the leadership of the UDT party to be responsible for contributing to the violation of the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination by contributing manpower to assist the invading Indonesian forces, inviting Indonesia to invade Timor-Leste and signing the Balibó Declaration, which helped to provide a veneer of legitimacy to the illegal Indonesian occupation and annexation of the territory.

55. Members of UDT joined Indonesian forces training in West Timor after September 1975 and participated in the military invasion of Timor-Leste, accompanying Indonesian military personnel and assisting them both militarily and by providing local knowledge and intelligence. The leaders and members of UDT involved in these operations are responsible for the violations in which they were directly involved and to which they contributed, both directly and indirectly.

56. The Commission finds that UDT leaders assisted Indonesia by presenting false and misleading information to the United Nations and its member states in the period after the Indonesian invasion. It thereby prevented members of the international community from gaining a true picture of the situation in Timor-Leste, which might have formed the basis of international initiatives on behalf of the people of Timor-Leste. By taking on this role they contributed to the suffering of the East Timorese people, for which they must be held morally responsible.

Principal findings on the responsibility of the Apodeti political party

57. Although the Commission received significantly fewer reports of violations committed by members of Apodeti than by either Fretilin or UDT, the evidence clearly demonstrates that apart from their direct role in violations, members of Apodeti participated in the Indonesian invasion and supported the military occupation in a variety of ways.

58. Apodeti members worked with Indonesian intelligence agents, both military and civilian, inside Timor-Leste and in Indonesia during 1974–1975. They were responsible for undermining the decolonisation process and destabilising the situation in Timor-Leste.

59. Beginning in December 1974 approximately 200 members of Apodeti participated in military training exercises near Atambua, West Timor, which led to their participation with Indonesian military personnel, in covert military action inside Timor-Leste from August 1975 and possibly earlier, including the attack on Balibó on 16 October 1975. These East Timorese "Partisans" subsequently took part in the invasion of Timor-Leste, accompanying Indonesian military personnel and assisting them both militarily and by providing local knowledge and intelligence. The leaders and members of Apodeti involved in these operations are responsible for the violations in which they were directly involved and to which they contributed, both directly and indirectly. They are also responsible for the consequences of signing the Balibó Declaration, which helped to provide a veneer of legitimacy to the illegal Indonesian occupation and annexation of the territory.

60. The Apodeti leaders and those directly involved in compiling lists and pointing out individuals who were targeted by Indonesian forces during the invasion are responsible for the consequences of these actions, including the detention, torture and killing of those who were identified.

Principal findings on the responsibility of the KOTA and Trabalhista parties

61. Although members of the Trabalhista and KOTA parties were not identified as direct perpetrators of a large number of violations, they did play a role in supporting the Indonesian invasion and occupation, and therefore contributed to the mass violations committed by members of the Indonesian security forces. By taking up arms in the "Partisan" force, members of these parties are also responsible for contributing to the Indonesian military invasion and occupation.

62. Members of Trabalhista and KOTA also contributed to the formulation and signing of the Balibó Declaration which helped to provide a veneer of legitimacy to the illegal Indonesian occupation and annexation of Timor-Leste.

Methodology for identification of institutional responsibility

63. A total of 85,164 human rights violations were reported to the Commission through its statement-taking process. Each violation recorded in the statements of victims or witnesses was entered into the Commission's database. The identity of the perpetrator, the institution to which he or she belonged, and when, where and how the violation was committed were also recorded. By combining this information, the Commission was able to generate data on, for example, the scale of violations by type and the perpetrator groups most often identified as responsible for violations. It could also break down these categories further to yield data on trends and patterns of violations, their perpetrators and victims over time and space.

64. Aside from this quantitative information derived from the database, the Commission also collected a large amount of qualitative information, including the detailed accounts of events provided by witnesses and victims in statements and interviews, and secondary sources. Much of this qualitative evidence is contained in volumes 2 and 3 of the Report which are devoted to specific types of violation.

65. Table 3 (All reported violations, 1974–1999, between par. 70-71) summarises the total number of reported violations according to the institutional identity of the perpetrators. There are separate tables for each type of violation, including the total number and percentage of reported cases of illegal killings, torture, rape and other violations attributed to the Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries, Fretilin/Falintil, UDT and Apodeti. Each of these tables is accompanied by another table which gives a breakdown of the data for different components of the Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries. This table provides figures for the Indonesian military and police acting alone, for East Timorese auxiliaries (such as Hansip and militia groups) acting alone, and for the total reported cases in which the identified perpetrators were Indonesian military and police acting together with East Timorese auxiliaries. A separate set of tables has been produced which includes only data relating to violations reported to have been committed in 1999.

66. Annexe 2 to this Part entitled Command Responsibility, lists the military and other units most commonly identified in the database as perpetrators of violations and, where the information is available, their commanders and senior officers. Because of the limitations of the statement-taking process (see Vol. I, Part 6: Profile of human rights violations), this analysis does not purport to identify definitively the units and individuals which committed the largest number of serious human rights violations. However, based on the totality of the evidence available to it, both quantitative and qualitative, the Commission believes that these units did commit large-scale violations and that where it has been possible to identify their commanders and senior officers, they should be held accountable for these actions.

67. In relation to the data in all tables, perpetrator groups are exclusive. That is, each violation is attributed to one and only one category of institutional perpetrator.

68. The following table presents a summary of the institutional affiliation of perpetrators of human rights violations reported to the Commission, based on the identification provided by the witnesses and victims who provided statements. A similar table dealing specifically with reported violations committed in 1999 appears later in this Part, in the section which deals with the responsibility of the Indonesian security forces for the violations committed in 1999.

Perpetrator identification in the human rights violations database

69. Analysis of the 85,164 reported violations according to the institutional affiliation of the perpetrators leads to the following broad conclusions:

- Members of the Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries were responsible for the overwhelming majority of all categories of violations committed during all periods following the invasion. They were identified as the perpetrators in 84.4% (71,917/85,164) of the total violations reported to the Commission.

- Members of ABRI/TNI and the police were the categories of perpetrator responsible for the most violations.
- East Timorese members of auxiliary forces, including Hansip and the militias, which were almost entirely armed, funded and controlled by the Indonesian military, were also responsible for a large number of violations, although less than ABRI/TNI. Reports of violations by the auxiliary forces were proportionally much higher in 1999 than other periods of the conflict.
- After representatives of the Indonesian security forces, members of Fretilin/Falintil were identified as next largest perpetrator group, although the number of violations they are reported to have committed is much smaller than those reportedly committed by agents of the Indonesian security forces. Members of Fretilin/Falintil were identified as perpetrators in 9.8% (8,306/85,164) of the total violations reported to the Commission.
- Most reported violations by members of Fretilin/Falintil took place during the internal party conflict of 1975 and the years immediately following.
- The proportion of violations committed by members of UDT was significant during and after the period of the internal armed conflict in August 1975.
- The number of reported violations committed by UDT is substantially lower than those reported to have been committed by Fretilin/Falintil. UDT members were identified as perpetrators in 2.5% (2,151/85,164) of the total number of cases reported to the Commission.
- There were very few violations committed by Fretilin/Falintil or any other pro-independence group during 1999.

Responsibility and accountability of the Indonesian security forces

> In every village there was and still is a prison and every day five to ten people are tortured, burned with cigarettes, systematically electrocuted with high voltage electricity, or become victims of the Nanggala killer knives. They pull out fingernails and squeeze testicles with pliers. They put the victims' fingers under the leg of a table, and the killer Red Berets sit on top of it. All this during interrogation to get information about people's organisations in concentration camps. Then [there are] the killings. Mass shooting executions, with the victims dying in front of the graves they dig themselves. Or they die drowned in a barrel full of water. The victims' families then are told that they "have gone to Jakarta to study". Then, as if all this was not enough, the women of the struggle or the slaughtered victims' wives, are taken for interrogation at night. They have to submit, under death threats, to pleasure the Nanggala, police, Koramil, Kodim, because these women are accused of having connections with Fretilin. The captured strugglers and Fretilin members are interrogated to gain information about the Resistance with the most brutal tortures till they die, after which they are tied to the back of a vehicle and dragged around the village while the villagers are forced to watch and "welcome Fretilin's visit to the village". The women captured in the forest cannot avoid [the perpetration of] criminal acts [against them]. They are stripped naked, their hair shaved, and are told to walk among the people standing in line and forced to humiliate them.

Evidence relied on in this section

70. In addition to the almost 8,000 statements and 85,164 reported violations, the Commission conducted interviews with witnesses, including persons who served with the Indonesian military, police and civil administration, and members of auxiliaries such as Hansip and the militia groups. Secondary materials, including official Indonesian military documents, were also consulted.

Unlawful killings and enforced disappearances

71. The Commission has found that approximately 18,600 unlawful killings and enforced disappearances of East Timorese non-combatants were perpetrated between 1974 and 1999. The overwhelming majority, 70%, were committed by the Indonesian security forces, including East Timorese auxiliaries.* The nature and scale of these killings and disappearances changed over time in step with the different phases of the Indonesia's occupation, reaching peak levels in 1978–1979, 1983–1984 and 1999. However, the Commission has found that the Indonesian military's consistent resort to killings and disappearances throughout the occupation and the impunity enjoyed by those responsible for them indicate that they were an integral part of its strategy for enforcing its control of the territory of Timor-Leste through the instrument of terror.

Terror and impunity

72. In attempting to overcome resistance to the occupation ABRI/TNI made strategic use of terror to force the population into submission. It did so by directing and allowing personnel to be involved in horrific acts committed against any person suspected of being affiliated with the Resistance.

73. In every culture, particularly among members of institutions entrusted with employing physical force over others, there are individuals who derive personal gratification through the exercise of this power over defenceless victims. The commanders and senior leaders of ABRI/TNI allowed horrific practices to go unpunished and encouraged the development of an institutional culture in which torture, rape and arbitrary execution came to be accepted as standard operating procedure. Throughout the period of occupation (1975–1999) methods and circumstances in which representatives of the Indonesian security forces committed unlawful killings included:

- A common practice of slow killing of detainees by leaving them naked and alone, without sufficient food and water, in totally dark cells, following repeated and prolonged torture
- Killing prisoners in military custody by repeated and severe beatings and prolonged torture
- Execution of unarmed civilians by close-range shooting
- Random, indiscriminate shooting of unarmed groups of civilians
- Targeted killing of suspects from lists drawn up by military personnel
- Execution of detainees in detention centres, and in isolated places in the countryside, including in lakes, ravines and from bridges

- Immediate execution after capture during military operations
- Ordering of victims to dig their own grave before execution
- Ordering of victims to line up in formation, before line by line execution
- Dividing groups of unarmed civilians by sex, and then executing the men
- Throwing of grenades at unarmed groups of civilians
- Throwing live persons from cliffs, sometimes after being wounded
- Forcing of persons to kill other civilians, under severe duress and threats to their own lives
- Rape and sexual torture of female victims before executing them
- Tying victims to a moving vehicle and publicly dragging them along the ground until they were dead
- Burning people alive
- Burying people alive
- Tying up victims to a cross and then executing them
- Displaying human ears and genitals to family members of the disappeared.

74. As an element in the creation of terror the execution of opponents was sometimes carried out in public. The fact that such executions could take place repeatedly in public places provides strong evidence that the practices were systematic and an accepted practice within the Indonesian military institution. They were either ordered or condoned by the senior levels of command, and officers could torture and kill political opponents openly without any due process or apparent reason, and without fear of being held accountable in any way. Some of the examples of public executions which witnesses reported to the Commission were:

- Beating victims to death in public
- Public beheading with an axe
- Publicly cutting off body parts of victims while still alive
- Public display of decapitated head, or severed limbs or body parts
- Public execution of a married couple, in which both were stripped naked, then hit on the back of the neck, knocking them into a grave that had already been dug
- Parading of corpses in public.

Illegal killings related to military operations

Illegal killings before the invasion of Timor-Leste

75. Before the full-scale invasion of Timor-Leste on 7 December 1975 Special Forces (Kopassandha) units of ABRI armed and trained East Timorese members of Apodeti and UDT in West Timor (Indonesia), designating them "Partisans". Indonesian troops and Partisans conducted covert military operations in the territory of Timor-Leste between August and December 1975, during which they unlawfully killed dozens of civilians in Bobonaro, Covalima and Ermera Districts. The Commission finds that the Government of Indonesia, the institution of ABRI/TNI, individual Kopassandha officers and men and Partisans involved are responsible and accountable for the deaths of those civilians.

Illegal killings and arbitrary executions during the invasion

76. The invasion of Timor-Leste was a violation of international law regulating the permissible use of armed force.* Not only was the fact that Indonesia forcibly invaded the territory a serious violation, but also the manner in which it was conducted involved mass violations against civilians, prisoners, the sick and wounded. Members of ABRI did not limit their attacks to those who resisted the occupation or were armed combatants. They specifically targeted unarmed civilians and failed to differentiate between civilian and military targets during this operation and the following efforts to subdue the population.

77. In the capital, Dili, on 7–8 December 1975 Indonesian soldiers executed scores of civilians, including women, in areas of the city which had been actively defended against the armed Indonesian invasion. These areas were Colmera, Vila Verde, Matadouro, along the Maloa River and Ailok Laran. They also targeted captured Fretilin members and their relatives and executed several of them on the day after the invasion.

78. The Commission received many reports of Indonesian forces killing civilians as they advanced into other parts of the territory during 1976–1978. Sometimes those killed had been denounced as members of Fretilin, but many of the victims of these killings were randomly targeted members of the civilian population. Ordinary civilians were targeted in a variety of other circumstances: while looking for food or going about their daily activities, when encountered by Indonesian security forces on operations, in retaliation for Falintil attacks, and on suspicion of having contact with or having knowledge about Fretilin/Falintil.

79. The Commission has found that while engaged in offensives against Fretilin/Falintil bases and attacks on their positions and in the aftermath of such operations Indonesian security forces killed civilians and others not engaged in combat, including surrendered and captured combatants. The majority of reports of this nature which it received related to the period 1977–1979, when many of those who had fled to the mountains and came into the custody of the Indonesian forces through surrender or capture were summarily executed. Some of those who were executed were members of Fretilin and Falintil, who had surrendered after receiving personal assurances from ABRI personnel, other members of the Indonesian security apparatus or members of the civil administration that they would be safe on the basis of an amnesty offered first announced by President Soeharto in November 1977 and subsequently renewed.

80. The Commission received information indicating that violations of this kind continued to be committed after that time. For example, the Commission has found that in September 1981, at the conclusion of the Operasi Kikis of June-September 1981, Battalions 321, 744 and/or 745, Marine Units, and Hansip attacked Falintil forces who had gathered in the area of Mount Aitana on the Manatuto-Viqueque border and subsequently executed more than one hundred and, possibly several hundred, Falintil troops and civilians, including women and children, who were accompanying them. At the time that they were killed these victims were either at the mercy of Indonesian forces or in their custody after surrender or capture.

* The principles of international law relied on by the Commission are included in Vol. I, Part 2: Mandate of the Commission.

Systematic killings and disappearances of targeted individuals and groups

81. During the early years of the occupation, but in particular in 1978–1979 and in 1983–1984, ABRI commanders, troops and auxiliaries committed systematic and widespread unlawful killings and enforced disappearances of persons who had been active members of the Resistance and persons suspected of having clandestine contacts with members of Fretilin/Falintil still fighting.

82. In most of these incidents the Indonesian security forces spread their net extremely wide to the point that it is often not easy to distinguish instances of targeted killings from the instances of collective and proxy punishment described below.

83. After the attacks in Dili on 10 June 1980, for example, those who were arrested, some of whom were among the 121 persons reported to the Commission as having subsequently been killed or disappeared, were persons who had taken part in the attacks; persons known to have played an active role in the Resistance before their surrender or capture but who are believed not to have taken part in the attacks; persons who had a supportive role in preparing for the attacks but who did not participate directly in them; persons who may have still have been active in the Resistance but who did not play any role in the attacks; and unfortunate bystanders such as persons who happened to have been on compulsory guard duty in places near where the attacks took place on the night of 9–10 June. The Commission notes that under international human rights and humanitarian law the right to life of all categories of non-combatant is absolute, and that therefore all unlawful killings and disappearances are illegal acts irrespective of the reason why the victim has been targeted. To the extent that it is possible to do so, it distinguishes between collective punishment and more discriminate forms of killings and disappearance not because one is more or less reprehensible than the other – both are equally reprehensible – but to establish grounds for accountability.

84. The Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries carried out a widespread and systematic campaign of killings and disappearances directed at surrendered and captured members of Fretilin and Falintil in February–June 1979. The Commission found that these killings and disappearances were carried out as part of a systematic plan, devised at the highest levels of the military command structure and coordinated by the newly-created Sub-Regional Command (Korem) for Timor-Leste under the command of then Colonel Adolf Sahala Radjagukguk, whose purpose was to eliminate surviving leaders and activists of the Resistance movement. It reaches this conclusion on the basis of a number of considerations, including the scale and widespread nature of the killings and disappearances, their known targets, their timing, the uniform treatment of the victims and other similarities in the methods used during the campaign across many districts, and the involvement of military units at all levels of the command structure.

85. After the breakdown of the ceasefire between Indonesian forces and the Resistance in March 1983 and the launch of Operasi Persatuan (Operation Unity), aimed at the total eradication of the Resistance, the Indonesian military targeted civilians involved in clandestine activity. The Commission received testimonies about the execution and disappearance of more than 250 civilians in the districts of Lautém, Viqueque, Baucau, Dili, Aileu, Manufahi, Ainaro, Bobonaro and Covalima between August 1983 and mid-1984 (excluding those killed in Viqueque in the immediate aftermath of the attack on Kraras), as well as the arrest, detention and torture and ill-treatment of many others.

86. While this campaign was avowedly aimed at breaking up clandestine Resistance networks, in practice it was both systematic and indiscriminate. The systematic nature of these executions is evident to the Commission from their scale and from documentary evidence received by the Commission that village chiefs and members of the civil defence forces were ordered to draw up lists of people who had been active in the Resistance in the past, which in some cases at least formed the basis for the violations that followed. In addition, as with the executions and disappearances of 1978–1979, the similar operation of 1983–1984 involved the mobilisation of a wide range of institutions within the security apparatus and the civil administration, including the Special Forces (Kopassus), all levels of the territorial structure, combat battalions, the civil defence forces, paramilitary teams, the civilian and military police, and local government officials.

87. Its indiscriminate nature is evident from what is known about some of the persons who were its victims. For example, the Commission learned that many of the approximately 40 individuals arrested in Bobonaro and Covalima who were then executed or disappeared from the Bobonaro Koramil in December 1983 had no connection with the Resistance other than a name similar to that of another person believed to have such a connection.

Collective and proxy punishment of civilians by ABRI/TNI

88. Throughout the occupation, but in particular in the early 1980s, ABRI commanders, troops and auxiliaries committed unlawful killings and enforced disappearances of civilians to punish communities collectively that were suspected of supporting Falintil forces. The indiscriminate punishment of persons known to have previously been involved with the resistance movement and the collective punishment of communities were particularly severe in the aftermath of Falintil attacks on military targets. The Commission finds that the illegal and immoral practices of proxy and collective punishment, targeting innocent victims for actions carried out by others who had evaded capture, was a central and systematic component of the Indonesian military strategy to overcome the resistance to the military occupation. ABRI/TNI commanders and troops carried out collective punishment directed at unarmed civilians in response to attacks by Falintil from the earliest days of the occupation.

Among the incidents reported were a number in which large numbers of civilians were detained and tortured, women raped, and unarmed civilians who themselves had not taken part in the attacks by Falintil were summarily executed or disappeared.

89. In the weeks after a Falintil-led attack on ABRI posts and facilities around Mau Chiga (Hato Builico) and Rotuto (Same, Manufahi) on 20 August 1982, ABRI and Hansip took massive retaliatory action aimed at punishing the whole population of Mau Chiga and surrounding villages. In the course of this operation the population, the vast majority of whom had not participated in the Falintil-led attack, suffered multiple violations of their rights, including detention, torture, rape and other sexual violations, forced displacement to the island of Ataúro and other places, and executions. At all of the sites to which the people of Mau Chiga were forcibly transported those detained were subjected to hunger as a form of collective punishment. The Commission compiled a list of approximately 120 people who died from hunger-related causes as collective punishment for attacks of 20 August 1982. At least 75 men from Mau Chiga were summarily executed by ABRI and civil defence forces between 1982 and 1987. Many of them were killed in the most brutal fashion, both publicly and at an execution site, called Jakarta 2, at Builico, near the town of Ainaro, where victims were hurled into a deep ravine. In a special project conducted by the Commission, it received extensive testimony that personnel from the Ainaro and Manufahi Kodims, the Dare Koramil, the 5th Combat Engineering Battalion (Zipur 5), and Hansip, including commanding officers, were implicated in these violations.

90. Following the attack by East Timorese Ratih (Civil Defence Force) in Kraras (Viqueque) on 8 August 1983, in which 12 Indonesian troops were killed, and their subsequent defection, the Indonesian security forces took reprisals against the population of the area in September–October 1983. These included a series of executions, including mass executions. In separate events reported to the Commissions around 270 people were killed in groups of up to 181. A wide range of military and auxiliary forces were reported to have perpetrated these executions, including members of Kodim 1630/ Viqueque, Battalions 328, 501 and 745, Special Forces (Kopassus) and Hansip.

91. After the defection of more than 30 armed members of Hansip, with their families and members of a clandestine youth group, in Mehara (Lautém) on 9 August 1983, smaller-scale defections in Leuro in Lospalos Sub-district and Serelau in Moro Sub-district, and the discovery of a plan for a similar action in Iliomar Sub-district, Indonesian military forces detained hundreds of men and women throughout the district, executing and causing the disappearances of many of them. According to information received by the Commission, between August and December 1983 at least 28 people were executed or disappeared in the sub-district of Iliomar and another 20 in the aldeias of the village of Mehara alone. Executions were frequently held in public; in several instances reported to the Commission members of the security forces compelled villagers to kill their fellow villagers publicly or in detention centres.

92. In later years civilians continued to be executed in reprisal for Falintil attacks. Examples include the killing of six civilians in Gariana (Maubara, Liquiçá) in January 1995 after a Falintil soldier being pursued by ABRI troops evaded capture and the killings in Alas and other parts of Manufahi District that followed Falintil attacks and executions in October–November 1998.

1985–1998: a continuing climate of impunity

93. In the period 1985–1998 the number of killings and disappearances committed by ABRI and its auxiliaries declined relative to the earlier years of the occupation. However, the Indonesian security forces continued to kill and cause the disappearance of civilians with real and suspected association to groups resisting the occupation, including members of Fretilin/Falintil, the clandestine networks and other pro-independence groups.

94. Although the number of fatal violations decreased, those that occurred could not be regarded as the exceptional acts of "rogue elements". A climate of impunity permitted practices such as the following to continue to occur with virtual impunity into the 1990s:

- Opening fire into a crowd of unarmed demonstrators, as at the Santa Cruz Cemetery in Dili on 12 November 1991
- The execution and disappearance of civilians in reprisal for Falintil attacks and execution, as occurred in Alas and other sub-districts of Manufahi in October–November 1998
- The execution of civilians in place of escaped combatants, as in Gariana (Maubara, Liquiçá) in January 1995
- The execution of civilians who were forcibly recruited to take part in military operations or exercises during military action
- Opening fire on a group of unsuspecting people or individuals carrying out daily activities, for no apparent reason.

95. Responding to international and domestic pressure, the Indonesian military conducted internal investigations and brought judicial proceedings against relatively junior personnel in at least two cases, following the Santa Cruz Massacre in Dili in 1991 and the killing of six civilians in Gariana (Maubara, Liquiçá) in 1995. In both cases court martial proceedings resulted in the low-ranking soldiers receiving light sentences, of between eight months and four years. The Commission found that these proceedings were not conducted in such a way as to establish accountability for those atrocities.

96. In 1999 the Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries conducted a coordinated and sustained campaign of violence designed to intimidate the pro-independence movement and ensure a pro-Indonesian result in the UN-organised Popular Consultation. Thousands of civilians were detained, hundreds of thousands were forcibly displaced, and 1,400-1,500 were killed or disappeared during the course of the year. The majority of fatal violations took place in April, before the signing of the 5 May Agreements, and in September–October, after the announcement of the result of the ballot.

97. The Commission found that during 1999 the TNI relied to a far greater extent than in earlier years on East Timorese auxiliaries, in this case militia groups, acting alone, to carry out its campaign against the civilian population. Although it was part of the TNI's strategy to encourage such an interpretation, this did not mean that that the TNI was not directly responsible for the actions of the militias, including the killings and disappearances they committed.

98. The Commission received overwhelming evidence that during 1999 the TNI, the police and militia groups acted in a coordinated manner. Military bases were openly used as militia headquarters, and military equipment, including firearms, were distributed to militia groups. Some TNI personnel were also militia commanders or members. TNI intelligence officers provided lists of the names of people to be targeted, and coordinated attacks. Civilian authorities openly provided state funding for militia groups and participated in militia rallies and other activities. And, the Commission found, on many occasions TNI personnel were directly involved with the militia in fatal attacks or carried out such attacks acting alone. Instances of such open involvement include:

- The attack on the Liquiçá Church on 6 April 1999, conducted by Besi Merah Putih militia, and troops from the local Kodim and Brimob (police mobile brigade), in which at least 30-60 civilians were killed.
- The retaliatory killing by Halilintar militia and TNI personnel of at least 20 civilians in the days following the alleged Falintil killing of a TNI soldier and a pro-autonomy leader in Cailaco Sub-district (Bobonaro) on 12 April 1999.
- The attack on Suai Church on 6 September 1999 by Laksaur militia and Indonesian security forces, in which at least 27 people, including three priests, were killed.
- The attacks in Dili on 5–6 September 1999 by Aitarak militia and Indonesian security forces on a number of buildings and complexes where civilians had taken refuge, and at least 19 civilians were killed or disappeared.
- The attacks on 8 September 1999 and succeeding days by Dadurus Merah Putih and other militias, under the command of Indonesian security forces, on persons who had sought safety in the Maliana police station (Bobonaro) and subsequently on those who had managed to flee the police station, in which at least 26 civilians were killed or disappeared.
- On 12 September 1999, Laksaur militia and Indonesian security forces, during an attempt to forcibly deport villagers from the village of Laktos, Fohorem (Covalima) killed 14 men who resisted being moved to West Timor.
- The random shootings by members of Battalion 745 during their retreat from Lospalos (Lautém) to Dili on 21–22 September 1999, in which at least eight people were killed.
- The execution of 12 persons around 20 October 1999 by Sakunar and Aitarak militia and Indonesian security forces during and after rounding up villagers from Maquelab (Pante Makassar, Oecussi) for deportation to West Timor.

Arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment

Introduction

99. The Commission finds that throughout the entire period from the Indonesian invasion in 1975 to the arrival of international peacekeepers in late September 1999 members of the Indonesian security forces arbitrarily detained thousands of East Timorese on a scale and in a manner that was widespread and systematic. The Commission also found that detainees were routinely tortured. The Commission received statements from witnesses and victims which reported 20,779 cases of arbitrary detention, 11,123 incidents of torture and 8,436 incidents of ill-treatment. Thousands more incidents of torture and ill-treatment were described by witnesses during interviews, in victims' hearings, community reconciliation hearings, community profile workshops and thematic public hearings conducted by the Commission.

100. The picture which emerges from the analysis of this information is clear and highly corroborated. The Commission finds that there was a systematic policy and practice within the Indonesian security forces, which extended to its highest levels, that condoned and encouraged the use of arbitrary detention and torture of East Timorese who were suspected of political opposition to the invasion and occupation of Timor-Leste. Analysis of all reported cases entered into the Commission's database demonstrates that arbitrary arrests, detention and torture occurred in all districts of Timor-Leste, although it was most common in Dili and markedly less frequent in Oecussi, and in every year from 1975 until 1999. One of the challenges for the Indonesian security forces in overcoming the Resistance was a lack of knowledge of who was actively part of the clandestine pro-independence movement. A tactic used to gain access to this information was to detain arbitrarily individuals or groups of people who were either themselves suspected of being connected in some way to the independence movement, or who had family members or lived in a community that was suspected of being pro-independence. Those detained would then often undergo the ordeals of torture and deprivation aimed at breaking their reluctance to provide information, or at convincing activist family members to cooperate.

Arbitrary detention

101. Of the 20,779 unique reports of arbitrary detention by members of the Indonesian security forces documented by the Commission, the victims were reported to have been subjected to torture or ill-treatment by members of the Indonesian forces in 19,559 cases. This mass of evidence has provided the Commission with a highly corroborated and reliable picture of the appalling treatment to which detainees were routinely subjected. These thousands of cases, which form the basis for the findings in this section, provide a strong and consistent account of the manner in which these violations were commonly carried out.

102. Arrest and detention were arbitrary in several respects. The Commission knows of no case in which persons who were arrested were informed of their rights, and it was rare for them to be told whether they were being charged, or why they were being detained. The Commission did not receive one account of a person who was detained being released on bail. Excessive force, including heavy beatings, was routinely used during the arrest of suspects. In most cases evidence implicating suspects in a crime was not presented to them, and they were often detained on the basis of information passed on by informants. In the absence of any real evidence against suspects they were then routinely tortured to try to make them confess or provide information.

Conditions of detention

103. The conditions in which those detained were kept were often deplorable. Prisoners frequently died of starvation and illness due to lack of clean water in their places of detention until the mid-1980s when the number of detainees declined and new state prisons were constructed to house those detained. Even after this time there were frequent reports of detainees being deprived of food for several days at a time or being given food that was unfit for human consumption.

104. Conditions in which detainees were commonly held included:

- Long periods of extreme hunger, during which the only food that was provided was intentionally inedible, being mixed with broken glass and animal faeces, badly burned or obviously rotten.
- Keeping prisoners naked for long periods of time. In some places of detention the practice was to keep prisoners naked or in their underwear, to heighten their sense of shame and vulnerability.
- Keeping prisoners in solitary confinement for long periods, sometimes of up to one year, without human contact.
- Detention centres, including prisons, police stations and military command headquarters, had "dark cells" into which prisoners would be placed. These cells had poor ventilation, no windows and no light.*
- Prisoners were often kept in small cells with no toilets and were not allowed outside their cells, forcing them to sit in their own excrement or that of other prisoners. This also applied to the "dark cells".

* The Commission's report on this public hearing is entitled Political Imprisonment, CAVR National Public Hearing, 17–18 February 2003.

105. These abhorrent conditions were often combined. Victims gave personal testimony to the Commission about their experience of being kept alone and naked in tiny "dark cells" in which there was absolutely no light, without toilet facilities and with food mixed with faeces and soapy water as their sole source of nourishment. The only time they were removed from these conditions was to be tortured by being subjected to electric shocks, beatings and other inhumane forms of treatment. In many cases these conditions were prolonged, causing the slow and excruciating physical collapse and death of the victim. The Indonesian security forces intentionally used a variety of specially designated centres to carry out interrogation and torture, some of which were specifically designed for the torture of victims. Often victims would be moved to a number of these sites during a single night, undergoing interrogation and torture at each, to increase their confusion, sense of isolation and vulnerability. Once held in detention, victims were liable to be passed from one branch of the intelligence services to another for interrogation. This tactic was routinely used to increase the sense of terror and vulnerability of the victim.

Torture and ill-treatment

106. The striking similarity in the treatment of those held in detention, across different locations in the territory and throughout the 24-year period of occupation, provides evidence of the systematic and widespread nature of these violations and the fact that they were institutionally tolerated and encouraged. It also indicates that the institutions of the Indonesian security forces applied these practices as a standard part of their operations in Timor-Leste. The Commission finds that the systematic use of torture by the Indonesian security forces amounted to crimes against humanity.

107. Torture is a violation of the rights of both combatants and civilians. The Commission has received reports of the torture of Falintil combatants by members of the Indonesian security forces. However it received a far greater number of reports of torture of civilians who were not part of the armed opposition.

108. The totality of the evidence considered by the Commission leads it to conclude that the purpose of this systematic use of torture was:

- To attempt to force civilians to provide information about others who might be involved in resisting the occupation
- To demonstrate the terrible punishment that would be summarily handed out to anyone who resisted the occupation
- To demonstrate that members of the Indonesian security forces could act in an arbitrary manner and with total impunity against the East Timorese population
- To demonstrate that the East Timorese people were in a totally subjugated, vulnerable and powerless situation with no means of defending their human rights and dignity, and that therefore they must accept the occupation
- To create pervasive conditions of terror among the population in order to force them not to resist the occupation.

109. In the case of persons who were going to be brought to trial, written confessions were often prepared before the interrogation of suspects began. The suspect was forced to sign the confession by the use of torture during the interrogation.

110. In addition to the use of physical torture, other methods, such as death threats against the victim and his or her family, and deprivation of sleep, food, water and sanitary facilities, were also employed. Often interrogations ran continuously over several days in order to break the victim's will.

Methods of torture

111. The types of torture which victims and witnesses reported to the Commission were strikingly uniform.

112. On the basis of extensive corroboration the Commission accepts that the following acts of torture and other cruel, inhumane and degrading treatment were commonly used by the Indonesian security forces:

- Beating with fists or with implements such as a wooden club or a branch, an iron bar, a rifle butt, chains, a hammer, a belt or electric cables
- Kicking, usually by torturers wearing military or police boots, including around the head and face
- Punching and slapping
- Whipping
- Cutting with a knife
- Placing the victim's toes under the leg of a chair or table and then having one or more people sit or jump on it
- Burning the victim's flesh with cigarettes or a gas lighter, including the victim's genitalia
- Applying electric shocks to the most sensitive parts of the victim's body, including his or her genitalia
- Firmly tying the victim's hands and feet and hanging him or her from a tree or roof
- Using water in various ways, including holding the victim's head under water; keeping a victim in a water tank for a prolonged period, sometimes for up to three days; soaking and softening a victim's skin in water before beating him or her; pouring very hot or very cold water over the victim; pouring very dirty water or sewage over the victim
- Sexual harassment, sexual forms of torture and ill-treatment, or rape while in detention. Women were the main victims of this kind of widespread abuse
- Cutting off a victim's ear or ears to mark the victim as a supporter of the Resistance
- Tying the victim behind a car and forcing him or her to run behind it or be dragged across the ground, sometimes until the victim died
- Placing lizards with sharp teeth and claws on the victim and then goading it to bite different parts of the victim's body
- Pulling out fingernails and toenails with pliers
- Running over a victim with a motor-bike
- Forcing a victim to drink a soldier's urine or eat non-food items such as live small lizards or dirty socks
- Leaving the victim in the hot sun for extended periods
- Humiliating detainees in front of their communities, for example by making them stand or walk through the town naked

- Torturing and mistreating a member of the victim's family in front of them, including their children.

113. In addition to the above methods, each of which was reported to have been committed in several cases, the Commission received reports directly from victims of many other forms of torture and cruel and inhumane treatment. The following methods of torture were reported by individual victims:
- Rubbing chillies in the victim's eyes
- Forcing the victim to carry a decapitated head around his village
- Beating two naked male victims while their genitals were tied together with wire
- Cutting off of the victim's ear and forcing him to eat it
- Tying the victim inside a sack filled with snakes
- Dousing a group of prisoners with petrol and threatening to burn them alive
- Tying a victim in a sack and burning him alive.

114. As well as physical abuse, detainees were also subject to mental and emotional torture and cruel, inhumane and degrading treatment. Methods commonly used included:
- Keeping prisoners in detention indefinitely without access to family and friends
- Keeping prisoners for extended periods in solitary confinement or in cells with no light and little ventilation
- Taking a detainee to a place used for extra-judicial executions and pretending to the victim that they were going to be killed, even to the point of firing a shot in the victim's direction
- Verbal abuse and insults
- Forcing victims to beat each other
- Torturing a family member in an adjoining room so that the victim could hear his or her screams, or torturing or threatening to torture a family member in front of the victim
- Blindfolding or placing a black cloth, helmet or bucket over a victim's head during interrogation and torture
- Using symbolism to humiliate and break the spirit of the victim, such as beating a detainee with a Portuguese or Fretilin flag, or tying victims to the flag-pole of an Indonesian flag
- Insulting a victim's religion such as by tearing off the victim's crucifix or tying the victim to a cross
- A team of interrogators spitting on the victim.

Rape, sexual slavery and other sexual violations

115. The Commission finds that during the period of the invasion and occupation of Timor-Leste, members of the Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries were involved in widespread and systematic rape, sexual torture and other acts of sexual violence committed against East Timorese women, which amounted to crimes against humanity.

116. The Commission bases this finding on its consideration of the testimony of over 850 individual victims or witnesses to rape, sexual torture and sexual slavery. Most of the evidence in relation to rape, sexual slavery and other sexual violations was given during in-depth interviews with victims. These interviews were undertaken under a cooperative arrangement with the East Timorese non-governmental women's rights organisation Fokupers, due to its expertise and experience in dealing with female victims of sexual assault.

117. The Commission considers the evidence of the victims to be especially reliable and compelling, because it was provided despite the significant personal and emotional cost involved in recounting such horrific experiences and because giving such evidence might well result in the social stigmatisation of the victim.

118. The Commission also considers it likely that because of the personal and social consequences many other victims who suffered similar experiences did not come forward to recount them to the Commission. On the basis of the interviews it did conduct, the likelihood of under-reporting and the strongly corroborated patterns of widespread and systematic rape, conducted openly and with impunity, the Commission considers that the more than 850 victims and witnesses who did give testimonies represent a much larger number who did not come forward.

119. The actual reports of cases of sexual violations reported directly by victims and witnesses to the Commission are summarised in the following tables.

Sexual violence inside Indonesian military installations

120. On the basis of the hundreds of first-hand accounts provided by victims, the Commission finds that the following acts directed at East Timorese women took place inside official Indonesian military installations:

- The repeated rape of women detainees by several members of the Indonesian security forces. In some cases women victims stated that they could not count the number of men who raped them. Victims who gave evidence at the Commission's National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict stated that they were raped by different military officers every day during months of detention.
- Gang rape by members of the Indonesian security forces both inside and outside official military installations.
- The rape of women who had their hands and feet handcuffed and were blindfolded. In some cases women bound in this way were raped until they were unconscious.
- The mutilation of women's sexual organs, including cutting with knives, inserting sticks and bayonets into vaginas and burning nipples and genitals with cigarettes.
- The application of electric shocks to genitals, breasts and mouths.
- Forcing detainees to engage in sexual acts with each other, while watched and ridiculed by members of the security forces.
- The common practice of keeping lists of local women who could be ordered to come to the military post or headquarters so that soldiers could rape them. Lists were traded between commanders. In some cases these women were commanded to appear at the military post every morning in order to be raped by members of the security forces.
- The rape of detainees following periods of prolonged sexual torture.
- The rape of pregnant women. The Commission received repeated evidence of this, including one account in which a woman was raped only hours before she gave birth.
- Forcing victims to appear naked or to be sexually violated in front of strangers, friends and family members. In one case a woman was raped in front of her mother and later killed. More commonly victims were raped and tortured in front of their children.
- Women raped in the presence of fellow prisoners as a means of terrorising both the victims and the other prisoners.
- Placing women in tanks of water for prolonged periods, including submerging their heads, before being raped.
- The use of snakes to instil terror in naked women during sexual torture.
- Threats issued to women that their children would be killed or tortured if they resisted or complained about being raped.
- Insertion of objects, such as large batteries into a victim's vagina or anus.
- Insertion of guns and bayonets into victim's vagina or anus.

- Forced oral sex, constituting rape.
- Urinating into the mouths of victims.
- Rape and sexual violence indiscriminately inflicted on married women, unmarried women and young teenage girls.

121. The number of rapes and other forms of sexual violence was related to the patterns and intensity of military activity at the time. Sexual violations increased dramatically at times when major military operations were being conducted, and decreased when such operations were less frequent. For example, 64% of sexual slavery reported to the Commission took place during periods of large-scale Indonesian military operations.

Rape of women who had surrendered or been captured

122. Women who had surrendered or been arrested or captured by the Indonesian security forces in connection with resistance activities were particularly vulnerable to rape and sexual torture. The mass arrests following the civil uprisings between 1981 and 1983 led to increases in the number of women who were raped or placed into situations of sexual slavery by members of the security forces.

123. Women who had surrendered were forced to take part in military operations, usually to cook or to perform other services. In some cases, women were subjected to torture, rape and sexual slavery during their participation in these military operations.

124. Women were among tens of thousands of East Timorese civilians who were forcibly recruited for civil defence activities and made to patrol around their villages. During these patrols, supervised by armed members of the Indonesian security forces, women were commonly raped or sexually harassed.

125. The large-scale violence during 1999 led to a significant increase in the number of women who were raped. Those who had become displaced or who were refugees were particularly vulnerable. These acts of sexual violence were perpetrated by members of the militia groups, the TNI or in some cases members of both of these groups acting together.

Sexual slavery

126. Throughout the occupation it was common practice for members of the Indonesian security forces to force East Timorese women into situations of sexual slavery. These activities were conducted openly, without fear of being held to account, inside military installations, at other official sites and inside the private homes of the women who were targeted often in the presence of parents, children and other family members.

127. It was common practice for members of the Indonesian security forces to keep East Timorese women in detention on military bases for reasons which had no legitimate military objective. These women, who were sometimes detained for many months and sometimes years, were often raped daily or on demand by the officer who controlled them, as well as by other soldiers who saw them as easy targets. In addition they were forced to do menial domestic work.

128. The victims of this form of sexual slavery were not free to move about or travel, or to act independently in any way. It was common for the "ownership rights" over these women to be passed on from an officer who was finishing his tour of duty to his replacement or another officer. In some situations women forced into these situations became pregnant and gave birth to children several times by a number of different officers during the years in which they were the victims of sexual slavery.

129. In general Indonesian officers who were responsible for fathering these children through rape or situations of sexual slavery did not accept responsibility for the children's support or their material well-being.

Impunity for perpetrators of rape, sexual torture and sexual slavery

130. The practice of procuring, raping and torturing women was conducted openly, without fear of any form of sanction, by senior military officers, civilian officials, junior ranking officers, police officers, teachers and members of the auxiliary groups such as Hansip and the militias. When victims of sexual violence or persons representing their families complained to the legal authorities about what had taken place, their requests for help were generally met with denial and aggression. In some cases family members who complained were beaten and otherwise punished for doing so.

131. The participation in and acceptance of such practices by military commanders and civilian officials, the widespread knowledge that rape and sexual torture was officially condoned, the use of military and official facilities for these purposes, and the almost total impunity for offenders led to a situation where such practices could be undertaken by members of the security forces at will. This led to an increase in sexual violence in the years following the invasion, and expanding participation by officers of lower rank and members of auxiliary forces such as Hansip and the militias, operating under the control and protection of the security forces. In some cases members of Hansip or low-ranking local civilian officials would forcibly procure women and pass them on to the military commanders in return for increased status and rewards.

132. The scope and nature of the violations which were being committed and the complete impunity enjoyed by all classes of perpetrators was well-known at all levels of the security forces and civil administration during the occupation. They could not have enjoyed this impunity without the knowledge and complicity of senior members of the Indonesian security forces, the police and the civilian administration.

133. Indonesian police officers were also involved in torture and rape, but to a significantly lesser extent than military personnel. Police officers enjoyed the same general impunity for sexual violations as was extended to other members of the security forces.

134. Incidents in which members of the Indonesian security forces were involved in the rape of males, including forced oral sex, and in other sexual violations against East Timorese male prisoners and other civilians, also occurred. The incidence of this type of violation was far less frequent than for East Timorese women.

135. In his evidence before the Commission the former Governor of East Timor, Mario Carrascalão, stated that it was accepted among military commanders and government officials that they could rape young East Timorese women at will, and that women were passed around between different commanders and officials. He told of occasions when senior military commanders asked him to choose any of the young women who were attending an official function and to take them away and rape them as he desired. He refused the invitation. Mario Carrascalão stated that this kind of behaviour was common, and was institutionally accepted.[6]

136. In many cases Indonesian military personnel threatened to kill or torture other members of their families or community if a desired woman did not make herself available as a sexual slave. In these cases community representatives and family members were in effect faced with an impossible choice of between allowing the woman to be repeatedly violated and suffering even worse consequences, such as the torture and killing of other members of the community, if they refused.

Responsibility for famine and displacement during the 1970s and 1980s

Introduction

137. The Commission has found that during the late 1970s and the early 1980s, massive displacement of civilians occurred in the territory of Timor-Leste. This was a major factor contributing to the creation of a famine and the death by deprivation of more than 100,000 East Timorese people.

138. The Commission finds that during the late 1970s the Indonesian military forces implemented a strategy containing the following elements:

- The heavy bombardment from land, sea and air of areas where members of the Resistance and the civilian population living with them were thought to be based
- The destruction of food sources
- Forcing people who had been captured or surrendered after living in Fretilin-controlled areas into settlements and restricted areas under military control
- Failing to provide sufficient food to these people to keep them alive
- Forcibly preventing them from moving freely in search of food
- Refusing repeated requests from international aid organisations to provide food to those who were starving.

139. These were the components of a strategy that resulted in the deaths of tens of thousands of East Timorese civilians.

140. The Commission considers that in pursuing this strategy Indonesia violated many of its obligations under international humanitarian law and bears state responsibility for the deaths of these civilians. It also considers that members of the Indonesian armed forces and government officials committed war crimes and crimes against humanity in formulating and implementing policies which caused mass starvation and death.

Responsibility for massive civilian displacement

141. During the initial invasion of Timor-Leste in 1975 and early 1976, thousands of civilians fled their homes to escape the actual or expected arrival of the Indonesian military. More East Timorese fled as Indonesian forces moved into other parts of the territory. The Commission has found that terror among civilians was brought about not only by the fact of the invasion itself, but by news of massacres and executions carried out by ABRI and the use of grossly disproportionate force that targeted the armed resistance and civilians indiscriminately. In this context it was entirely foreseeable that a substantial portion of the East Timorese civilian population would flee from the invasion.

142. The Commission considers that Indonesia must bear responsibility for the massive displacements that resulted from its invasion and gradual occupation of the East Timorese territory. The displacement of a significant portion of the population was a direct and foreseeable consequence of the means of warfare employed by ABRI, including its attacks on civilians.

143. Many of the civilians who fled their homes during the initial invasion and sought refuge in Fretilin base areas were subjected to a repetition of this process when those bases were targeted by Indonesian forces, often using massively disproportionate and indiscriminate forms of attack. During this period some Fretilin leaders forced their followers not to surrender to the Indonesian authorities, and they share responsibility for the consequences of their actions. Many who remained in the mountains, hiding from the Indonesian troops, perished from hunger and disease. In the light of what had happened to those who had already surrendered and their own treatment when they themselves eventually surrendered, it is unclear, however, whether they would have fared better had they surrendered.

144. The Commission has found that when civilians did leave Falintil-protected areas and "surrendered" to Indonesian forces they were in most cases forced into camps and tightly-supervised settlements in an attempt to prevent them having any association or contact with the Resistance. Many were forced to live in such camps for several years. Security was tight, particularly in areas where Falintil forces were thought to be present, and people were forbidden to travel, other than within a small perimeter close to the camps. They were therefore unable to search for food.

145. From the early 1980s the Indonesian authorities introduced new forms of displacement. On the one hand they dismantled most of the resettlement camps that had been established in the late 1970s; on the other hand they were faced with the reality that a reorganised Resistance was now capable of launching localised attacks on ABRI, often with clandestine support from within the villages.

146. Those moved out of the resettlement camps were sent to heavily militarised strategic villages, to newly-created villages, often in areas that were not sufficiently fertile to support them, back to their own villages, or especially if they had relatives still with the Resistance, to the island of Ataúro. In all of these situations living conditions continued to be hard. Each aspect of the programme was still guided by military objectives. Even those settled in fertile areas found that restrictions on their freedom of movement continued to have a serious impact on food production and thus on their well-being. For those interned on Ataúro, the majority of whom were women and children, life on the barren island was difficult, particularly in the early years before the ICRC was permitted to operate there, and many died.

147. In addition to moving people out of the resettlement camps, the Indonesian authorities also displaced people in some way thought to be connected to Falintil-led attacks and uprisings, such as those in Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro) and Rotuto (Same, Manufahi) around Mount Kablaki in August 1982 and the levantamentos in Kraras (Viqueque) and Lautém District in August 1983. These displacements amounted to the collective punishment of whole communities and the proxy punishment of relatives of people still fighting in the forest and mountains. Some of those detained in these circumstances were also sent to Ataúro. Others were displaced from their home villages and sent to areas where they had to rebuild their lives virtually unaided in extremely inhospitable environments. This was the fate of many of the inhabitants of the villages in Ainaro and Manufahi that took part in the Kablaki uprising of August 1982 and of the mainly women survivors of the mass executions that followed the Kraras (Viqueque) uprising in August 1983. The latter group were sent to the previously uninhabited area of Lalerek Mutin where they were left to fend for themselves under tight military surveillance. The population of Lalerek Mutin suffered sexual violations, disappearances, hunger, disease and death there. Their treatment was strikingly similar to that of the people from Ainaro who had been moved to the villages of Raifusa and Dotik the previous year.

148. Responsibility for these various forms of displacement and their consequences must be borne entirely by the Indonesian authorities who designed and implemented the policies. The Commission rejects any suggestion that they were carried out for the benefit or protection of the civilian population. Indonesian military documents reveal that the overriding concern was to deprive Resistance fighters of the support of the local population (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine). In addition, displacements were intended to weaken the will of the population to resist the occupation and to move civilians to places where they could more easily be controlled. The manner in which these displacements were conducted leads the Commission to conclude that the effect of the displacement on the well-being of those moved was inconsequential to the Indonesian military forces. Their only concern was to crush the Resistance by removing its support base no matter what the human cost.

149. The Commission finds that the Indonesian civilian and military authorities are responsible for the forced displacement of hundreds of thousands of East Timorese civilians during the late 1970s and early 1980s and are therefore accountable for the consequences of these actions which were reasonably foreseeable at the time.

Responsibility for famine and deaths by deprivation

150. From 1976 to 1978 the Indonesian armed forces systematically destroyed or removed food crops, food stores, agricultural implements, gardens and fields, and livestock belonging to East Timorese people who had fled from their homes and villages.

The Commission received hundreds of consistent accounts of witnesses who told of their fields being burned by Indonesian soldiers, herds of animals being slaughtered, food stocks burned, water sources poisoned, and the destruction of wild food sources.

151. These actions were taken with the intention of punishing those suspected of supporting the Resistance, forcing the population which was dependent on this food to move into areas where they could be controlled and to ensure that no food was available to the Resistance.

152. Between late 1977 and late 1978 the effect of driving large segments of the East Timorese population from their homes and the destruction of food sources, as well as bombing campaigns that prevented them growing food crops in the interior where they had sought shelter from the invading army, had produced a situation of famine. Death from hunger and associated weakness began to occur on a large scale among those who had been displaced. These conditions were most prevalent among people constantly on the move because they were being harried by Indonesian forces and among those driven in large numbers into circumscribed areas where encirclement by Indonesian forces effectively prohibited further movement, even in search of food.

153. The Commission has examined rainfall records and other climatic data in considering whether there was an El Niño effect which could have caused severe food shortages at this time. These records show that in fact there was not a major fluctuation in rainfall causing severe drought. It is clear to the Commission that the famine was the direct result of Indonesian military policy and activities, and was not caused by drought or other conditions due to natural causes.

154. The starving were faced with an impossible choice between starvation in these remote areas or surrender to forces which they knew had tortured and killed large numbers of those who had entrusted themselves to their custody. Eventually many chose to surrender but not before tens of thousands of them had died.

155. Tens of thousands or people who had been forcibly displaced, or who had emerged from the mountains and forests to surrender to Indonesian forces, were placed in secured camps and restricted areas under the control of the military. The defining feature of these camps was insufficient food for detainees to survive and a prohibition on detainees moving around to search for food.

156. Already in a weakened state when they entered the camps, internees endured extended periods without access to food gardens or emergency humanitarian aid. The food that they received from the military was utterly inadequate to keep them alive. It was also often inappropriate for people already suffering severe malnutrition. Even the meagre rations that the military made available to camp inmates were distributed in a discriminatory way. In exchange for food the military and their auxiliaries extorted money, family heirlooms and other valuables, and sexual favours.

157. Reports of famine began to reach international relief agencies as early as April 1977, prompting requests to the Government of Indonesia from the agencies to enter the territory. A high-level visit by nine foreign ambassadors in September 1978 to resettlement camps in Timor-Leste increased international awareness of the need for a major humanitarian aid programme. The Government of Indonesia continued to refuse requests from the international aid agencies to supply food to those who were starving to death.

158. The scale of the famine in mid- to late 1979 and the fact that it was rapidly worsening can be seen in international aid agency reports of the time. For example, as a result of its survey in April 1979 US Catholic Relief Services estimated that 200,000 people were in a "serious or critically malnourished condition". By September 1979 it found that the number of people in this condition was closer to 300,000. The International Red Cross described 60,000 out of the 75,000 people it surveyed in July 1979 as being "in a state of alarming malnutrition" including "20,000 dying from hunger".

159. The Government of Indonesia refused permission for any international humanitarian aid agencies to operate inside Timor-Leste from the day of its invasion on 7 December 1975 until late 1979. There can be no doubt that the Indonesian military authorities in Timor-Leste were aware of the rising death toll due to famine in the camps under its control.

160. From at least late 1976 the Government of Indonesia allowed food aid to reach the people and camps under its control through the Indonesian Red Cross and the Catholic Church. All reports to the Commission show this aid was far too little or too late to prevent famine in the camps between 1977 and 1979. The efforts of the Catholic Church to provide more aid and to handle or monitor its distribution were systematically frustrated.

161. The refusal by the Government of Indonesia to permit international aid programmes, and to limit aid to inadequate amounts delivered by the Indonesian Red Cross and a modest supply from the Catholic Church, was clearly related to the same policies which had led to the Indonesian security forces to cause the displacement of the population, destroy their food sources, intern them in camps and not allow them to move to grow or search for food. All of these actions were undertaken with the goal of overcoming resistance to Indonesian occupation, using whatever methods were available irrespective of whether they were inhumane or in violation of international law or domestic law.

162. If international aid agencies had been given access to the starving they could have quickly prevented the occurrence of thousands of deaths. The Commission finds that the refusal to allow international aid to be delivered to those threatened with starvation was because the Indonesian military did not want any witnesses or impediments to its military campaign to bring the population under its control and weaken the Resistance.

163. The decisions to permit the Catholic Relief Services and the International Committee of the Red Cross to carry out surveys in Timor-Leste, in April and July 1979, and then to allow the agencies' operations to begin only in September 1979, were not because by that time the scale of the famine had reached massive proportions – that had already been known many months earlier. What had changed by September 1979 was that the Indonesian military believed that the campaign to destroy the Resistance was essentially over. In the period between the initial requests and the final approval tens of thousands of East Timorese civilians had starved to death, both inside and outside the camps.

164. The international aid operation that began in late 1979 reached most of the population in the camps and others in need. It effectively ended the famine conditions prevailing across Timor-Leste.

165. The Commission received evidence from East Timorese people who had worked with the international aid agencies, from Church representatives and from the intended recipients of the aid, that relief aid was routinely diverted from its supposed target, either to be sold for personal gain or to be used for personal consumption.

Conclusion

166. In considering the responsibility of the Indonesian civilian and military authorities for the deaths of at least 100,000 East Timorese people from starvation and hunger-related disease during the period of the conflict but particularly during the late 1970s, the Commission considered the following facts, all of which were substantiated by hundreds of corroborated witness statements, interviews and secondary documents:

1. Between 1976 and 1979 members of the Indonesian military forces deliberately destroyed large quantities of food crops, slaughtered herds of animals, destroyed wild food sources, and moved large sections of the East Timorese population who were dependent on these food sources into situations in which their lives were entirely under the control of the Indonesian military forces.
2. Those detained were not provided with sufficient food for them to survive and they were forcibly prevented from moving around to grow or search for additional food.
3. The Indonesian military must have had access to large quantities of food from government food stocks. They did not distribute this food to those under their care and control.
4. When it became obvious that large numbers of civilians were dying from hunger, there was no change in these practices – the military still did not supply sufficient food to those who were starving.
5. When international agencies requested permission to deliver large quantities of food, which would have prevented significant further deaths, they were refused.

167. The Commission is convinced that those on the ground who directed and conducted military operations that directly caused food shortages must have been aware that mass hunger would follow and indeed intended for this to happen. Such individuals deliberately used hunger as a military tactic to neutralise active civilian support for Fretilin. The Commission holds them directly accountable for creating famine conditions to achieve military ends.

168. The Commission is satisfied that the repercussions of Indonesia's military operations were also clearly foreseeable to its military and political leadership at national level. Those leaders are therefore responsible and accountable for these actions and their consequences.

169. The Commission, however, does not need to rely on reasonable foreseeability alone in holding the Indonesian leaders responsible because at some point the Indonesian leadership did indeed gain direct knowledge of the catastrophic circumstances unfolding in Timor-Leste. Once military operations were well under way, Indonesia's national military and political leadership would have received regular reports and updates from field commanders. However the causes of the famine were represented in these reports, whether as the result of drought, the already dire condition of the people who came down from the mountains or insufficient food supplies in the camps, the Commission believes that they must have conveyed the fact that thousands of people were starving, particularly in the light of increasing international concern.

170. At least from 1977 international aid agencies began requesting permission to enter Timor-Leste to provide relief. The Diocese of Dili made a formal request for food aid to foreign ambassadors in Jakarta in July 1977. The US-based Catholic Relief Services said that its requests to enter Timor-Leste had been "regular" throughout 1977 and 1978. The Commission can therefore safely conclude that at least by 1977 the Indonesian leadership possessed direct and full knowledge of the critical situation and was furthermore aware that their military operations had created the conditions of famine. Armed with this knowledge they failed to take steps to prevent the mass starvation which followed.

171. On the basis of the totality of this evidence the Commission finds the actions of the Indonesian government officials and military personnel involved in the programme of destroying food sources, interning large numbers of East Timorese civilians in camps and preventing them from receiving sufficient food to sustain themselves, amounted to extermination as a crime against humanity.

Unfair trials

172. In late 1983, as an aspect of its policy of "normalising" Timor-Leste, the Government of Indonesia decided that some of the persons suspected of working for independence should be prosecuted in the courts on charges of subversion and treason. Hundreds of East Timorese people were tried and convicted of these offences during the next 16 years.

173. The Commission studied the court files of over 200 of these cases conducted in the Dili District Court. In addition it interviewed and received statements from scores of individuals who were directly involved in these and other cases (including the trials of East Timorese arrested in Jakarta during the early 1990s), as defendants, witnesses and lawyers, both East Timorese and Indonesian. On the basis of this evidence the Commission finds that there was little relationship between justice and the conduct of these trials, which were in effect show trials. They were in fact sophisticated charades, designed to create an illusion of justice and due process. The trial process hid the reality that the trials were an instrument to ensure the conviction of political opponents to sentences of imprisonment which could have kept some of them in detention for life, while providing a sop to foreign criticism of the military's reliance on purely extra-judicial methods.

174. The trials involved a range of violations of both the Indonesian criminal code and international law. Suspects were routinely tortured and intimidated into signing Records of Interview which contained confessions and evidence against other defendants. These Records of Interview were the basis for many convictions. Indonesian military and police officers consistently gave false evidence under oath in court, and intimidated other witnesses into doing the same, or into not providing testimony at all. Defendants were refused the right to select lawyers to defend them and in most cases were assigned defence lawyers who did little more than support the prosecution case. Judges ignored indications of unethical behaviour and of the fabrication of evidence, and handed down judgments of guilty in all cases. The sentences were disproportionately harsh and did not take into account the lengthy periods of time already spent in military detention. The Commission did not find a single case where a defendant was completely acquitted in any of the hundreds of case files examined. Appeal proceedings invariably rubber-stamped the tainted decisions of the trial judges.

175. The degree to which the trial process was corrupted to produce predetermined guilty verdicts dictated by political goals is demonstrated by the results of the first wave of political trials, conducted between 1983 and 1985.

The Commission examined 232 case files relating to these trials. These cases resulted in:

- 232 convictions on charges involving treason and subversion
- 232 defendants were represented by government appointed defence counsel
- 0 defence witnesses were called
- 0 cases of acquittal of all charges were recorded
- 0 appeals against conviction were lodged.

176. The Commission finds that the systematic manipulation of the judicial process to persecute political opponents in hundreds of investigations and trials was made possible through a collusive and collaborative effort involving military intelligence officers who detained and interrogated suspects, police who prepared cases, prosecutors who presented the cases before the court, defence counsel who failed to provide a real defence for their clients, and judges who presided over and controlled the proceedings - and handed down verdicts of guilty in all cases.

177. The Commission finds that the violations involved in the political trials were part of a planned and systematic programme which must have involved senior members of the Indonesian justice department, senior military commanders and lower-ranking military officers, the police, judges, prosecutors and defence counsel.

Members of the Indonesian armed forces

178. Indonesian military personnel arbitrarily detained persons engaged in pro-independence activity and held them in custody for long periods, lasting in some cases for several years, before trial, even though in many cases there was little or no evidence against them. They routinely used threats, torture and intimidation during interrogation to obtain confessions to be used as evidence in trials. They also routinely fabricated material evidence, perjured themselves, failed to inform suspects of their rights, and failed to allow persons being interrogated to have access to an interpreter or a lawyer.

179. The Commission finds that the intelligence services of the Indonesian security forces were involved in guiding the outcome of the political trials at every stage of the interrogation and trial process. They ensured that the trial process succeeded in achieving its goal of persecuting political opponents of the occupation.

180. The Commission finds the commanders of the direct perpetrators of these violations are also responsible and accountable for arbitrary detention, torture, fabrication of evidence used in trials, and influencing the outcome of the trial process in hundreds of political trials.

Members of the Indonesian police

181. The Commission finds that members of the Indonesian police involved in preparation of the political trials examined are responsible and accountable for collusion with the intelligence sections and other members of the armed forces in the use of torture and intimidation to ensure that confessions were signed, for preparing falsified material evidence for use in the courts, and for working with prosecutors to ensure that evidence which supported defendants' cases was not introduced in court. They are responsible for the suffering endured by the victims of the unfair trials through years of imprisonment, ill-treatment and deprivation which followed as a direct result of their actions.

Prosecutors

182. The Commission finds that the prosecutors who presented the cases in court are responsible and accountable for collusion and conducting common purpose enterprises with military intelligence officers and police, involving serious violations. The methods used were torture, intimidation and the fabrication of evidence with a view to guaranteeing guilty verdicts against those brought to trial. They therefore failed to execute their sworn duty to act in an independent manner in the interests of justice.

183. The behaviour of the prosecutors cannot reasonably be explained in any way which does not implicate them in the commission of the violations. They routinely presented tainted evidence to the courts, particularly confessions which were obviously the result of torture and denial of due process, failed to cross-examine prosecution witnesses robustly or challenge fabricated evidence, and did not present any exculpatory material, which was their duty under the civil law system. They too are responsible for the suffering endured by the victims of the unfair trials through years of imprisonment, ill-treatment and deprivation which followed as a direct result of their actions.

Court-appointed defence counsel

184. The vast majority of court-appointed defence counsel in the hundreds of political trials examined by the Commission acted not in pursuance of the best interests of their clients, but as part of a collusive effort aimed at guaranteeing findings of guilt against political opponents of the occupation. The Commission finds that there is no other conclusion which can explain the fact that these lawyers failed to call a single defence witness in any of the 232 political trials held in Dili between 1983 and 1985.

185. The role of defence counsel in legal systems operating under the rule of law is extremely important, as they are in a position to expose agents of the state who have violated the rights of individuals charged with criminal offences. Defence counsel are bound to act on the instructions of their clients. Counsel could not have been ignorant of the fact that their clients had been detained without due process, had been tortured, and had signed confessions under extreme duress, and that evidence presented against them had been fabricated. Through failing to carry out their duty to bring these matters to the attention of the court and to defend their clients vigorously against the serious charges they faced, with some notable exceptions defence counsel share in the responsibility for the unjust imprisonment of their own clients and the suffering through ill-treatment and deprivation they endured as a result of the trial process.

Judges who presided over the trials

186. The panel of judges holds ultimate responsibility for the conduct of a trial. In the Indonesian civil law system the panel of judges has the power to question all witnesses, to examine all evidence and to explore the manner in which evidence presented to the court has been produced.

187. There is only one logical explanation of the performance of judges in the political trials which is consistent with the following facts:

- In the hundreds of trials that were conducted not a single defence witness was called
- No judge inquired whether any of the defendants had been coerced and tortured into signing confessions
- No judge questioned the validity of any of the evidence presented by the prosecution
- The judges themselves committed numerous procedural irregularities.

188. The explanation is that the judges who presided over the trials were also active in the collusive effort to ensure that pro-independence activists were punished. The Commission therefore concludes that judges involved in the trials are responsible for betraying their sacred oaths of office, and for allowing the courts to be used as a tool to persecute political opponents of the occupation. Through these actions the judges also contributed to the institutionalisation of the practice of allowing the law to be manipulated to serve political ends.

189. Each of the judges who presided over what were actually political show trials is personally accountable and responsible for the suffering endured by the victims of these unfair trials through years of imprisonment, ill-treatment and deprivation which followed as a direct result of their actions.

Violations committed against children

190. Indonesia, as the effective state power in Timor-Leste, had a clear legal duty to respect the rights of children. These duties arose under the customary law provisions of international humanitarian law as contained in Geneva Convention IV. Aside from its specific obligations, Indonesia had a general duty to protect children and not endanger them by exposing them to dangerous situations. According to international law a child is any person who is under the age of 18 years old. Even after it ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child in September 1990, Indonesia failed to meet its legally binding obligations.

191. Throughout the course of the occupation Indonesia was also bound by human rights standards as set out in the Universal Declaration on Human Rights. These were consistently breached in a variety of ways, including by forcibly recruiting children to assist its armed forces, arbitrary detention, the torture and ill-treatment of children, the killing of children in a variety of circumstances, including where they or their family members were perceived to be political opponents, and the rape and subjection to sexual slavery of children by military personnel inside and outside military installations.

Arbitrary detention of children

192. Throughout the occupation, agents of the Government of Indonesia arbitrarily detained children and were responsible for widespread and systematic violations of the rights of children while they were in custody. The treatment of unarmed civilians who were suspected of being politically opposed to the illegal occupation of Timor-Leste made no distinction between adult and child victims. From 1975 to 1999 children were commonly bound, beaten, kicked, raped, electrocuted, burnt with cigarettes, immersed in water, held in isolation in dark cells, threatened with death and otherwise terrorised by agents of the Indonesian security forces. Some children died as a direct result of this treatment. Perpetrators of these violations were, with very rare exceptions, not subject to any form of punishment or discipline.

193. In the years after the invasion, children were detained on a massive scale following capture or surrender and were subsequently placed in resettlement camps. The food, shelter and healthcare they received were seriously inadequate, and their restricted movement limited their and their families' ability to supplement what little food they received. Children were sometimes also detained in formal detention centres and military facilities after surrender or capture. Children also constituted a significant portion of those detained on the island of Ataúro between 1980 and 1986, either with family members or separated from them. It is estimated that thousands of children died as a result of the harsh conditions and lack of food in the resettlement camps and on Ataúro.

194. Children were also detained because of the actions of their parents or other family members, constituting an insidious form of proxy punishment.

195. Students and school children were targeted for arrest and detention when public demonstrations began to be held in the 1990s. The Indonesian authorities detained children during and after demonstrations, and sometimes to prevent demonstrations taking place. Many of those detained were subjected to severe violations, including torture. Children were also arrested and detained by members of the Indonesian security forces and their militia agents during the violence surrounding the Popular Consultation in 1999. The threat of force was also used to coerce children to join militia groups.

196. Children were killed in a wide variety of contexts, including during open armed conflict, in mass killings, in custody and by summary execution. In the early years of the conflict many were killed together with their families during military operations, or when caught by either side in contested areas. In later years, child victims were likely to be teenagers targeted for suspected pro-independence activities.

197. Indonesian forces and agents killed children in the period 1975–1979 within the wider context of the Indonesian campaign to bring Timor-Leste under its control. It did not distinguish children from adults in this regard. Children out looking for food, either on their own or in the company of adults, ran the risk of being shot by ABRI or Hansip members. Groups of unarmed civilians, including children, living outside Indonesian-controlled resettlement camps were in some cases randomly executed.

198. From 1980, children were killed when ABRI undertook wide-ranging and often indiscriminate reprisals in response to attacks by the Resistance. Children were among the victims killed in the large-scale crackdowns that followed the Falintil-led attacks on Dili in June 1980, on the Sub-district command headquarters in Mau Chiga (Hatu-Builico, Ainaro) in August 1982 and on the ABRI Zipur unit in Kraras (Viqueque, Viqueque) in August 1983. In these cases, children were killed in indiscriminate attacks on groups of civilians and because they themselves were suspected of giving support to Falintil.

199. In 1999, children were killed during operations in search of members of the clandestine network or Falintil, in the course of militia attacks to punish communities for supporting or assisting the the pro-independence cause, or in the killings that took place after the announcement of the result of the ballot. Both before and after the ballot, children made easy targets when churches and other places where people had taken refuge came under attack. The reported perpetrators were militia aligned to the Indonesian military or the TNI acting alone.

Sexual violations against child victims

200. The Indonesian security forces, their East Timorese auxiliaries and other persons in positions of authority used sexual violence against children, both strategically and opportunistically, throughout the occupation. Children were raped and otherwise violated on a widespread scale by members of the Indonesian security forces inside military institutions, at other official locations and even in their homes with family members present. For children, as for adults, sexual violence was perpetrated openly without fear of sanction by all ranks of the military and by East Timorese auxiliaries, as well as by persons in positions of civilian authority such as village heads.

201. The scale of opportunistic sexual violence towards children reflected a climate of impunity that extended from the higher reaches of the military to their East Timorese auxiliaries and to civilians in positions of authority.

202. Many of the victims of sexual violation were young girls whose family members were suspected of supporting Fretilin/Falintil. Once violated girls became vulnerable to long-term exploitation, leading to an extended period of sexual slavery or other forms of repeated sexual violence by members of the Indonesian security forces.

203. Although senior members of the Indonesian and civilian hierarchies would certainly have known that such conduct was unlawful, the Commission has found only one case in which an agent of the government was prosecuted. It is noteworthy that that case involved a low-ranking East Timorese member of Hansip.

Forced recruitment of children into military service

204. The Indonesian military recruited several thousand children to undertake roles as Operations Assistants (Tenaga Bantuan Operasi), as assistants to individual military personnel and units while on operations and at the bases. Although as TBOs these children worked full-time for the Indonesian security forces, they were not members of the armed forces and did not enjoy the perquisites of regular soldiers, such as a salary, a rank or a uniform.

205. TBOs were recruited throughout the period of the occupation but numbers peaked during the period 1976–1981 when military operations were at their height. ABRI used a variety of methods to recruit children as TBOs, ranging from outright coercion to the offer of inducements. Some children enlisted as TBOs voluntarily. However, in the desperate circumstances of the time, the dividing line between voluntary and forced recruitment was never clear cut. The Indonesian military preferred to use children as TBOs and actively sought to recruit minors as opposed to adults.

206. The recruitment of children by individual soldiers was known about at the highest levels of the military structure. No attempt was made to prevent it occurring. Indeed attempts to regulate the practice indicate that it was condoned. In practice there was no regulation of the treatment of child TBOs by individual soldiers.

207. The relationship between child TBOs and the soldiers they served was wholly unbalanced. Soldiers treated their TBOs as if they had rights of ownership over them. They controlled their movement, duties, living conditions and, ultimately, whether they lived or died. Sometimes these soldiers retained control over their TBOs after their tour of duty ended; sometimes they passed them on to other soldiers; sometimes they were simply left to fend for themselves.

208. Child TBOs performed tasks, which, although not usually involving them directly in fighting, exposed them to physical danger. At the very least the conditions in which they worked put their health at risk and jeopardised their educational chances.

209. Aside from their recruitment as TBOs, children were also enlisted with adults for military operations. In the case of the Operasi Kikis held during July–September 1981, in some areas children as young as ten years old were among the tens of thousands of East Timorese forcibly recruited to undertake duties accompanying Indonesian military personnel.

210. From late 1998 children were recruited into the militias which were organised, armed, trained and funded by ABRI/TNI. Some children joined out of their own free choice, usually because they or their families were pro-integration and agreed with the objectives of the militias. Child members of the militia were involved in the commission of grave human rights violations including killings, physical assault and rape as well as in the widespread destruction of property. In some cases recruits were paid, either with small amounts of money or with food. In the majority of cases they were not paid.

Forced removal of East Timorese children to Indonesia

211. East Timorese children were removed from their families and homeland to Indonesia frequently throughout the period of occupation. The transfer of children to Indonesia took many forms, ranging from abductions by individual soldiers to government-sponsored educational programmes. Although the degree of coercion exercised by persons and institutions in effecting the transfer of children varied, there was frequently an element of duress and, sometimes, outright force was used.

212. In the first years after the invasion, regular soldiers were the main perpetrators of the removal of East Timorese children. As in the case of child TBOs (some of whom were also transferred to Indonesia by the soldiers they had served at the end of their tours of duty), children who were removed to Indonesia were frequently treated as chattel by being removed forcibly, transported in boxes and required to perform menial tasks for the families with whom they lived.

213. Institutions, including hospitals and the Seroja orphanage, facilitated the removal of children by Indonesian soldiers. Although individual staff members told the Commission that they had concerns about the practice, there is no evidence that the institutions refused to take part.

214. Efforts to regulate the practice were instituted in the early 1980s, but the Commission heard little evidence that the regulations were followed or that there was monitoring of the way in which they were applied. Where consent was sought from parents, they were often not given complete information or were openly lied to. Further, the Commission was informed of instances where consent was extracted under threat of violence.

215. The Commission heard of no case in which an attempt was made to provide education to East Timorese children by people of the same nationality, language or religion. Rather the Commission heard of many cases in which there was an explicit attempt to convert the child to another religion and transform him or her into an Indonesian child.

216. There is insufficient evidence to determine whether the large-scale removal of East Timorese children was official Indonesian government or military policy. Nevertheless, there is clear evidence of high-level involvement in some of its manifestations, extending to President Soeharto and members of his family.

217. The Government of Indonesia made no genuine attempt to regulate the practice of the removal of children through the institution of adoption policies undertaken by competent authorities according to the applicable law.

218. The Commission finds the Indonesian security forces failed to distinguish adequately between children and others in its military campaign in Timor-Leste. In addition, it specifically targeted children whose families were suspected of being affiliated with the pro-independence cause, resulting in their detention, torture, killing and rape. The number of reported violations committed against children, the fact that members of the senior military and government hierarchies in Timor-Leste must have known about these violations, the direct involvement of senior military and government officials in sexual violations committed against children and the widespread and systematic use of children as largely unpaid military assistants all lead the Commission to a finding that children were violated in a widespread and systematic manner throughout the conflict. The high command of the Indonesian armed forces and senior government officials in Timor-Leste are responsible for participating in this activity, not taking effective steps to prevent it, and not punishing those directly responsible for these violations.

Responsibility for violations of humanitarian law committed during the conduct of hostilities

Attacks on civilians and indiscriminate attacks

219. Throughout the conflict members of the Indonesian military forces systematically attacked civilians, particularly those suspected of being supporters of the independence movement. Often collective punishments were carried out against the families and the communities of people suspected of supporting Falintil. These direct and intentional attacks on civilians claimed thousands of civilian lives.

220. In addition, attacks were often carried out against military targets in a disproportionate and indiscriminate way, so that associated civilian deaths were unnecessarily caused. This was particularly the case during the early years of the occupation, when large numbers of civilians were still living in Fretilin bases. Where attacks were to be launched in areas containing civilian populations, no warnings were given to civilians in advance of those attacks.

Destruction of civilian property

221. The Commission has found that members of ABRI/TNI systematically destroyed property, including buildings and personal items belonging to civilians, as a routine part of military operations. The purpose of this destruction was to punish East Timorese for opposing the occupation, to produce a climate of terror which it was hoped would render the population easier to control, and to deter support for the pro-independence movement.

222. Members of ABRI systematically destroyed food sources during the late 1970s and early 1980s. They also routinely stole and looted private property belonging to those suspected of supporting Fretilin/Falintil.

Mistreatment of enemy combatants

223. Prisoners captured by the Indonesian military forces were often subjected to torture and many were killed or disappeared. A significant number of Fretilin and Falintil members surrendered on the basis of an offer of amnesty first made by President Soeharto in 1977 and subsequently renewed, only to be executed or to disappear after surrender.

Unlawful means of warfare

224. The Commission has found that at times ABRI/TNI used weapons which are prohibited by the international laws governing armed conflict. These included chemical weapons which were used to poison water supplies and kill crops and vegetation, and resulted in the deaths by poisoning of hundreds of civilian victims.

225. The Commission has also found that ABRI/TNI used napalm and other incendiary devices, which caused terrible suffering to civilian victims including the death by burning of unarmed men, women and children.

Forced recruitment

226. The Commission has found that ABRI/TNI forcibly recruited tens of thousands of East Timorese men, women and children to assist them in their military operations, particularly during the years 1975–1981 and in periods of heightened military activity, across the entire territory of Timor-Leste. Those who refused to participate were subjected to beatings and torture. The illegal forced recruitment of civilians for military operations was carried out to provide cheap practical assistance and weaken the morale of their opposition to the occupation.

227. Other civilians were forced to perform duties as night-guards in their villages or to search for family members in the mountains. Some Falintil fighters who were captured were forced to join operations against Falintil, either unarmed or armed only with spears in order to ensure they did not rise up against their ABRI commanders.

Responsibility for violations of the economic and social rights of the East Timorese people

Introduction

228. The Government of Indonesia made significant economic investment in the territory of Timor-Leste during the period of the occupation. In particular it was responsible for building many new roads, bridges, buildings, hospitals and schools, needs which had been seriously neglected during the Portuguese colonial period.

229. However, despite these undoubted improvements in infrastructure, the social and economic rights of the East Timorese people were consistently violated throughout the occupation. Moreover, if the investment in infrastructure was intended to win the "hearts and minds" of the East Timorese people it failed because it could not offset the large-scale violations of civil and political rights which the same people were suffering.

230. The gross violations of the people's civil and political rights also directly affected the basic social and economic rights of the people. Time and time again impoverished East Timorese farmers, who make up the majority of the population, lost all their possessions as a result of military operations. It could take years to recover from these losses. The impact of the massive displacement of civilians for military reasons, particularly where it caused famine and death, is equally long-lasting. Whatever benefits the people of Timor-Leste derived from Indonesian investment in the territory were largely undone by the massive and systematic violence and destruction wrought by the TNI and its militia auxiliaries after the 1999 Popular Consultation. This rampage destroyed the houses, and the possessions they contained, of approximately 60,000 families.* The Indonesian security forces and their agent militias also systematically destroyed hospitals, schools, electricity generators and water systems, and took moveable valuables and capital assets, such as motor vehicles, computers and machines, to West Timor. The widespread destruction of housing and infrastructure during the Indonesian evacuation from the territory served no military purpose. It ensured that once again the population of Timor-Leste would be unable to feed or house themselves, and greatly increased the challenge of building the new independent nation of Timor-Leste.

231. The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR) recognises that because they are at different stages of economic development, states are not equally able to realise fully all the rights set out in the Covenant. The obligation on states is to take steps to achieve the progressive realisation of social and economic rights to the maximum extent that their resources allow. However, at the same time, states have core responsibilities, which they must always fulfil. These include responsibilities to provide for certain basic needs such as food, shelter, essential medicines and basic education. It is also required that states not act in a discriminatory manner in the provision of economic and social benefits and that they not take retrogressive measures that cause people's enjoyment of these rights actually to deteriorate.

232. The Commission finds that Indonesia violated economic and social rights at all these levels. In many instances the state took extreme security measures that were utterly at odds with meeting its core responsibilities.

233. Because of the excessive priority given to military imperatives, the State failed to provide for the population's basic needs, and frequently took measures that were both retrogressive and discriminatory.† At the same time the Commission has found that the State of Indonesia failed to realise the economic and social rights of the East Timorese to the maximum extent possible, and that at the end of the occupation, Timor-Leste's development still lagged well behind that of even the poorest Indonesian provinces.

Rights over natural resources

234. The Commission is satisfied that trading companies with direct links to the military and the Government of Indonesia deliberately and systematically underpaid coffee smallholders, thereby abridging their right to an adequate livelihood.

* World Bank, Joint Assessment Mission, 1999, and Survey of Sucos in Timor-Leste

† Many of the violations discussed in this Part are violations of these core obligations, often involving multiple breaches of a retrogressive nature.

235. The arrangement that the Indonesian authorities put in place in the coffee industry was one of several instances where Indonesia denied the people of Timor-Leste an essential component of their right to self-determination, namely their right to dispose of their natural wealth and resources freely. The Indonesian authorities committed similar violations by exploiting other resources, including sandalwood and other types of timber, without regard to sustainability, and by failing to regulate the exploitation of these resources by others. These forms of exploitation of natural resources were detrimental to the well-being of the population and were sometimes used to fund military operations, in violation of the duties of an occupying power under international law.

236. The Commission finds that, in a further breach of the right of the East Timorese people to dispose of their natural resources, Indonesia and Australia concluded the The Timor Gap Zone of Cooperation Treaty in 1989 without consulting the people of Timor-Leste or paying due regard to their interests.

The right to adequate food

237. Timor-Leste's climate and the uneven quality of its soils mean that the population's ability to support itself is precarious at the best of times. Survival is dependent on the population's ability to move freely so as to gain access to food sources. The Commission has found that the Indonesian authorities' investment programme neglected agriculture. But beyond that the Indonesian authorities also took security measures that positively worsened the chances of the farming population making a living, primarily by forcibly settling them in infertile areas under conditions in which their movement was restricted. The overriding motivation of this policy was to keep the civilian population away from the Resistance and in areas where they could be easily monitored and controlled by the military.

Housing and land

238. The Commission finds that repeated displacements, the redrawing of administrative boundaries and the non-recognition of customary land-ownership and land-use practices by the Government of Indonesia produced a legacy of landlessness and highly complex land disputes. Although security considerations played an important part in producing this outcome, the unchecked pursuit of their economic interests by military and civilian officials and their business associates also contributed greatly to these developments. The disruption of landholding and land-use patterns has had, and will continue to have, profoundly damaging effects on the economic, social and cultural fabric of East Timorese society.

Health and education

239. Although Indonesian investment in health and education was significant and resulted in the physical installation of territory-wide health and education systems, the Commission found that it was ineffective in overcoming chronic public health problems or meeting basic learning needs.

240. Many factors contributed to this outcome. Among the side-effects of extreme violations, such as torture and forced recruitment, were ill-health and the disruption of education. The skewed economic development promoted by the Indonesian authorities created a self-perpetuating cycle in which poverty, on the one hand, and poor health and low educational achievement, on the other, reinforced each other. The highly militarised context and other structural factors, such as the lack of expertise and commitment of many of the Indonesian medical personnel and teachers assigned to Timor-Leste, resulted in services that were sub-standard and mistrusted by the local population. Basic health and educational needs were often subordinated to security considerations, as exemplified by the forced settlement of large numbers of the population in disease-ridden areas that had previously been shunned and the heavy emphasis on propaganda in schools.

241. The use of schools for propaganda and indoctrination severely interfered with the education of an entire generation of East Timorese youth. Education was used in this way as part of an integrated security approach whose overriding objective was to ensure that pro-independence sentiment did not take root in a new generation. In this context, teaching children the skills that would enhance their prospects and enable them to fulfil their human potential was a secondary consideration.

Individual responsibility for widespread and systematic violations

242. On the basis of the totality of the evidence available to it, the Commission finds that the following individuals were responsible for widespread and systematic patterns of serious human rights violations committed in Timor-Leste between 1975 and 1999. These individuals held command positions in the Indonesian military forces during periods when individuals under their command committed widespread and systematic violations of human rights. They were either directly responsible for these violations or knew they were being committed and failed to prevent them, or to punish those directly responsible.

243. As already noted individuals can be held to account for a crime against humanity or a war crime in any of three situations. The first of these is where an individual him or herself intentionally commits, plans, instigates, orders, aids or abets in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime. Secondly, an individual will be accountable for taking part in a common plan or conspiracy to facilitate the commission of a crime. The common plan or purpose may be inferred from the fact that two or more persons acted in unison to put into effect a joint criminal enterprise. There is no necessity for the plan, design or purpose to have been previously arranged. Knowledge of a common plan to ill-treat people may be reasonably inferred from a person's position of authority within the group.

244. In some cases senior officers and civilian officials were directly responsible for perpetrating illegal acts. This is clearest in the case of the incursions which led up to the full-scale invasion of 7 December and the invasion itself, which violated the fundamental principle of international law that prohibits the illegal use of force by one state against another. The main architects of this policy – Major General Ali Moertopo, Head of Opsus (Special Operations), Major General Benny Moerdani, Assistant for Intelligence in the Department of Defence and Security and Deputy Head of Bakin (the State Intelligence Coordinating Board), Lieutenant General Yoga Sugama, Head of Bakin, and General Maraden Panggabean, Minister of Defence and Security and Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces – bear responsibility for devising and implementing it. President Soeharto bears responsibility for authorising it.*

245. It is rare but not unknown for senior officers to have been directly involved in the perpetration of human rights violations.† However, both as a matter of law and as a matter of fact, responsibility for crimes of the kind that were committed in Timor-Leste extends beyond those who were the direct perpetrators.

246. Under international law they are responsible not just for violations which they themselves may directly have committed as murderers, torturers or rapists. As already noted in this chapter (and at greater length in Vol. I, Part 2: The Mandate of the Commission), persons may also be responsible as individuals for crimes against humanity if they aided or abetted the commission of the crimes or if they acted to further a "common criminal purpose".* They may also bear command responsibility for, and thus be held accountable for, acts committed by others. They bear this responsibility not only where they order a subordinate to commit a crime. In addition, a person who is in the position of a superior (either in law or in fact) and who has effective control over his or her subordinates[7] will have command responsibility where a crime is committed by a subordinate and the superior knew or should have known of the crime but did nothing to prevent or punish it.[8] Both East Timorese and Indonesian law have incorporated these principles into domestic law.

247. On the basis of these principles the Commission takes the view that many individuals at the highest levels of the Indonesian military and civilian structures carry individual and command responsibility for human rights violations under international and domestic law.

248. As it has stressed several times, the Commission is not a court of law. It has often not been able to establish clear lines of responsibility or to determine whether a commander was responsible as an individual for, say, "aiding and abetting" a crime or was responsible for failing in his duties as a commander. One reason for these difficulties is that the Commission was charged with investigating a conflict which resulted from an invasion and whose character was therefore unique for a truth commission. The main

* The Commission believes that the evidence against these individuals is extremely strong for two reasons: first, because the international community plainly expressed its view that the invasion was illegal by overwhelmingly condemning it as such in votes in the UN General Assembly and the Security Council; second, because of the insight into Indonesian official Indonesian thinking and the principles involved in developing it given by the release of their records pertaining to this period by the Governments of Australia, the USA, New Zealand and the UK.

† The Commission received several reports implicating Korem commanders directly in violations. In addition, as juniorranking officers, individuals who subsequently rose to senior positions in the Indonesian military were reported to have been implicated in human rights abuses.

perpetrators were citizens of another country, who were part of a chain of command that ran beyond the borders of Timor-Leste and was opaque to most Indonesians.

249. Despite these difficulties the Commission believes that there are strong grounds for concluding that many members of the Indonesian military hierarchy – and some members of the civilian hierarchy – should be held accountable for violations of international and domestic law in Timor-Leste. It has reached this conclusion on the basis of a number of considerations, all of which tend to one conclusion, that systematic violations of human rights by members of the armed forces were institutionally and individually condoned by commanders at the highest levels of the military structure.*

The scale of violations

250. The Commission received information testifying to the massive scale of the violations perpetrated by members of the Indonesian armed forces. Through its statement-taking process alone it received reports of more than 85,000 such violations, in the overwhelming majority (84%) of which members of the Indonesian security forces, including their auxiliaries, were implicated. The Commission believes that the sheer scale of the violations is evidence that they were condoned at the highest level.

The pattern of violations

251. Human-rights violations were at their most intense during and immediately after the large-scale military operations of 1975–1984 and in 1999 during the lead-up to, and in the aftermath of, the Popular Consultation. All types of "physical integrity" violations, including ill-treatment and torture, rape and killings, as well as displacements, including forced displacements, were simultaneously at peak levels during these periods. At the same time the Commission has also found that human-rights violations were a persistent feature of the Indonesian occupation. The Commission received reports of violations that had occurred in every year between 1975 and 1999. These violations occurred in a systematic fashion. In many years repression was largely localised, to Dili in 1980, Ainaro in 1982 and Ermera in the early 1990s, but nonetheless systematic. Throughout the occupation a territory-wide system of detention centres was put in place in which military personnel assigned to these duties detained, tortured and ill-treated using uniform methods.

Strategy

252. The scale and pattern of violations indicate to the Commission that the Indonesian armed forces adopted an overall strategy which relied on the use of overwhelming force and terror to subdue the population. Elements of this strategy included: the adoption of all means at the disposal of the armed forces to defeat the Resistance, including the indiscriminate targeting of civilians; the exploitation of divisions among the East Timorese population; the use of a "repressive" rather than a "persuasive" approach; and the subordination of the welfare of the general population to security objectives. Whether, as in the late 1970s, directed at the large population concentrations which came under merciless bombardment and then surrendered, or, as in the 1980s and 1990s, at individual members of the clandestine movement, or, as in 1999, at the whole population in the campaign to win a majority for integration, these strategic assumptions were unvarying.

* In addition to the considerations outlined below, evidence that the same practices as were employed in Timor-Leste were also employed in Indonesia itself would also be germane to an assessment of high-level responsibility. The Commission has not been able to investigate this question, although the research of others in this area is highly suggestive. See, for example, Geoffrey Robinson, People's War: militias in East Timor and Indonesia, South East Asia Research, 9, 3, pp. 271–318.

Institutional norms and culture

253. The Commission considers it significant that many of the individuals who had participated in operations during which widespread human rights violations were committed subsequently rose to senior positions in the military hierarchy (see Annexe 3, this Part). These included officers who had participated in the incursions that preceded the invasion, in the invasion itself, in the campaigns to subdue the Resistance in the late 1970s, in the implementation of the "resettlement" programme that caused the deaths of tens of thousands of surrendered and captured East Timorese civilians, and in the operations designed to prevent a revival of the Resistance in the early 1980s. The Commission finds this phenomenon significant for several reasons. It is another indication of the impunity of the armed forces during their occupation of Timor-Leste, which has been a theme of this Report. However, it also throws light on the mindsets of those who commanded those operations and of those who gained preferment as a result of them.

254. Against this background the Commission has taken the view that, aside from persons who were individually responsible for crimes against humanity and crimes under humanitarian law, a large number of senior members of the Indonesian military hierarchy, comprising those who held positions that gave them authority over operations in Timor-Leste during 1975–1999, may satisfy the criteria for command responsibility and thus could be held accountable for the violations that occurred during that time.

255. These individuals may meet the relevant criteria for command responsibility for the following reasons.

1) There was a superior-subordinate relationship

256. Although for the reasons outlined above it is not always clear to the Commission how lines of command operated in practice, it is clear that these lines of command converge in Jakarta in the person of the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces and his closest subordinates, such as his Chiefs of Staff, his Assistants for Operations, Territorial Affairs and Intelligence, and the Commander of such special units as Kopassus and Kostrad. For most of the period of the occupation the President of Indonesia was formally and in fact the Supreme Commander of the Armed Forces. The civilian arms of government and the police were subordinate to the President and the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces or to both. While nominal superiors in all these instances may not have had effective control over their nominal subordinates, persons vested with authority should be required to show that in fact they did not have such effective control.

2) The superior "knew or had reason to know" that a crime was about to be or had been committed

257. A blanket plea of ignorance by superiors of what their subordinates in Timor-Leste were doing would be difficult to sustain. In some cases, most clearly in the period surrounding the ballot in 1999, where the situation was being closely monitored by outsiders, including some such as UN officials who were directly informing senior Indonesian military officers and civilian officials of the situation on the ground, the Indonesian authorities at least "had reason to know" that crimes were being committed. There is also documentary evidence that in 1999 subordinates in the field were sending accurate reports to their superiors on the situation. In earlier years, too, such reporting would have been going on. In addition throughout the occupation, governments, international organisations and NGOs were making their and their constituents' concerns known to members of the Indonesian government and the military command. The problem does not seem to have been that senior officials and officers were ignorant of the situation. During the famine of 1977–1979 these representations were ignored until the military's objectives had been met.

3) The perpetrator failed to take "necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrator thereof"

258. As already noted, a marked feature of the Indonesian occupation was the impunity enjoyed by members of the armed forces. This finding is not mitigated by the two prosecutions that are known to have taken place in the 1990s, after the Santa Cruz Massacre and the killing of six people in Gariana (Maubara, Liquiçá) in 1995. They were exceptions which did not alter the climate of general impunity, not least because they did not raise the question of command responsibility. It might be argued that the fact that the level of violence did moderate during the course of the occupation, and that from late 1983 detainees were brought to trial showed that the Indonesian authorities had taken "necessary and reasonable measure" to end the reliance on extra-judicial means. However, the diminution of violence did not mean an end to violence, as shown most dramatically by Santa Cruz and the events of 1999, while as described in Vol. III, Part 7.6: Political Trials, the trials became an additional weapon in the armoury of repression and did not mark the ending of the customary types of abuse.

Violations of international law by the Indonesian security forces

Killings and disappearances

259. The Commission is satisfied that the involvement of ABRI/TNI in unlawful killings and disappearances violated numerous rules of international law, giving rise to responsibility on the part of Indonesia for these violations. In particular:

- The Commission finds that, through massacres and summary executions of civilians at all stages of the international conflict, ABRI/TNI was responsible for violating one of the fundamental principles of customary international humanitarian law, namely the principle of distinction which protects civilians from becoming the targets of attack. Such acts also violated Article 27 of the Fourth Geneva Convention, to which Indonesia was a party, requiring the humane treatment of civilians, and Article 32 of that Convention which prohibits the taking of any measures such as to cause the extermination of civilians, including murder.
- More specifically the Commission finds that the use of collective punishments against civilians, including mass killings, violated the customary prohibition on the use of reprisals against civilians and Article 33 of the Fourth Geneva Convention which reflects this principle.
- Although Indonesia, as the occupying power, was entitled to impose sentences for criminal offences, these, including the death penalty, should only have been passed in accordance with the principle of legality and after the holding of a proper and regular trial by a court of law.[9] Indonesia failed to comply with these obligations.
- The summary executions of prisoners of war by ABRI/TNI violated Article 13 of the Third Geneva Convention which requires the humane treatment of prisoners of war and prohibits acts causing the death of prisoners of war in custody. Executions without trial of prisoners of war also violated the requirements of Articles 99 to 102 of the Third Geneva Convention which require that sentences, including the death penalty, may be imposed only in accordance with the principle of legality and following a regular trial with proper safeguards against abuse.
- The killing of civilians and captured combatants by ABRI/TNI outside those circumstances in which killing is permitted by international humanitarian law amounted to violations of the right to life held by its victims. The Commission considers that that right had attained the status of customary international law well before the beginning of the conflict.

260. The Commission also considers that the individuals within ABRI/TNI who were involved in carrying out killings and disappearances were involved in the commission of war crimes and crimes against humanity:

- The willful killing of civilians during an international armed conflict constitutes a grave breach of the Fourth Geneva Convention, under Article 147 of that Convention.
- The willful killing of prisoners of war constitutes a grave breach of the Third Geneva Convention, under Article 130 of that Convention.
- The summary execution of civilians or captured enemy combatants and the perpetrating of forced disappearances constitutes a serious violation of the laws and customs of war and is therefore a war crime under customary international law.
- The widespread and systematic killing, extermination or enforced disappearance of members of a civilian population constitutes a crime against humanity. The Commission has found that these acts were carried out by the ABRI/TNI in Timor-Leste during the conflict in a widespread and systematic manner.

Detention

261. The Commission considers that the practices employed by the TNI for the detention of civilians and captured enemy combatants, and the manner in which such detainees were treated during their imprisonment violated international humanitarian and human rights law.

- Although as a party to an international conflict and an occupying power, ABRI/TNI was entitled to take measures necessary for security, the Commission considers that the detention of civilians not necessary for security violated the customary right to those detained to be free from arbitrary detention.
- In any event the torture and ill-treatment of civilians by ABRI/TNI, whether justifiably detained or not, violated the provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention, by which Indonesia was bound. Article 27 of that Convention requires the humane treatment of civilians. Article 31 provides that no physical or moral coercion may be used against civilians, including to obtain information. Article 32 prohibited Indonesia and ABRI/TNI from taking any measure such as to cause physical suffering to civilians including torture, corporal punishment and mutilation.
- In addition, where civilians are detained, they must be treated humanely, including in the conditions of their imprisonment. This is required by Article 37 of the Fourth Geneva Convention, which provides that civilians who are confined for the purpose of criminal proceedings must be treated humanely, and also by customary international human rights law. The Commission considers that in many cases ABRI/TNI were involved in the violation of these principles by the provision of grossly inadequate conditions of imprisonment for those in detention.
- Similarly, while captured enemy combatants may be detained, they must be treated humanely and provided with adequate conditions of detention. In the case of prisoners of war this is required by numerous detailed provisions of the Third Geneva Convention, including under Article 21 and Chapter II of the Convention. In the case of captured combatants not entitled to prisoner of war status, customary human rights law nonetheless provides that the conditions of imprisonment must be humane. The Commission considers that the TNI violated these requirements by the housing of many captured combatants in grossly inhumane conditions.

262. The Commission finds that the ABRI/TNI was responsible for the widespread torture and ill-treatment of captured enemy combatants and non-combatants in flagrant violation of international humanitarian and human rights law.

- In the case of prisoners of war, the Third Geneva Convention provides that prisoners of war must at all times be treated humanely, that they must not be subjected to physical mutilation and acts of violence or intimidation (Article 13), or to physical or mental torture or any other form of coercion in order to secure information (Article 17). This prohibition was violated in all cases in which captured Falintil fighters were subjected to physical abuse at the hands of ABRI/TNI.

- In the case of enemy combatants not entitled to prisoner of war status such persons may be tried but must, according to customary international law, and Article 5 of the Fourth Geneva Convention, be treated humanely and not punished other than following a fair trial. The Commission finds that even where a captured person may not have been entitled to prisoner of war status in a given case, ABRI/TNI nonetheless bears responsibility for any physical mistreatment of that person.
- In all cases the principles of human rights that guarantee all persons an entitlement to freedom from torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment apply, regardless of questions of security or the status of the detainee. The Commission considers that this principle was a part of customary international law throughout the mandate period and that it was systematically and routinely violated by ABRI/TNI.

263. Finally the Commission also considers that there are strong grounds for concluding that the individual members of ABRI/TNI who were involved in the detention and mistreatment of civilians and captured members of Falintil bear individual criminal responsibility for their actions. Its reasons for this conclusion are that:

- The torture or inhuman treatment of civilians constitutes a grave breach of the Fourth Geneva Convention, under Article 147 of that Convention.
- The torture or inhumane treatment of prisoners of war constitutes a grave breach of the Third Geneva Convention, under Article 130 of that Convention.
- Torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in the context of an international armed conflict constitutes a serious violation of the laws and customs of war and is therefore a war crime under customary international law regardless of whether it is perpetrated against a civilian, prisoner of war or an unprivileged combatant.
- The widespread or systematic commission of torture or inhumane treatment against a civilian population can amount to a crime against humanity. The Commission has found that the use by the ABRI/TNI of torture and cruel, inhumane or degrading treatment or punishment against the East Timorese population was both widespread and systematic. There are therefore strong grounds for believing that individual members of the ABRI/TNI must bear individual criminal responsibility under international law for crimes against humanity.

Sexual violations

264. The Commission holds ABRI/TNI responsible for many breaches of international law through acts of rape, sexual slavery and other sexual violations.

265. The Commission finds that in perpetrating and allowing acts of rape and sexual assault against East Timorese women, ABRI/TNI violated the provisions of the Fourth

Geneva Convention, by which Indonesia was bound. Article 27 of that Convention requires the humane treatment of civilians. It requires that women must be especially protected against attacks on their honour including rape, enforced prostitution or any form of indecent assault.

266. In addition Article 31 provides that no physical or moral coercion may be used against civilians, including to obtain information. Article 32 prohibited Indonesia and ABRI/TNI from taking any measure such as to cause physical suffering to civilians.

267. By engaging in and permitting sexual violence the ABRI/TNI violated these provisions.

268. In addition, rape and sexual assault constitute types of torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. The Commission finds that by engaging in and permitting others to engage in this form of activity ABRI/TNI violated the rights of its victims to be free from torture or ill-treatment.

269. Incidents of sexual slavery, characterised by the purported exercise of any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership over a person, violated the fundamental prohibition on slavery contained in customary international law.

270. The Commission also considers that individual members of ABRI/TNI are criminally responsible for their involvement in sexual violations during the conflict.

- Acts of rape against civilian East Timorese women constituted grave breaches of the Fourth Geneva Convention, under Article 147 of that Convention.
- Rape constitutes a serious violation of the laws and customs of war and was therefore a war crime under customary international law, at least during the latter part of the mandate period.
- Where rapes or other sexual violations constituting inhumane acts, or incidents of sexual slavery, are carried out as part of a widespread and systematic attack on a civilian population a crime against humanity may have occurred. The Commission has found that there are strong grounds for concluding that throughout the conflict period ABRI/TNI was engaged in widespread and systematic attacks on the East Timorese civilian population, and therefore those involved in sexual violations as a part of those attacks may bear individual criminal responsibility for crimes against humanity.

Unfair trials

271. The Commission has concluded that the trials carried out during the Indonesian occupation had many substantive and procedural defects. In many cases this caused Indonesia to violate its international obligations under the Geneva Conventions and international customary law. The Commission considers that the following rules were violated by Indonesia during the trial of civilians:

- Article 64 of the Fourth Geneva Convention required Indonesia, as occupying power, to refrain from altering the existing penal law of the occupied territory other than as necessary for the maintenance of security, and to allow existing courts and tribunals to function.

- Article 71 of the Fourth Geneva Convention provides that sentence shall not be pronounced for an offence except following a regular trial. Accused persons must be informed promptly in a language which they understand of the charges against them.
- Article 72 of the Fourth Geneva Convention provides that accused persons have the right to present evidence and to be assisted by a qualified lawyer of their choosing who has the necessary facilities for preparing the defence, including the ability to visit the accused.
- Article 72 of the Fourth Geneva Convention also requires that accused persons must be given the opportunity to be assisted by an interpreter, and the right to object to the interpreter and request his or her replacement.
- Article 73 of the Fourth Geneva Convention requires that all convicted persons must have the right to appeal and must be fully informed of this right.

272. In respect of the trial of captured combatants entitled to prisoner of war status, the Commission finds that Indonesia was responsible for violations of various similar provisions, including the following:

- Article 84 of the Third Geneva Convention provides that prisoners of war must in no circumstances be tried by a court that does not offer the essential guarantees of independence and impartiality.
- Article 105 of the Third Geneva Convention provides that, when tried, prisoners of war are entitled to call evidence, and to have access to a qualified lawyer of their choice and an interpreter if necessary. The accused's lawyer must be given adequate facilities to prepare the defence and have the ability to visit the accused.
- Article 106 requires that if convicted a prisoner of war is entitled to appeal the sentence or conviction.

273. In addition the Commission has found that in many cases torture or ill-treatment was used to obtain confessions or evidence that was subsequently used in a trial. The use of such evidence was in violation of the customary prohibition on torture and the provisions of the Geneva Convention outlawing the use of torture to extract information (see paras. 262-3 above on torture and ill-treatment).

Violations against children

274. The Commission has concluded that numerous violations were carried out against East Timorese children. Many of these mirrored the violations directed at the adult population: for example killings, arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment and sexual violations. In respect of those violations the Commission holds ABRI/TNI and Indonesia responsible for breaches of the same principles of international law as set out above. However, further responsibility also accrued in many cases by virtue of the status of the victim as a child.

275. The Fourth Geneva Convention requires special treatment to be provided to children during an international armed conflict and in occupied territories. It provides, in Articles 24 and 50, for the special care and protection of children orphaned or separated through the conflict. Most significantly, it prohibits an occupying power from enlisting children in organisations subordinate to it (Article 50) and from compelling children to work (Article 51). The Commission considers that ABRI/TNI violated these provisions regularly and systematically, as it not only failed to provide special care for children affected by the conflict in the occupied territory of Timor-Leste, but actively recruited children to work as TBOs (operations assistants) and in other related roles.

276. In addition, the Commission notes that Indonesia ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child on 5 September 1990. Once it was a party to that Convention, Indonesia was bound under international law to comply with its provisions. However the Commission has found that many provisions of the Convention were violated by the conduct of the ABRI/TNI in Timor-Leste. The Commission holds Indonesia responsible for breaches of the following provisions of the Convention during the 1990s:

- Article 6, which provides that every child has the inherent right to life and required Indonesia to ensure to the maximum extent possible the survival and development of the child
- Article 13, which guarantees the right of the child to freedom of expression
- Article 14, which guarantees the right of the child to freedom of thought, conscience, and religion
- Article 15, which guarantees the right of the child to freedom of association and peaceful assembly
- Article 37, which requires that children must not be subjected to torture or other ill-treatment or to arbitrary detention, that children deprived of their liberty must be treated with humanity and in a manner taking into account their age, and must be granted access to appropriate legal remedies including the right to challenge their detention in a court
- Article 19, which requires states to take measures to protect children from all forms of physical or mental violence or exploitation
- Article 34, which requires states to take all necessary steps to protect children from sexual exploitation and abuse
- Article 36, which required Indonesia to protect East Timorese children against all other forms of exploitation.

277. The Commission considers that, in particular, the transfer of East Timorese children to Indonesia during the 1990s involved the violation of various specific provisions of the Convention on the Rights of the Child, including the following:

- Article 8, which required Indonesia to respect the right of every child to preserve his or her identity, including nationality, name and family relations
- Article 9, which provided that children must not be separated from their parents against their will except where competent authorities subject to judicial review had determined that it is in the interests of the child
- Article 11, which required Indonesia to take steps to combat the illicit transfer and non-return of children abroad
- Article 20, which requires that where a child is separated from his or her family, the state must provide special protection, the nature of which shall be determined with due regard to the desirability of continuity in a child's upbringing, and the child's ethnic, religious, cultural and linguistic background

- Article 21, which requires that adoption of children must be properly regulated.

278. The use of children in its military auxiliaries by Indonesia was also in violation of the provisions of the Convention:

- Article 32 required Indonesia to protect children from economic exploitation and from performing work that was likely to be hazardous or to interfere with their education or development
- Article 38 required Indonesia to take all feasible steps to prevent children under the age of 15 from taking part in hostilities, and to refrain from recruiting children under the age of 15.

279. On a more general level, the Commission finds that Indonesia made no attempt to comply with the obligation under Article 3(1) of the Convention to treat the best interests of the child as a primary consideration when taking any action concerning children.

Displacement and famine

280. The Commission is satisfied that Indonesia violated its obligations under international humanitarian law by bringing about mass civilian displacements and causing a devastating famine in the following ways:

- By relocating villages, Indonesia was in breach of Article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention which prohibits an occupying power from forcibly transferring civilians other than for the purpose of evacuating areas for the safety of civilians or where it is required for imperative military reasons.
- By failing to provide adequate food at resettlement camps and relocated villages Indonesia further breached Article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention which requires that where civilians are transferred or evacuated by an occupying power they must be provided with proper accommodation and satisfactory conditions of hygiene, health, safety and nutrition.
- By interning members of the families or communities of those suspected of resistance activities, rather than only persons who posed an actual security risk, Indonesia violated Article 42 of the Fourth Geneva Convention requiring that persons be interned only if the security of the detaining power makes it absolutely necessary.
- By failing to provide adequate food to those persons it interned, Indonesia violated Article 89 of the Fourth Geneva Convention which requires that sufficient food must be provided so as to keep internees in a good state of health.
- By engaging in a tactic of destroying civilian food and food sources so as to starve civilians in order to encourage them to surrender and prevent them from supporting the Resistance, Indonesia violated the customary principles reflected in Article 54 of the First Additional Protocol to the Geneva Conventions that prohibit the starvation of civilians as a method of warfare and attacks on or the destruction of objects indispensable to the survival of the civilian population such as food and food sources or to make such objects the target of reprisals.

- The Commission is also of the view that individuals involved in Indonesian civilian and military institutions were involved in the commission of international crimes in relation to the displacements and famine.
- The Commission considers that there are strong grounds which indicate that those individuals involved in the unlawful transfer and confinement of civilians committed grave breaches of the Fourth Geneva Convention, as set out in Article 147 of that Convention.
- The Commission also considers that there are strong grounds indicating that those individuals involved in formulating policies whereby civilians would be deprived of food supplies, in order to bring about their surrender and undermine support for Falintil, committed grave breaches of the Fourth Geneva Convention by wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to the body or health of civilians, as set out in Article 147 of that convention.
- The Commission also considers that there are strong grounds indicating that those individuals involved in the deliberate destruction of civilian food and food sources committed serious violations of the laws and customs of war amounting to war crimes.
- Finally, the Commission is of the view that there are strong grounds indicating that certain individuals in the Indonesian military committed the crime against humanity of extermination. The Commission considers that the series of actions taken by the Indonesian military described above are sufficient to amount to extermination[*] carried out as part of a widespread and systematic attack on the civilian population of Timor-Leste. The Commission considers that those who designed and implemented the policies discussed above did so intentionally and knowingly. In any event, the Commission considers that those in positions of command within the Indonesian military and civil administration must have known of the acts committed by their subordinates, but failed to take any action to prevent or punish them. On this basis the Commission considers that crimes against humanity were committed through the infliction of famine upon the East Timorese people.

Violations of the laws of war

281. In addition to the examples cited above the Indonesian security forces were also responsible for the violation of the international laws governing the conduct of warfare in a number of specific ways.

These included the following:

282. The Commission considers that the senior commanders of the Indonesian military forces at the time and the Government of Indonesia are responsible for violations of the fundamental principle of international humanitarian law that civilians must not be made the target of military attacks during hostilities.

* The Statute of the International Criminal Court defines "extermination" as including the intentional infliction of conditions of life, inter alia, through the deprivation of access to food and medicine, calculated to bring about the destruction of part of a population. Extermination has constituted a form of crime against humanity under customary international law since at least the trials of the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg.

283. The Commission finds that the senior commanders of the Indonesian security forces at the time and the Government of Indonesia are responsible for violations of the principles of the laws and customs of war prohibiting indiscriminate and disproportionate military attacks. The Commission also considers that the Indonesian security forces breached the requirement under the laws and customs of war, reflected in Article 26 of the Regulations annexed to the Fourth Hague Convention of 1907, to warn of impending attacks.

284. The Commission finds that the senior commanders of the Indonesian security forces at the time and the Government of Indonesian are responsible for violating the principles of the laws and customs of war that prohibit the direct and intentional destruction of civilian property, and are also responsible for breaching Article 53 of the Fourth Geneva Convention which prohibits an occupying power from destroying real or personal property except where it is absolutely necessary for military operations.

285. The Commission considers that the Indonesian security forces also violated the prohibition on pillage contained in Article 33 of the Fourth Geneva Convention.

286. The Commission finds that Indonesian security forces use of chemicals to poison food and water supplies violated the customary prohibition contained in Article 23(a) of the Regulations annexed to the Fourth Hague Convention of 1907 on the use of poison.

287. The Commission considers that the Indonesian security forces' use of napalm and other incendiary devices violated the customary prohibition on the use of weapons causing superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering.

288. The Commission considers that the Government of Indonesia and its security forces violated Article 51 of the Fourth Geneva Convention which prohibits an occupying power from compelling civilians to serve in its armed or auxiliary forces, and from using pressure or propaganda to secure voluntary enlistment; and the customary rule reflected in Article 23 of the Regulations annexed to the Fourth Hague Convention of 1907 that prohibits any belligerent from compelling nationals of a hostile party to take part in operations of war directed against their own country.

Economic and social rights

289. The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR) recognises that because they are at different stages of economic development, states are not equally able to realise fully all the rights set out in the Covenant. The obligation on states is to take steps to achieve the progressive realisation of social and economic rights to the maximum extent that their resources allow. However, at the same time, states have core responsibilities, which they must always fulfil. These include responsibilities to provide for certain basic needs, such as food, shelter, essential medicines and basic education. It is also required that states not act in a discriminatory manner in the provision of economic and social benefits and that they not take retrogressive measures that cause people's enjoyment of these rights actually to deteriorate. The Commission believes that Indonesia violated economic and social rights at all these levels.

290. In many instances the state took extreme security measures that were at odds with meeting its core responsibilities, and that had retrogressive and discriminatory impacts. Examples of rights violated as a result of such measures and policies are the following:

- Rights to health (International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR) Article 12, Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC) Article 24) were violated in political prisons and through the use of torture and in the deplorable conditions of the relocation camps. In 1999 the TNI and the militias damaged 77% of health facilities and virtually all of the country's medical equipment and medicine was looted or destroyed.[10]
- Rights to education (ICESCR Article 13, United Nations Declaration on Human Rights (UNDHR) Article 26, CRC Articles 28-29) were violated for those forced into resettlement camps and into military service as "operations assistants" (Tenaga Bantuan Operasi, TBO).
- Rights to freely chosen work (ICESCR Article 6, UDHR Article 23, International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) Article 8(3a), CRC Article 32, 38(2)) were violated by forced recruitment into military operations as TBOs, civilian militia or human shields and by forced labour of other kinds.
- Rights to housing (ICESCR Article 11, UDHR Article 25) were violated through forced evictions and mass destruction of houses.
- Rights to an adequate standard of living (ICESCR Article 11, UDHR Article 25, CRC Article 27) were violated in the displacement of civilians to squalid detention camps.
- The right of the East Timorese people to freely dispose of their natural wealth and resources (ICESCR Article 1(2), ICCPR Article 1(2)) was violated by the forcible extraction of a variety of agricultural commodities and natural resources, including coffee, sandalwood and other types of timber, and by the Timor Gap Zone of Cooperation Treaty, signed between Indonesia and Australia, that divided up proceeds of lucrative oil and gas fields without consultation with the East Timorese people or their interests being taken into consideration.

291. At the same time the Commission has found that, largely because security was its overriding preoccupation, the State of Indonesia failed to realise the economic and social rights of the East Timorese people to the maximum extent possible. Thus its investment programme in the territory was heavily skewed towards sectors, such as transport, communications and public administration, which could directly enhance security, at the expense of other sectors, such as agriculture and health, which might have alleviated poverty and increased the people's welfare. In addition the Commission received much evidence that the funds that were allocated to sectors such as health and education failed to enhance the welfare of the East Timorese for a number of reasons, including the highly militarised context in which they were delivered.

292. Finally, whatever economic advances had been made during the occupation were largely undone by the comprehensive destruction after the ballot in 1999 by the TNI and the militia groups of assets, ranging from public buildings to irrigation projects to power stations, in which the Indonesian state had invested. To describe this orgy of violence as "retrogressive" is plainly grossly inadequate in relation to its scale and mean-spirited vindictiveness (see Vol. III, Part 7.9: Economic and Social Rights).

Responsibility and accountability of the East Timorese political parties

> I initiated the 11 August movement [of 1975]…There was no control. Who is at fault? I am at fault. I accept this. You do not need to look for many people to blame. So many people killed…we forgot our biggest responsibility…I did wrong, because I did not understand the Timorese people…
> It is important that we have tolerance in our hearts, reconciliation in our hearts. I do not believe that Timorese people wish to take justice into their own hands…if we recognise (our mistakes), we do not forget in order to forgive…We should look at the past, to see who did wrong, who did bad things, but analyse this with one intention – so that in the future we understand what was bad and do not repeat this.

> I say that the massacres by Fretilin [in Aileu and Same], Fretilin as an organisation must take responsibility…Fretilin as an organisation must take responsibility…and I do not run away from this…When I hear people who come to me say "my brother, my father, my family was killed by Fretilin who accused them of being traitors. Are we now traitors or not? We want to know this." When we hear this…we know that we need to resolve this, that it cannot go on like this.

> Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974–1976, 15–18 December 2003 (speaking in his personal capacity as an Historical Actor).

293. The issue of responsibility for the outbreak of hostilities during the period of internal conflict in Timor-Leste in 1975 is complex for a number of reasons:

- After the Carnation Revolution a number of factors blunted the effectiveness of successive Portuguese Governments in their handling of the Timor-Leste question: politics in Portugal were highly fluid and unstable, including at crucial moments during the period leading up to the Indonesian invasion of Timor-Leste; there were many competing power centres in Lisbon which were unable to develop a coherent policy on the future of the territory; and the succession of governments that came to power after the revolution saw the decolonisation of Portugal's African empire as a primary responsibility. Although Portugal did eventually devise a broadly acceptable timetable for the decolonisation of Timor-Leste, all of these factors contributed to its failure to do so in a timely fashion. Moreover, it did not seriously attempt to offset its weak position vis-à-vis Indonesia by making a firm commitment to the principle of self-determination or by taking steps to internationalise the issue.

- Due to centuries of arbitrary rule and the exclusion of the East Timorese people from participation in government, the legacies of Portuguese colonialism included weak respect for the rule of law and poorly developed state institutions.
- A host of factors neutralised the colonial army's capacity to intervene in events. These included: low morale among the Portuguese-born conscripts in the territory, the running down of troop strength, the determination not to shed another drop of blood for the colonies, the ambivalence of some conscripts and men to the principle of political neutrality at a time when the colonial wars in Africa and the revolution in Portugal had had the effect of radicalising the Portuguese armed forces, and the politicisation of East Timorese conscript and regular soldiers
- The political inexperience of the Fretilin and UDT leaderships prevented them from seeing the dangers of a descent into violence and the urgency of finding common ground. Instead the youthful leaders of these political parties used violent rhetoric against their political opponents, encouraging their members to resort to actual physical violence.
- The absence of key institutions, including those of civil society and an independent media, and the failure of existing non-governmental institutions, including the Catholic Church, to rise above politics meant that where they played any role at all it was to exacerbate rather than calm tensions.
- Indonesia's role in destabilising the situation in Portuguese Timor from 1974 through a range of actions that included assistance to Apodeti and the manipulation of internal politics through its contacts with elements in the UDT leadership further heightened tensions.
- For a variety of reasons, of which the most important was a desire not to alienate Indonesia, all the international and regional actors who might have restrained Indonesia refused to make it clear from the beginning that a forcible Indonesian takeover of Portuguese Timor would be an unacceptable violation of the principle of the right to self-determination.

294. All of these factors had already helped create a highly unstable and unpredictable situation by August 1975. However, the Commission finds that UDT is responsible for irreversibly changing that situation when it launched its armed movement on 11 August 1975.

295. This armed movement introduced large-scale armed violence as an element in the political conflict which led to a response in kind by Fretilin. It definitively ended already slim hopes that the Portuguese plan for decolonisation might work. The subsequent defeat of UDT when Fretilin launched its armed insurrection led to the flight of its leadership over the border into Indonesian West Timor where it aligned itself with Indonesian aims. Furthermore this series of events gave the Indonesian Government a pretext for intervention, allowing it to claim that it was doing so to put an end to an intra-Timorese conflict that was threatening regional stability.

296. The eventual result of this resort to violence was the death of thousands of East Timorese people, and a polarisation of the population the legacy of which continues to the present day. The ICRC reported that a total of 3,000 persons were killed during the main period of violent "civil war".

297. Although Fretilin launched its general insurrection in response to UDT's illegal action, the Commission finds that members of Fretilin involved in the insurrection were responsible for significantly more unlawful killings and other violations against civilians, prisoners, the sick and wounded than had been committed during UDT's armed movement.

298. Members of the Apodeti, KOTA and Trabalhista parties share in the responsibility for the invasion of Timor-Leste by Indonesia by their political actions in the signing of the Balibó Declaration and for their participation as "Partisan" troops in the Indonesian invasion of Timor-Leste.

The responsibility and accountability of Fretilin/Falintil

299. The Commission received reports of over 5,000 human rights violations committed by members of Fretilin/Falintil during the whole period of conflict from 1974 to 1999.

Unlawful killings

300. Witnesses and victims of violations identified representatives of Fretilin/Falintil as the perpetrators in almost half of all reports of unlawful killings of civilians during 1975, including those by ABRI and its auxiliaries. This figure dropped significantly to approximately 16% during the period which included the internal purges, 1976–1984. In later years the proportion of all reported unlawful killings which were perpetrated by Fretilin/Falintil again fell sharply, to about 4% during the years 1985–1998.[*]

301. During the mass violence in 1999 less than 1% of all the executions reported to the Commission were committed by representatives of Fretilin/Falintil. The very low percentage of unlawful killings attributed to Fretilin/Falintil in 1999 is consistent with the qualitative information received by the Commission about Falintil's strategic response to militia and TNI violence. The Falintil Commander-in-Chief, Xanana Gusmão, ordered his troops not to retaliate against militia and TNI attacks, and in early August Falintil took the further step of unilaterally "cantoning" its troops at four separate regional sites. The goal of this policy was to neutralise any Indonesian attempt to explain away the violence as a purely intra-Timorese affair and to avoid giving the TNI a pretext for openly which matter.

* In 1987 Falintil was separated from Fretilin. As Commander-in-Chief of Falintil, Xanana Gusmão, resigned from Fretilin. The following year he became President of the National Council of Maubere Resistance (Conselho Nacional da Resistencia Maubere, CNRM), the more broad-based successor to the Conselho Revolucionaria da Resistencia Nacional (CRRN) and the forerunner of even more broad-based the National Council of Timorese Resistance (Concelho Nacional da Resistencia Timorense, CNRT), which was formed in 1998. Reflecting the leading role of the armed front of the Resistance, as represented by Falintil, from the early 1980s the overwhelming majority of violations attributed to Fretilin/Falintil, though much smaller in number than in the early years of the Resistance, were perpetrated by Falintil. See Vol. I, Part 4: Resistance: Structure and Strategy.

Detention and torture

302. The Fretilin reaction to the armed movement by UDT involved the arbitrary detention of hundreds of UDT leaders and supporters. Fretilin detained the largest number of UDT supporters in the first week of the armed general insurrection, 20-27 August 1975. As Fretilin controlled the territory, many UDT leaders and members fled over the border to West Timor. Leaders of the Apodeti, KOTA and Trabalhista political parties were also detained. Sometimes family members of these victims were detained as well.

303. Members and supporters of Fretilin and Fretilin forces inflicted widespread cruel, inhumane and degrading treatment on the prisoners they detained during the internal armed conflict. These acts occurred in every district of Timor-Leste except Oecussi but were concentrated in the districts of Ermera, Dili, Manufahi, Bobonaro, Liquiçá, Manatuto and Baucau.

304. Many former detainees of Fretilin report being heavily beaten and otherwise tortured. Representatives of Fretilin also actively engaged the civilian population in the punishment of UDT members. Many detainees died or were killed while in detention. After the Indonesian invasion, Fretilin continued to hold up to several thousand people, depriving them of food and water and making them perform forced labour such as carrying heavy goods and cultivating fields. Some prisoners died in these conditions and others were executed.

305. Evidence provided to the Commission included reports of the following methods of torture committed by representatives of Fretilin during this period:

- Heavy beatings by hand or with an implement including a rifle, an iron bar, wooden sticks, bamboo, rattan, car-brake cords, a helmet, a pestle, nails and a barbed whip. Some detainees were beaten to death or until they were unconscious, blind or deaf.

- Prisoners ordered to beat each other, including prisoners who were related to each other
- Stabbing
- Whipping
- Tying detainees up before beating them so that they could not defend themselves
- Dragging detainees along the ground until they were torn and bleeding
- Stripping detainees naked and forcing them to sleep on the rough ground.

306. In the immediate aftermath of the Indonesian invasion most of Fretilin's prisoners were concentrated in Aileu. To prevent them from joining forces with the Indonesians or supplying them with information, those prisoners who were not executed in Aileu (see par. 307, Arbitrary Executions, below) were moved en masse either west to Ainaro or south to Maubisse and then to Same Town (Manufahi). The prisoners taken to Ainaro were released when they reached there. With Indonesian forces also advancing along the southern route and from the southern coast, their captors and local Fretilin leaders and supporters succumbed to vicious resentment towards those suspected of collaborating with the invaders, who became the victims of further violations.

Arbitrary executions

307. The Commission finds that before the UDT armed movement of 11 August 1975 members of the Fretilin and UDT parties were involved in a number of violent confrontations in the districts of Dili, Ainaro and Ermera. After the armed movement by UDT, Fretilin's armed insurrection involved not only the detention of UDT supporters but also the summary execution of individuals suspected of affiliation with UDT, and a lesser number who were affiliated with Apodeti.

308. The killings occurred largely in Liquiçá, Aileu, Ermera, Dili and Manufahi. In most cases these killings were committed against specifically identified UDT leaders and individuals who had been involved in violent acts during the armed movement. However there were also some random killings and instances of mass executions of prisoners, such as in Aileu and Manufahi. Over one hundred detainees were executed by Fretilin forces in Aileu, between December 1975 and January 1976.

309. Evidence given to the Commission included reports of the following methods used by members of Fretilin in the execution of civilians and captured combatants:

- Beheading
- Ordering detainees to line up and then executing them by shooting
- Tying prisoners to flag poles and then executing them by shooting
- Beating civilians and detainees and then executing them
- Random shooting of groups of civilians in communities suspected of political opposition
- Failing to treat the wounds of those captured, which resulted in death
- Execution of prisoners and civilians using traditional weapons, such as machetes, spears and knives

- Mass execution of detainees by throwing a grenade into a group of non-combatants
- Tying of victims to a tree then beating to death.

310. Victims and witnesses reported that the following incidents involving serious violations against prisoners by persons identified as being affiliated with Fretilin took place between August 1975 and February 1976 in the districts of Aileu, Ainaro, Ermera, Liquiçá, Manatuto and Manufahi.*

- On 7 August 1975, Fretilin forces attacked the aldeias of Maleria, Lumluli and Usululi in Maulau Village (Maubisse, Ainaro), killing scores of civilians and destroying property and livestock.
- On 20 August 1975, Fretilin captured eight men in Fatisi (Laulara, Aileu) on suspicion of being UDT spies; all of these men were subsequently killed by Fretilin forces.
- On 20 August 1975, Fretilin members captured and detained 40 UDT members in Asumanu (Liquiçá, Liquiçá). Eight persons from this group were subsequently killed by Fretilin in the aldeia of Hatumatilo.
- On 20 August 1975, Fretilin abducted seven members of UDT in Kaitugloa (Liquiçá), the men were taken to Darulete (Liquiçá, Liquiçá) and executed.
- On 22 August, Fretilin forces entered Paramin village (Atsabe, Ermera) and killed 11 people on suspicion of being Apodeti supporters.
- On 22 August 1975, a Fretilin member shot and wounded a UDT supporter in Maubisse (Ainaro). Family members of the victim believe he was later executed in Aissirimou (Aileu) on 26 August 1975.
- On 27 August 1975, Fretilin forces detained and executed an Apodeti leader, Celestino da Silva, in Same (Manufahi).
- On 30 August, Fretilin forces killed a UDT member in Tokoluli (Railaco, Ermera).
- Some time in August 1975, Fretilin forces, armed with arrows and spears, captured eight persons in the village of Seloi-Malere (Aileu, Aileu). The victims were tied up and dragged along the street, one man was severely beaten during the attack.
- On or around 3 September 1975, Fretilin forces killed four persons in the district of Aileu.
- On 4 September, Fretilin forces attacked the village of Hatuconan (Laclo, Manatuto) and arrested 12 members of UDT. Fretilin forces subsequently executed nine of these men in a place called Makati.
- On 7 September, Fretilin forces shot and beheaded another man in Laclo (Manatuto).
- On 15 September, Fretilin forces entered the village of Katra Kraik (Letefoho, Ermera) and executed seven UDT supporters.
- On 25 September, two members of Fretilin shot a UDT Commander in Ermera. The victim had been subjected to a Fretilin-led Commission of Inquiry hearing in Ermera the same day.

* Further details of each of these killings are provided in Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances.

- Some time in September 1975, Fretilin forces executed one person in Railaco (Ermera) who was part of a group of 50 UDT supporters who had surrendered to Fretilin troops.
- In December 1975, Fretilin forces killed ten detainees held at the Fretilin prison in Aissirimou, Aileu, including the former chief of the Portuguese police, Colonel Rui Gouveia Maggiolo. Fretilin troops, armed with G-3 weapons, ordered the prisoners to stand in a line and shot them.
- In December 1975, Fretilin forces executed up to 160 prisoners in Manifunih Hun, Aissirimou (Aileu).
- In December 1975, Fretilin forces shot up to 26 prisoners in Aissirimou (Aileu).
- On 28 December 1975, Fretilin forces executed six prisoners in Maubisse, Ainaro.
- On or around 27 January 1976, Fretilin forces took eight persons out of detention in Hola Rua (Same, Manufahi), including the Secretary General of Apodeti, José Fernando Osório Soares, and executed seven of them in a place nearby called Hat Nipah.
- On 29 January 1976, Fretilin forces transferred 34 detainees from Hola Rua to an elementary school building in Same where they were held with ten other detainees. Nine detainees managed to escape while being transported from the school to a "public hearing", though two others were killed. In apparent reprisal for the escape, Fretilin forces opened fire on the remaining prisoners held in the school building. Approximately 30 people died in this incident and four survived.

Detention and torture

311. After the Indonesian invasion Fretilin continued to detain people across the territory within the Fretilin controlled "liberated zones" (zonas libertadas). The Fretilin Central Committee routinely used detention to maintain discipline and to punish persons known or suspected of political opposition or contact with the occupying forces. In practice any political or non-political act or suspected act that Fretilin leaders or officials disapproved of could be denounced as a breach of Fretilin rules.

312. Detainees were held in primitive structures such as enclosures resembling pig pens and chicken coops, bamboo huts and holes in the ground. In the beginning these were simply places in which people were detained, but in 1977 many detention centres were turned into national rehabilitation camps, known as Renals.

313. Renals were nominally established for the purpose of the political "re-education". In some Renals detainees did in fact receive political "re-education" and literacy training as well as being required to work in communal fields. In others, however, the regime was extremely harsh: detainees told the Commission of heavy forced labour, minimal food rations and frequent beatings. Many detainees died as a result of these conditions.

314. Sentences of imprisonment were theoretically indefinite (until a detainee was deemed rehabilitated) and periods of detention often lasted until Indonesian forces captured or forced the abandonment of the base where the Renal was located.

315. Evidence considered by the Commission included witness accounts of the following methods of torture and ill-treatment commonly suffered by victims:

- Heavy beatings by hand, with a rifle, with thorny branches or other pieces of wood
- Burning the victim's flesh with heated iron rods, cigarettes, or burning pieces of wood
- Whipping
- Tying victims to a tree or pole and leaving them in the sun for long periods
- Tying victims in a way that their movement was highly restricted and they could not feed themselves or go to the toilet
- Urinating on victims
- Placing victims in a hole filled with ants
- Kicking with heavy military boots.

316. Detainees were subject to a layered practice of justice (critica-autocritica, justo correctivo and justiça popular – see Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy) with different procedures depending on the gravity of the offence.

317. Those accused of the most serious offences, such as treason, had to submit to justiça popular, which did not recognise even the most basic safeguards for procedural fairness. The accused was not informed of the nature of the accusations before "trial", was not presumed to be innocent and had no right of reply to the accusations made. Many of the accused were detained for months before being subjected to the process of "trial". The people attending the "trial" were asked to give their verdict. There was no appeal against decisions or punishments. Sentences were decided on by senior Falintil or Fretilin officials, often the same ones who had been involved in the initial arrest, and were often harsh and disproportionate to the alleged crime, commonly including death by execution.

Arbitrary executions

318. The Commission heard extensive testimony about the killing of non-combatants perpetrated by Fretilin and Falintil during the period February 1976–1979. During this period leaders and members of both organisations were implicated in fatal violations in most districts across the territory. Senior Fretilin leaders and Falintil commanders ordered many of the killings reported to the Commission, and in some instances themselves perpetrated them. Although some of those killed were civilians previously associated with UDT and Apodeti, who were collaborating with the Indonesians, most of those who killed, disappeared or died of deprivation or other kinds of ill-treatment during this period were themselves members of Fretilin or Falintil or members of the civilian population living in Fretilin bases.

319. Between 1980 and 1999 the scale of reported killings by Falintil was far lower than in 1976–1979. Moreover the pattern of killings was very different from the earlier period. The victims were persons who were not part of the Resistance but who were working with the Indonesians (sometimes against their will) and the random casualties of Falintil attacks.

320. The Commission heard of a number of killings committed by Fretilin in 1976–1979 against persons who were associated with other parties, most of the victims known to the Commission being associated with UDT. The killings tended to occur in areas, such as the districts of Ermera and Manatuto, where support for both UDT and Fretilin had been strong and the level of violence during the "civil war" had been particularly intense.

321. In some instances UDT members were killed by ordinary Fretilin members motivated by feelings of revenge. In other cases, such as the killing of at least nine people in Venilale (Baucau) between 1 and 12 February 1976, there is evidence of higher-level involvement. The Commission also received reports of the killing of former UDT members who were suspected of spying for the Indonesians and of persons who were executed because they had allegedly been in contact with UDT relatives in the Indonesian-controlled areas.

322. In 1976–1977 around 60 people were executed or died in detention, as a result of conflicts within the Resistance. They included:

- Aquiles Freitas, commander of the Bero-Quero Command in Quelicai (Baucau), and several of his chief associates, including Ponciano dos Santos, Antonio Freitas and João Teodoso de Lima were executed at Lobito (Vemasse, Baucau) and in Baguia (Baguia, Baucau) in December 1976-January 1977;
- Francisco Ruas Hornay and at least 14 of his followers, who were executed in Iliomar (Lautém) in November 1976;
- The former Falintil Deputy Chief of Staff, José da Silva, and possibly 40 of his followers, who were executed or died in detention between October 1976 and August 1977 after being arrested in Ermera District in October 1976.

323. In the Fretilin internal conflict that erupted in 1977 several hundred followers and suspected followers of the Fretilin President, Francisco Xavier do Amaral, were executed or died as a result of torture and ill-treatment in detention. The purge was concentrated in Aileu, and Manufahi in the North Central and South Central Sectors, to a lesser extent in Quelicai in Baucau District, Uato Carbau and Uatolari in Viqueque District in the Central Eastern Sector, and Covalima and Ermera in the South Frontier and North Frontier Sectors. Those targeted included members of the Central Committee, senior military commanders and middle-level cadres of Fretilin and its affiliate organisations as well ordinary Fretilin members, Falintil troops and members of the civilian population living in the Fretilin bases.

324. Many of the victims of these purges died in horrific circumstances, including:

- In public mass executions conducted with the utmost brutality;
- As a result of severe deprivation in extremely primitive detention centres and Renals where the food, shelter, sanitation and medical treatment that prisoners were given were grossly inadequate, their inadequacy seemingly being an intrinsic part of the prison regime;

- As a result of severe torture in detention involving such methods as burning with hot irons, repeated heavy beatings, hanging the victim from a tree and cutting of the victim's body.

325. The Commission finds that the senior Fretilin leaders not only knew of and approved these practices, which generally occurred at or near places where the Fretilin Central Committee and the Sectoral and Zone administrations had their bases, but in many instances were themselves direct perpetrators.

326. In addition to the killings and deaths related to political conflict within Fretilin there were other circumstances in which Fretilin/ Falintil committed these violations. Among the categories of victims reported to the Commission to have been executed or to have died of deprivation or other kinds of ill-treatment while in detention were the following:

- Civilians who were suspected of planning to surrender, were in the process of surrendering, or who had actually surrendered;
- Local Fretilin or Falintil leaders or members who had encouraged the civilian population to surrender;
- People who broke away from the main population concentrations, were captured and some or all of their members executed;
- Detainees killed as Indonesian forces closed on the areas where they were detained;
- Villagers suspected of or actually belonging to "pro-integration" parties killed as Indonesian forces advanced on an area;
- Persons holding dissenting ideological views;
- People who after surrender were ordered by ABRI, Hansip or members of the civil administration to return to the jungle to try to persuade people still holding out to surrender;
- Persons who rejoined the Resistance after previously surrendering or being captured by the Indonesians;
- The relatives of collaborators, as well as collaborators themselves;
- Persons blamed for failed Fretilin attacks on Indonesian bases and successful Indonesian attacks on Fretilin and Falintil bases;
- People living in Fretilin bases who had been in contact with people in Indonesian-controlled areas;
- People living in the resistance bases, under Indonesian control or in areas not fully under the control of either side who were found looking for food or going about their daily activities.

327. While acknowledging the intense pressure created by indiscrimate Indonesian offensives against their bases, particularly in the later years of this period, the Commission holds the Fretilin/Falintil leadership of the time responsible for creating an atmosphere of violence and ideologically-based intolerance which provided the preconditions in which this extraordinarily wide range of killings occurred. In addition the Commssion finds that Fretilin/Falintil leaders and commanders were responsible for ordering or directly perpetrating many of these killings.

328. Between 1980 and 1999, there was a sharp drop in the number of killings attributed to Falintil. Because East Timorese society became so heavily militarised during this period, the status of many of the civilians who were killed by Fretilin/Falintil was often ambiguous. These included people who were forcibly put in harm's way, whether as Hansip, as persons forcibly recruited as TBOs (tenaga bantuan operasi, operations assistants) or to take part in the various Operasi Kikis, persons required to perform night-guard duties or as unwilling recruits to the militia groups. The Commission believes that responsibility for deaths in these circumstances should rest primarily with those who put the victim in harm's way, namely the Indonesian security forces. In addition many of the victims of Falintil killings were Hansip, village chiefs and other members of the civil administration, holding positions that, unlike in most of Indonesia, had become highly militarised in occupied Timor-Leste.

329. Because the dividing line between combatants and non-combatants was often blurred and because it is not always clear from the available information that a particular victim was a specific target, it has not always been possible for the Commission on the basis of the information available to it to judge whether a violation has in fact occurred, and if it has, where responsibility for it lies.

330. The downward trend in unlawful killings by the Resistance, which was particularly marked during the final decade of the Indonesian occupation, is explained by several related developments. A new policy was adopted shifting the focus of the struggle to urban protest. Although Falintil remained alive and militarily capable, this policy shift gave greater prominence to public protests in the towns than to Falintil's previously favoured tactic of demonstrating that it was a force still be reckoned with through shows of force in the countryside. This trend was accelerated by the Indonesian decision in late 1988 to "open" the territory partially to outsiders. At the same time the decision to pursue the National Unity strategy and to build as broad as possible a base of support for the Resistance, including by winning over East Timorese who were collaborating with the Indonesians, probably also contributed to the decline in violence in these years. As a part of this strategy in 1987 the armed Resistance, Falintil, was formally separated from Fretilin.

331. During this period 1980–1999 Falintil killed civilians in the following circumstances:

- During attacks on military-controlled settlements in early 1980s, which were apparently intended to demonstrate to the population now under Indonesian control that Falintil had survived;
- During Indonesian military operations for which East Timorese had been recruited, usually forcibly;
- During attacks on villages in the mid-1980s, which were apparently in response to major Indonesian operations and intended to show that Falintil still retained a military capacity to launch such attacks; village guards and Hansip were particularly vulnerable to be killed during such incidents;
- During attacks launched at particular times, including anniversaries (such as Indonesian Independence Day and the anniversary of the founding of Falintil) and during national elections, when they could be expected to attract attention internationally and in Indonesia and Timor-Leste.

332. These killings occurred in the context of military operations and, as noted above, the Commission often found it difficult to establish whether civilians killed in these circumstances were specifically targeted.

333. There were reported instances of targeted killings during this period when, for example, Falintil killed civilians who had been ordered by ABRI/TNI to search for relatives in the forest on their own, when it assassinated members of Hansip and other collaborators, and before and after the Popular Consultation in 1999. In at least some of these cases the Commission received credible information that the Falintil High Command did not institutionally condone these violations.

Forced displacement and famine

334. The massive programme of bombing and execution of civilians by the Indonesian security forces during and after the invasion caused hundreds of thousands of East Timorese to flee their homes and villages. In response Fretilin declared a policy of evacuating the civilian population to safety and of organising a national liberation movement in the mountains.

335. In many Fretilin-controlled areas living conditions in the months after the initial flight were extremely difficult. Their problems were somewhat alleviated once structures had been established to support activities such as communal farming and to provide for the needs of the most vulnerable. However, even where such organisation was in place the death rate continued to be abnormally high.

336. As the Indonesian military campaign intensified, Fretilin and the population under their control were forced to move into more isolated areas. Food became increasingly scarce and the question of whether the civilians who accompanied Fretilin should surrender became a major issue. Those affected were in a dire predicament. They had heard that those who surrendered to the Indonesians were placed in camps, and often tortured or killed. They knew, however, that if they remained in the mountains they were likely to starve to death. The issue of surrender could not be discussed openly, for fear of reprisals from the Fretilin leadership.

337. The Commission recognises the extremely difficult decisions faced by the Fretilin leadership at this time. The survival of those under their command was their direct responsibility, as was the survival of the entire Resistance movement. There was a real danger that persons who surrendered would, either under duress or voluntarily, divulge the whereabouts of those who remained. If this happened those remaining in the jungles and mountains would be likely to come under attack. At the same time individual families also needed to make life-and-death decisions. They were faced with the prospect of starvation and death if they did not surrender, and an uncertain future with quite possibly the same outcome, if they did.

338. Although the issues surrounding surrender are complex, it is clear that inexcusable decisions to inflict severe ill-treatment and torture, and in some cases to kill people who wanted to surrender, were taken. The Fretilin leadership at the time remain responsible for extreme violations of victims' rights entailed by their decisions, which cannot be justified under any circumstances.

339. During the period before the ballot in 1999, Falintil exercised genuine restraint, including through the cantonment of its forces. In general they acted with extraordinary discipline, in the face of widespread killings of civilians conducted by the Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries.

Violations of principles of international law by Fretilin/Falintil

340. The Commission holds the Fretilin party institutionally responsible for violations committed during the internal armed conflict. For the period 1976–1999 it has used the term Resistance, which comprised armed combatants[*] and civilian members of the clandestine movement some of whom were members of Fretilin.[†]

The internal armed conflict

341. During the period of the internal armed conflict, Fretilin's conduct violated the standards set out in Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions. This Article prohibits certain types of behaviour directed at civilians or combatants who have laid down their arms because of capture, wounding or another cause. Prohibited conduct includes:

- Killing
- Violence to the person, including torture or cruel treatment
- Humiliating or degrading treatment or other outrages upon personal dignity.

342. The Commission finds that Fretilin's conduct during the period of the internal armed conflict included multiple and repeated prohibited acts. Executions of civilians, as well as suspected or known UDT supporters or members, were clear violations for which Fretilin was responsible under international humanitarian law.

343. While the detention of civilians and enemy combatants is not specifically prohibited by Common Article 3, the torture, beating and other cruel treatment of those detained are in violation of that provision. The Commission finds that in this regard Fretilin is also accountable for numerous violations of humanitarian law. In addition the Commission finds that the treatment of those held in detention by Fretilin was often degrading or humiliating, in violation of the principles of humanitarian law.

The international armed conflict 1976–1999

344. During the international armed conflict the rules contained in the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and those that are part of customary international law were binding

* Described in this Report as "Fretilin/Falintil", due to difficulties to accurately distinguish between the membership of the party and the Falintil combatants.

† Because international human rights law imposes obligations on states rather than non-state organisations such as political parties and liberation movements, Fretilin cannot be responsible under international law for breaching such standards. However, international humanitarian law imposes obligations not only on states but also on non-state organisations, such as Fretilin.

on Fretilin/Falintil as a party to the international conflict. The Commission has found that Fretilin/Falintil's conduct was at times in violation of these rules, giving rise to legal responsability on the part of Fretilin/Falintil.

345. The Commission has found that Fretilin/Falintil's forces perpetrated executions, arbitrary detentions, torture and ill-treatment of civilians and held many detained civilians in inhumane conditions. All such conduct is prohibited by Article 27 of the Fourth Geneva Convention which requires that civilians be treated humanely and with respect for their persons and honour, and that they particularly be protected against violence or threats of violence. While the Convention provides that the parties to a conflict may take steps in respect of civilians that are necessary for security as a result of the war, this could never extend to practices such as unlawful killings, and torture and ill-treatment. Such conduct is expressly prohibited by Article 32 of the Fourth Geneva Convention along with any act that causes the physical suffering or extermination of civilians. The use of physical or psychological torture to extract information from civilian prisoners is expressly prohibited (Article 31 of the Fourth Geneva Convention). The Commission finds that members of Fretilin/Falintil in some cases violated this principle in an attempt to gather intelligence from known or suspected supporters of Indonesia.

346. Although Fretilin/Falintil was entitled, according to Article 5 of the Fourth Geneva Convention, to deny some of the protections of humanitarian law to those who were engaged in activities hostile to it, it was required nonetheless to treat those persons with humanity, and to provide them with the rights to a fair trial. By failing to guarantee that those suspected of betraying Fretilin/Falintil were entitled to a fair and regular trial and humane treatment, members of Fretilin/Falintil breached this obligation in every case in which these suspects were subjected to unfair trials, or summarily beaten, tortured, subjected to inhumane treatment or killed.

Responsibility of Fretilin/Falintil leadership and members

347. The armed conflict between combatants fighting in support of Fretilin and UDT was of sufficient severity to fulfil the definition of an "internal armed conflict" according the body of international law which governs the conduct of war (see Vol. I, Part 2: The Mandate of the Commission). Parties to such a conflict are obliged to comply with international law, and in particular Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions. Legitimate acts of warfare committed against opposing combatants are not violations of these obligations. However, the killing, torture, and other mistreatment of civilians, prisoners, the sick and wounded is strictly prohibited.

348. The Commission finds that the actions of the members of Fretilin/Falintil in hundreds of cases of detention, torture and killing of civilians, prisoners, the wounded and the sick were violations of their duties under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions.

349. The Commission has received a number of eyewitness accounts from victims and witnesses that members of the Fretilin Central Committee were directly involved in or witnessed the torture and killing of prisoners during and after the internal armed conflict and took no action to halt it.

350. The evidence before the Commission is insufficient to establish that these killings and atrocities were carried out in compliance with a directive from the Fretilin Central Committee. However, it had ultimate authority over its members and its armed forces which were deployed at its direction. Members of the Fretilin Central Committee certainly at least knew that widespread atrocities were taking place and did not take sufficient steps to halt them. They also did not take steps to discipline or punish those who were directly responsible for the torture, executions and other serious mistreatment. They are therefore responsible for the consequences of creating a disciplinary framework for the treatment of these prisoners, even when it became apparent that horrific violations were being committed against unarmed and defenceless prisoners and civilians.

351. The Commission finds that some members of the Fretilin Central Committee in December 1975 share in the responsibility for the premeditated and planned execution in Aileu in December 1975 and in Same in January 1976 of possibly as many as 200 UDT and Apodeti supporters whom Fretilin had taken prisoner. It has been able to ascertain that certain individual members of the Fretilin Central Committee took part in the decision to execute at least some of these prisoners and sometimes in the executions themselves. The Commission was informed that the killings in Aileu and Same were with some exceptions carried out according to a set routine in which lists of victims were drawn up, graves prepared and the executions carried out by squads under the command of specific individuals. The Commission considers the employment of such a consistent modus operandi is itself evidence that the killings were carried out systematically. It also believes that other Fretilin Central Committee members, including some of the most senior, who were present in the areas where the executions took place must have been aware that they were being carried out.

352. The Commission has learned of instances between August 1975 and January 1976 where Fretilin leaders did intervene successfully to stop the mass execution of detainees. This indicates to the Commission that these leaders, who included members of the Central Committee, could have put to stop to the killings on other occasions. It seems that it was the intervention of middle-level Falintil commanders from other areas, who had rushed to Same in late January 1976 after hearing of the killings there in late January 1976, that did in the end put a stop to the killings. This suggests to the Commission that more senior leaders could have ended the killing earlier, had they been so inclined. Fretilin's treatment of UDT and Apodeti supporters varied between districts. The Fretilin commanders in the districts personally knew the UDT and Apodeti leaders in their area and many were responsible for identifying those who should be detained. The most brutal treatment of detainees occurred in the Quartel Geral in Taibessi (Dili) and in Aissirimou (Aileu). Prisoners held in Baucau said that they were beaten regularly but only by the guards after their superiors had left. In the districts of Manufahi and Aileu, however, Fretilin leaders were present at the torture of UDT and Apodeti leaders and not only allowed it but sometimes incited the community to attack members of UDT and Apodeti.

353. The number and nature of the violations committed lead the Commission to find that members of the Fretilin Central Committee, senior Falintil commanders and Fretilin district level leaders in the districts of Aileu and Manufahi were either directly involved in the systematic perpetration of violations against civilians, or knew that these violations were being committed by those under their command, and failed to take effective steps to prevent further violations or to punish those responsible. These people were therefore responsible, either directly or indirectly, for the arbitrary detention, torture and execution of prisoners. Some of these individuals are included on the list of multiple perpetrators of serious human rights violations which has been forwarded to the Office of the Prosecutor General with a recommendation for investigation and potential prosecution, and to the Office of the President of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste, with a recommendation that they be barred holding certain strategic or senior public offices in Timor-Leste.

The responsibility and accountability of the UDT political party

354. The Commission considered hundreds of interviews and witness statements provided by victims and witnesses who had themselves been the victims of human rights violations or had witnessed others being victimised by members of UDT. On the basis of this evidence the Commission finds that:

355. On 11 August 1975, the leadership of the UDT party ordered an armed movement the purpose of which was to take control of the political leadership of the territory of Timor-Leste. It is unclear whether this purpose was clearly enunciated in the early stages of the armed movement. However, this was the clear import of the demands made by UDT to the Government of Portuguese Timor within hours of launching its movement.

356. UDT had no legal authority to undertake this action, and by doing so acted in violation of the rights of the East Timorese people to determine their own political, social and economic destiny. The party's action also violated the fundamental freedoms of political belief, freedom of expression and freedom of movement.

357. During its armed movement UDT perpetrated widespread human rights violations against the civilian population, particularly individuals known or believed to be leaders and supporters of the Fretilin political party. Hundreds of civilians were arbitrarily detained, of whom many were tortured, killed and otherwise mistreated.

358. As the armed conflict between combatants fighting in support of Fretilin and UDT was of sufficient severity to fulfil the definition of an "internal armed conflict" according the body of international law which governs the conduct of war, UDT was obliged to comply with international law in the same way as Fretilin during this conflict (see section on Fretilin above). The Commission finds that the detention, torture and killing of civilians, prisoners, the wounded and the sick, carried out by the leaders and supporters by UDT violated Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions as well as applicable Portuguese law.

Arbitrary detention, torture and mistreatment

359. Members of UDT and UDT forces detained victims in every district of Timor-Leste except Oecussi in 1975. Of the cases of detention attributed to UDT which were reported to the Commission, 25.6% (243/950) occurred in Ermera District, 23.0% (218/950) in Dili District and 16.3% (155/950) in Bobonaro District.

360. Of these detentions 20.1% (191/950), were reported to have occurred on the first day of the UDT armed movement, 11 August 1975, and 20.5% (195/950) occurred in the 10 days immediately following.

361. The leadership of UDT failed adequately to plan their action and kept those detained in deplorable conditions, without food or water. Some detainees died as a direct result of the conditions imposed on them. The reported cases of ill-treatment attributed to UDT were overwhelmingly concentrated in Dili District (36.7% [95/259]), Ermera District (20.9% [54/259]) and Bobonaro District (25.9% [67/259]).

362. The victims of arbitrary detention by UDT reported to the Commission were predominantly male, of military age and believed by the perpetrator to have an association with Fretilin. Sometimes family members of these victims, including their wives, parents and children, were arbitrarily detained. In general prisoners were not mistreated in order to extract information, but as a form of punishment in a general climate where violence had become the norm.

363. Most of the victims detained by UDT were kept in buildings near the place of arrest, including warehouses, schools, private houses, a former Portuguese prison, military barracks and pens resembling chicken pens. It also established central detention centres at its headquarters in Palapaço, Dili and in the mill (descascadeira) and the pousada in Baucau, to which both persons arrested locally and detainees arrested in other districts were brought.

364. Periods of detention were short because the armed movement was brief. Most detainees were released within two weeks but some were held for longer than one month. While in detention, detainees were regularly forced to perform such work as cooking for other detainees and cleaning detention centres, building roads or carrying rocks and wood. UDT released some detainees of its own accord but most were abandoned when Fretilin forces attacked an area where detainees were being held and UDT forces fled.

365. UDT made no or inadequate provision for feeding the people whom it detained. Detainees from the main UDT detention centres reported being deprived of food; some received no food for up to nine days. At least two people died due to the conditions in detention. The severity of these conditions amounted to cruel, inhumane and degrading treatment.

366. Witnesses reported that members and supporters of UDT committed the following acts of torture and ill-treatment against those persons who had been illegally detained:

- Heavy beatings by hand or with a rifle, by one perpetrator or sometimes by a group of perpetrators
- Whipping

- Being tied up for long periods, sometimes for more than one week
- Cutting the victim with a machete or razor blades
- Slapping and kicking
- One victim reported being burned with lit cigarettes.

Unlawful killings

367. UDT members and supporters conducted widespread unlawful killings between August and early September 1975, targeting persons who were known or suspected of being members of Fretilin in Liquiçá, Dili, Ermera, Manatuto, Manufahi, Bobonaro and other districts.

368. UDT killings of persons identified as being affiliated with Fretilin occurred in a variety of circumstances. In the immediate aftermath of the launching of the armed movement, Fretilin supporters were captured, killed and often beheaded in Manufahi, Liquiçá and Ermera, sometimes by UDT mobs acting on the orders of their leaders. Prison guards killed individual detainees in UDT detention centres, sometimes, as in Palapaço (Dili), on their own initiative and sometimes, as in Aifu, Ermera, on the orders of party leaders. In late August and early September 1975, persons who had been detained in the days after UDT launched its armed movement were executed in Manufahi and Ermera as Fretilin forces advanced on these areas. The victims of these unlawful killings by UDT were predominantly men of military age with a real or suspected association with Fretilin.

369. Methods of unlawful killings included:

- Armed groups of UDT members shooting unarmed civilians in groups
- The execution of civilians using traditional weapons, such as machetes, spears and knives
- The holding of ritual ceremonies before and after killing
- Beheadings, and display of the decapitated heads as trophies
- The severing of body parts, such as hands, and disembowelment
- The display of corpses in front of homes of Fretilin members
- The disposal of dead or fatally wounded bodies in gorges and rivers
- The execution of detainees in detention centres, and in isolated places in the countryside, including coffee plantations. Some detainees had their hands tied with wire at the time of execution. Others were brought out of detention centres in small groups and then executed.
- Beating before execution
- Disappearance.

Incidents of serious violations

370. Incidents reported to the Commission in which the perpetrators were identified as being members or representatives of the UDT party included the following*:

* For further details, see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment and Part 7.8: The Rights of the Child.

- During August 1975, UDT forces detained at least 70 persons in the Ermera Prison; the detainees were beaten and starved while in detention. Scores of victims were also tortured while detained in smaller detention centres throughout Ermera.
- The Commission received a number of reports indicating that detainees suffered torture and ill-treatment while imprisoned in the pousada and the descascadeira in Baucau in August 1975 when they were being used as detention centres.
- During August 1975, UDT members from Turiscai (Manufahi) killed six members of a family perceived to be Fretilin supporters, including three children aged seven, six and five years old respectively.
- On 11 August 1975, UDT forces killed one male Fretilin supporter in Lete Foho (Same, Manufahi).
- Between 11 and 13 August 1975, UDT members killed at least 13 people in the sub-district of Liquiçá (Liquiçá); in separate incidents in the villages of Asumanu, Darulete, Dato and Leotela (all in Liquiçá Sub-district), three of the victims were beheaded. The head of one of them was displayed in front of the house of a Fretilin leader, while the head of another victim was displayed in front the house of a UDT leader.
- Between 11 and 15 August 1975 in Ermera, UDT members killed three Fretilin officials in separate incidents in the sub-districts of Railaco, Ermera and Hatolia.
- After the armed movement of 11 August 1975, UDT members detained about 70 members of Fretilin in a rice barn in Corluli (Maliana, Bobonaro) for about two months. The detainees were deprived of food and drink while in detention, as a consequence of which two of them died.
- On 11 August 1975, a number of UDT leaders and members arrested a former Fretilin delegate and detained him in Same Prison (Manufahi). The detainee, along with several others, was severely beaten and was not allowed to leave his cell for two weeks.
- During August 1975 (date not specified), UDT members arrested 11 men in Lolotoe (Bobonaro) and detained them in a room for three days without food and water.
- On 14 August, UDT members detained three Fretilin members at the home of a UDT leader in Guda (Lolotoe, Bobonaro). The men were beaten heavily and detained for one week.
- On 14 August, UDT forces killed one man in Aitutu (Same, Manufahi).
- After the UDT armed movement, 100-200 members of Fretilin were detained at the Palapaço detention centre and many suffered severe ill-treatment. During this time three detainees, a member of the Fretilin Central Committee José Siqueira, Domingos da Conceição and José Espirito Santo, were shot dead by their UDT guards.
- Some time in August 1975, all but three members of an 11-person Fretilin peace delegation sent by Francisco Xavier do Amaral to negotiate an end to the cycle of revenge killings that was engulfing the Laclubar-Soibada-

Turiscai area were captured and killed in Fatmakerek (Soibada, Manatuto) on the orders of local UDT leaders.

- On 20 August 1975, an East Timorese woman was gang raped by members of UDT in Maubara Town (Maubara, Liquiçá).
- On 27 August, members of UDT captured a Fretilin delegado, Antonio Salsinha, who had escape from the UDT detention centre in Aifu (Poetete, Ermera). They kicked and beat him and then shot him. He did not die immediately, so the UDT members buried him alive.
- On 27 August, as Fretilin forces approached Same, UDT members took 11 members of the Fretilin youth group, Unetim, who had been detained in Alas and Same since 11 August, to the Meti Oan beach in Wedauberek (Alas, Manufahi) and shot them dead.
- On 28 August, four members of UDT arrested a number of Fretilin delegados and 14 other men from the village of Guda (Lolotoe, Bobonaro). The men were taken to Maliana (Bobonaro) and subsequently severely kicked by UDT members.
- On 1 September 1975, as Fretilin forces were poised to enter Ermera Sub-district from Leorema (Bazartete, Liquiçá) and the Hatolia Sub-district (Ermera), UDT forces killed at least 30 detainees in the villages of Klaek Reman (Ermera, Ermera) Aifu (Poetete, Ermera, Ermera) - four in Klaek Reman and at least 26 in Aifu.

Responsibility and accountability of UDT personnel

371. The perpetrators of arbitrary detention were predominantly UDT leaders at the district level and those acting under their command. These leaders knew the population in each district and were able to effectively target members or supporters of Fretilin. Both the district leaders and those who directly committed these violations are responsible for them.

372. The Commission finds the local leaders who incited hatred and who ordered victims to be detained, beaten, tortured or killed to be responsible and accountable for the consequences of these actions.

373. The Commission finds that the members of the UDT Central Committee are responsible for the consequences caused by inciting their followers through radio broadcasts and other direct orders, to “purge communists”. When the leadership of UDT planned the armed movement, it plainly gave no thought to ensuring that those whose detention it ordered should be adequately fed and cared for. Nor did it instruct its members to treat detainees with restraint.

374. The most severe forms of abuse reported to the Commission occurred at the UDT headquarters in Dili, and in the UDT strongholds of Ermera and Liquiçá. UDT leaders were reported to have been present when killings and other violations were being committed and with rare exceptions either ordered them to take place or did not take any steps to prevent them from happening.

375. The Commission holds the UDT district commanders of the districts of Ermera, Manufahi and Liquiçá in August 1975 responsible and accountable for the serious mass violations, including torture and summary executions of groups of unarmed victims, which were committed by persons who were under their command and control. Some of these individuals are included on the list of multiple perpetrators of serious human rights violations which have been forwarded to the Office of the Prosecutor General with a recommendation for investigation and potential prosecution, and to the Office of the President of the Republic of Timor-Leste, with a recommendation that they be barred holding certain strategic or senior public offices in Timor-Leste.

376. The actions of the members of the UDT Central Committee and other leaders directly brought about a situation in which large numbers of civilians were forcibly detained without a legal basis. The leaders failed to ensure that detainees were held in appropriate conditions. They became aware that widespread violations were being committed by persons under their overall command and control, but rarely took steps to halt the violations and in no instance known to the Commission did they punish the perpetrators. The Commission finds that the leaders of the UDT party at the time of the armed movement are morally, politically and historically responsible for the violations committed by members of UDT during the internal armed conflict, and for the instability which followed. This, however, does not absolve Fretilin leaders and members of responsibility for committing violations against members or supporters of UDT in reprisal for the latter's abuses.

Violations of principles of international law by representatives of the UDT party

377. The Commission finds that UDT's conduct during the civil war period was in many cases in violation of international humanitarian law.*

378. During the civil war, as a party to that internal conflict UDT was required to comply with the standards set out in Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions. This Article prohibits certain types of behaviour directed at civilians or combatants who have laid down their arms because of capture, wounding or another cause. Prohibited conduct includes:

- Killing
- Violence to the person, including torture or cruel treatment
- Humiliating or degrading treatment or other outrages upon personal dignity.

379. The Commission has found that in violation of Common Article 3, UDT killed, tortured and otherwise mistreated civilians and captured members of Fretilin. This conduct was in violation of UDT's obligations under international humanitarian law and UDT accordingly bears legal responsibility for its actions.

* As explained above, because international human rights law imposes obligations on states rather than non-state organisations such as political parties, UDT cannot be said to have any legal responsibility for breaching such standards. However, international humanitarian law imposes obligations not only on states but also on non-state organisations, such as UDT.

The responsibility and accountability of the Apodeti party

380. Although the Commission received significantly fewer reports of violations committed by members of the Apodeti party than by either Fretilin or UDT, the evidence clearly demonstrates that apart from having a direct role in the commission of violations, members of Apodeti also played a role in the Indonesian invasion and supported the military occupation in a variety of ways.

381. The Commission has found that from September 1974 members of Apodeti were in contact with Indonesian military officers. From December 1974 they participated in military training exercises in Atambua, West Timor (Indonesia). This training was undertaken for the explicit purpose of preparing for military action within Timor-Leste, although it is unlikely that the members of Apodeti were aware of the exact details of the Indonesian plans. Approximately 200 Apodeti cadres participated in this training. When the Portuguese colonial authorities travelled to Atambua in January 1975 to try to persuade the members of Apodeti to return to Timor-Leste and play a constructive role in the decolonisation process, they refused and instead continued with their military training.

382. Members of Apodeti worked with Indonesian military and civilian intelligence agents inside Timor-Leste during 1974–1975, undermining the decolonisation process and destabilising the situation in the territory. The actions of members of Apodeti during this period included providing information to the Indonesian military. Some of this information was used in Indonesian radio propaganda whose purpose was to increase the level of instability by undermining relations between Fretilin and UDT.

383. The military training in Atambua led to participation of the members of Apodeti, known as "Partisans", with Indonesian military personnel in covert military action inside Timor-Leste from August 1975, and larger-scale military operations that resulted in the Indonesian occupation of towns and territory from October 1975. During this period members of Apodeti participated in Indonesian military actions which included the attack on Balibó on 16 October 1975.

384. Leaders of the Apodeti party helped formulate and then signed the Balibó Declaration, which helped to provide a veneer of legitimacy to the totally illegal Indonesian occupation.

385. Members of Apodeti participated in the full-scale Indonesian military invasion of Dili and Baucau in December 1975, travelling on Indonesian warships from Indonesian ports to Timor-Leste. They then accompanied Indonesian troops on operations following the invasion.

386. Following the invasion members of Apodeti collaborated with the Indonesian forces in a subordinate role. However, they allowed themselves to be portrayed for propaganda purposes as constituting, with members of UDT and other parties, an East Timorese military force which was bearing the brunt of the war against Fretilin. It thereby fell into line with the programme of misinformation produced by the Indonesian military and government. This described the conflict as essentially an intra-East Timorese affair, when in fact it was the result of an unprovoked Indonesian military invasion. The Commission has also received evidence that some members of the Apodeti party also helped Indonesian intelligence to draw up lists of Fretilin leaders, members and sympathisers, and pointed out individual members of the Fretilin party to the invading Indonesian forces. As a direct result of these activities individuals were detained, tortured and in some cases executed.

387. Throughout the military occupation members of Apodeti worked within the Indonesian security apparatus and the civil administration and continued to do so well after it was abundantly clear that the Indonesian military forces had no intention of allowing the East Timorese people to determine their own political and economic future. By supporting the right of the Indonesian military to occupy and govern Timor-Leste, they share responsibility for the denial of the right to self-determination of the East Timorese people.

388. Members of the "Partisan" force, many of whom were Apodeti members and sympathisers, continued to participate in Indonesian military operations well after the 1975 invasion. They were recruited as members of the TNI, police, Hansip and later as members of militias. In addition some played the role of informers, passing on information to Indonesian military personnel. In all of these capacities members and former members of Apodeti committed serious human rights violations against pro-independence supporters throughout the entire period of the conflict.

389. In summary, representatives of the Apodeti party are responsible for contributing to serious human rights violations committed before, during and after the military invasion of Timor-Leste. They did this by training and participating in military operations with ABRI, and later becoming integrated into the various organs of the Indonesian occupation regime, in which roles they were directly responsible for a significant number of serious violations, as well as supporting the mass violations by the Indonesian security forces.

The responsibility and accountability of the Trabalhista and KOTA parties

390. Although members of the Trabalhista and KOTA parties were not identified as direct perpetrators of a large number of violations, they did play a role in supporting the Indonesian invasion and occupation, and are also responsible for playing a role in the polarisation of East Timorese society.

391. Members of Trabalhista and KOTA contributed to the formulation and signing of the Balibó Declaration which helped to provide a veneer of legitimacy to the totally illegitimate Indonesian occupation. Following this members of these parties in communications to the United Nations also supported the lie that the East Timorese people wished to remain part of Indonesia. Some members of these parties supported the Indonesian administration and became members of the Indonesian security forces and auxiliaries, including Hansip and the militias. In these roles they were involved in serious human rights violations.

392. Although the Trabalhista and KOTA parties were smaller in size and the importance of their role in the conflict was less significant than the other political parties, their members were implicated directly and indirectly in human rights violations. They also played a significant role in supporting the illegal Indonesian occupation and are responsible, together with the other political parties, for contributing to the polarisation of East Timorese society and the continued cycle of violence which this contributed to.

State responsibility

Responsibility of the State of Indonesia

Violation of the right to self-determination

393. The Commission has found that the Republic of Indonesia was responsible for grossly suppressing the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination and subjecting them to a military occupation characterised by repression and violence, against their will.

394. The Commission finds that by 1974 the Government of Indonesia had decided that Timor-Leste should be incorporated into Indonesia. It set out to achieve that goal using various tactics including propaganda, intimidation, subversion, and ultimately, military force. This process ignored the wishes of the East Timorese people and their right to self-determination.

395. The Commission finds that the session of the "Popular Representative Assembly" held on 31 May 1976 did not constitute a genuine act of self-determination. The process was orchestrated by Indonesia with the goal of lending legitimacy to its unlawful invasion. The assembly was not representative of the East Timorese people and did not provide those who were involved with a real and informed choice between various options. The Commission finds that the process did not accord with the requirements set out in General Assembly Resolution 1541 for the integration of a non-self governing territory into a pre-existing State. It did not allow the East Timorese people to freely express their wishes, did not occur in a context in which Timor-Leste had attained a sufficiently advanced state of self-government to properly express those wishes, and did not take place in a relationship of complete equality between the two parties involved. The Commission finds that the "Popular Representative Assembly" was organised by Indonesia for the purpose of justifying its invasion rather than for providing the East Timorese people with a real choice about their future.

396. Indonesia maintained its unlawful presence in the territory of Timor-Leste until 1999. During this period Indonesia was responsible for continuously suppressing the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination. It forcibly suppressed advocacy of self-determination within Timor-Leste, and sought to neutralise East Timorese, Indonesian and international civil society advocates of self-determination. The Commission finds that this constituted a gross violation of the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination as well as a violation of other fundamental human rights such as the right to freedom of expression, opinion and association.

397. During the occupation Indonesia further violated the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination by exploiting the natural resources of the territory for its own benefit rather than allowing the East Timorese people control over the disposal of those resources. Agents of the Indonesian state removed significant quantities of timber, sandalwood and other resources from Timor-Leste, and the Indonesian security forces forcibly implemented a programme under which East Timorese coffee growers receive much less than the full value of their crops. The treaty entered into with Australia in 1989 for the disposal of the resources of the Timor Sea (The Timor Gap Zone of Cooperation Treaty), which was concluded without consultation with or due regard to the interests of the people of Timor-Leste, also violated those rights, particularly because, in its eagerness to reach an agreement, Indonesia settled on terms that were far less favourable to the state than was normal in its own territory.

State responsibility for violations committed by members of the Indonesian security forces and government representatives

398. Under international law a state is responsible for conduct carried out by its organs (Article 4, ILC Articles on the Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts). This includes the conduct of the army and police as well as the organs responsible for civil administration. Accordingly the Commission holds Indonesia responsible for the actions of ABRI (as well as the TNI and the police in 1999) as well as the actions of the civil components of the Indonesian government.

399. States are also responsible under international law for the actions of private individuals where the state has effective control over those persons, or where those persons are acting on the directions or instructions of the state (Article 8, ILC Articles on the Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts). The Commission is satisfied that militia groups within Timor-Leste, which may not have formally constituted organs of the State of Indonesia, nonetheless acted on the directions and instructions and under the effective control of Indonesia. Indonesia is therefore responsible for violations carried out by those militia groups.

400. The invasion by Indonesia of Timor-Leste constituted violations of a number of principles of international law, including:

- The prohibition under customary international law of intervention in the affairs of other states[11]
- The peremptory norm contained in Article 2(4) of the United Nations Charter, as well as under customary international law, on the unlawful use of force against the territorial integrity of another state
- Indonesia's obligation under customary international law to respect the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination.

401. Indonesia also violated its obligations under the agreements entered into on 5 May 1999 between Indonesia, Portugal and the United Nations. Under these agreements Indonesia was responsible for "maintaining peace and security in East Timor in order to ensure that the popular consultation is carried out in a fair and peaceful way in an atmosphere free of intimidation, violence or interference from any side".[12] Indonesia was also responsible under the agreements for ensuring a "secure environment devoid of violence or other forms of intimidation" and "the general maintenance of law and order", including by ensuring "the absolute neutrality of the TNI and the Indonesian Police".[13] The Commission finds that Indonesia failed grossly in meeting these obligations and was therefore in breach of its treaty obligations under the 5 May Agreements.

402. The Commission finds the State of Indonesia to be responsible and accountable for the violations of international human rights law, international humanitarian law and international criminal law which were committed by members of the Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries, including civil defence groups such as Hansip and Ratih, the militia groups which were controlled by the Indonesian security forces, government officials, police, and other individuals who committed violations under the direction of State organs. This responsibility covers multiple incidences of crimes against humanity, including extermination; war crimes, including grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions; tens of thousands of serious human rights violations; and overall responsibility for the deaths of at least 120,000 East Timorese people who died as a result of the systematic programmes of violations which accompanied the 24-year long illegal military occupation of Timor-Leste.

403. The nature and scale of the violations which fall within the ambit of the responsibility of the State of Indonesia are discussed in detail in the various thematic chapters of this report, and in particular in the section on the responsibility of the Indonesian security forces, earlier in this Part.

Responsibility of the State of Portugal

404. The Commission finds that under successive governments Portugal violated the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination.

Historical context to the violation

405. For almost the entire period of its rule in Timor-Leste, Portugal created an environment that was utterly inimical to the realisation of the right to self-determination. No effort was made to achieve an even minimal level of East Timorese self-government, and democratic values were not upheld either in theory or in practice. Under the Salazar-Caetano regime, Portugal:

- Neglected the Timorese economy and thereby helped create an international perception of Timor as an economically unviable territory that would be incapable of subsisting as an independent state
- Failed to prepare the East Timorese people for self-government by permitting broad-based political participation or otherwise instilling democratic values
- Refused to recognise that Article 73 of the United Nations Charter applied to Timor-Leste as a non-self-governing territory and failed to comply with its obligations under that provision. *

* Article 73 required Portugal to promote to the utmost the well-being of the East Timorese people, including by ensuring, with respect for the Timorese culture, their political, economic, social and educational advancement, their just treatment, and their protection from abuses; and developing Timorese self-government, including by the development of free political institutions.

406. After the Carnation Revolution of 25 April 1974 and the subsequent commitment to decolonisation of the governments that followed it, some improvements were seen. In particular, the last Governor of Portuguese Timor, Colonel Mário Lemos Pires, began a programme of reforms and attempted to build a consensus around a decolonisation programme, which was eventually embodied in law. However, despite his efforts, conflicting signals by successive governments about their true intentions created mistrust towards the Portuguese administration in Timor and amplified already existing suspicions among the main parties. Governor Lemos Pires received insufficient support from the Portuguese Government for his programme of reforms. In addition to the denial of his requests for additional Portuguese troops in the face of rising political tensions, a military force sufficient only for the protection of Portuguese nationals was maintained in the territory. As a consequence, on the outbreak of violence in August 1975 Portugal found itself ill-equipped to intervene. Such a small troop presence provided little deterrence to the Indonesian security forces and their strategists at a time when Indonesia's intentions were becoming increasingly clear through its propaganda, its training of East Timorese in Atambua and its covert activities inside the territory. Portugal declined to involve the United Nations directly in the decolonisation process despite increasing tensions in the territory. This was despite recommendations made by the Portuguese administration in Timor-Leste and the Governor to internationalise the process particularly through the United Nations.

407. In addition, Portuguese diplomatic engagement with Indonesia served to encourage rather than discourage Indonesian aspirations for the integration of Timor-Leste. At the meeting between Indonesian and Portuguese officials in Lisbon in October 1974, while Portugal's official position was that the East Timorese people should be entitled to determine their own future, the Indonesian Government was given to understand that the Portuguese Government's preference was for the territory's integration into Indonesia. Portuguese officials conveyed a similar message to their Indonesian counterparts at the London meeting in March 1975.

408. The Commission considers that Portugal must be held accountable for its actions during this period. In particular Portuguese policy had the effect of heightening tensions by encouraging Indonesian integrationist ambitions and by explicitly acquiescing to Indonesian support for Apodeti thereby fuelling the inter-party political conflict. Inadequate steps were taken to prevent the escalation of political tensions, and little or no preparation was made in readiness for the possible outbreak of civil war.

409. Following meetings in Rome on 1 and 2 November 1975, Indonesia and Portugal jointly called for the restoration of peace in Timor-Leste but no reference was made to Indonesia's military incursions into the territory. Almost a month later, on 29 November, when rejecting Fretilin's declaration of independence, Portugal condemned Indonesia's military intervention, but maintained that in finding a resolution of the political differences between Fretilin, UDT and Apodeti, "the legitimate interest of Indonesia's geopolitical territory" must be taken into account. It was only after the full-scale Indonesian invasion on 7 December that that Portugal referred the situation in Timor-Leste to the United Nations Security Council, requesting United Nations assistance.

410. In the Commission's view Portugal took insufficient steps to ward off an Indonesian invasion that was clearly imminent. Although it eventually sought assistance from the international community, Portugal could have done so earlier. To this extent the Commission finds that Portugal fell short of meeting its obligations as the administering power, including its obligation to protect the people of Timor-Leste from harm.

411. Throughout much of the Indonesian occupation, Portugal made little diplomatic effort to address the situation in Timor-Leste, whether bilaterally or through the United Nations. Although it maintained the official position that it remained the administering power in Timor-Leste, it took few steps to carry out the responsibilities entailed by this role. It was not until 1982 that it began to raise the question of Timor-Leste in international fora, and even after that time the steps that it did take were insufficient to compete with Indonesian diplomacy. The Commission finds that Portugal, although committed in theory to the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination, took insufficient steps to assist in the realisation of this right during the period of Indonesian occupation.

Responsibility of the State of Australia

412. The Commission finds that Australia contributed significantly to denying the people of Timor-Leste their right to self-determination before and during the Indonesian occupation. Australia was well-placed to influence the course of events in Timor-Leste. Rather than playing the role of honest broker, between April 1974 and December 1975 it tilted sharply in favour of the Indonesian stance on Timor-Leste, justifying this position by the need to maintain good relations with Indonesia, whose "settled policy" it understood to be the incorporation of the territory by any means. It took this position even though it violated Australia's obligations under international law to support the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination.

413. After the Carnation Revolution, the Government of Gough Whitlam made it clear to President Soeharto that it shared the Indonesian Government's preference that Timor-Leste be incorporated into Indonesia. In his conversations with President Soeharto Whitlam said that Australian policy towards Timor was guided by two principles: its belief that Timor should become part of Indonesia; and its desire that this should happen with the consent of the people of the territory. When it became apparent that these two components of its policy were at odds with each other, the second was sacrificed to the first. Although its contacts with officials in Jakarta and intelligence gathered on the ground in Timor-Leste both made it clear that, if necessary, Indonesia intended to take control of the territory forcibly, Australia raised no objection. Its appeasement of the Soeharto Government extended to a muted response to the deaths of its own nationals in Balibó (Bobonaro) on 16 October 1975 and in Dili on 8 December 1975.

414. The Commission finds that Australian policy towards Indonesia and Timor-Leste during this period was influenced not only by an interest in maintaining good relations with Indonesia, but also by an assessment that it would achieve a more favourable outcome to the negotiations on the maritime boundary in the Timor if it was dealing with Indonesia rather than with Portugal or an independent Timor-Leste on the issue.

415. The Commission also finds from its examination of the documentary record that Australia's presentation of its stance confirmed the Indonesian Government in its resolve to take over the territory of Timor-Leste. Australia's indifference to Indonesia's actions in pursuit of its goals, including its incursions into the territory, almost certainly had a similar effect. Conversely had Australia given greater weight to the right of the East Timorese to self-determination and to the inviolability of its sovereign territory in its dealings with Indonesia, it may have been able to avert the Indonesian use of force. The Commission finds that during the Indonesian occupation successive Australian governments not only failed to respect the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination, but actively contributed to the violation of that right. After supporting the first resolution in 1975 it abstained from or voted against subsequent General Assembly resolutions recognising the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination. It refused to receive José Ramos-Horta or other Fretilin representatives, and even banned their entry to Australia for a number of years. In 1978 it recognised de facto Indonesian control over Timor-Leste, and implicitly gave de jure recognition in 1979 when it began negotiations with Indonesia for the delimitation of the maritime boundary between Australia and Timor-Leste. In 1985 it unequivocally gave de jure recognition to the integration of Timor-Leste into Indonesia, and in 1989 concluded the Timor Gap Zone of Cooperation Treaty with Indonesia. Australia also provided economic and military assistance to Indonesia during this period and worked as an advocate for the Indonesian position in international fora.

416. Australia played a leading role in the Interfet force that ultimately ended the violence surrounding the ballot in 1999, and has consequently tended to portray itself as a liberator of Timor-Leste. However the Commission finds that even when President Habibie was moving towards his decision to offer the East Timorese a choice between remaining part of Indonesia and independence, the Australian Foreign Minister, Alexander Downer, made it clear that his Government believed that it should be several years before the East Timorese exercised their right to make that choice and that it would be preferable from an Australian point of view if Timor-Leste remained legally part of Indonesia. The actions of the Government of Australia in supporting Indonesia's attempted forcible integration of Timor-Leste was in violation of its duties, under the general principles of international law, to support and refrain from undermining the legitimate right of the East Timorese people to self-determination[14] and to take positive action to facilitate the realisation of this right.[15] According to the Human Rights Committee:

> States must refrain from interfering in the internal affairs of other States and thereby adversely affecting the exercise of the right to self-determination.[16]

417. Australia's actions during the period of Indonesia's illegal military occupation of Timor-Leste did, in fact, adversely affect the East Timorese people's ability to exercise their right to self-determination.

Responsibility of the United States of America

418. The Commission finds that the United States of America failed to support the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination, and that its political and military support were fundamental to the Indonesian invasion and occupation. The support of the United States for Indonesia was given out of a strategically-motivated desire to maintain a good relationship with Indonesia, whose anti-communist regime was seen as an essential bastion against the spread of communism in South-East Asia. President Gerald Ford met President Soeharto twice in 1975. The second meeting was in Jakarta on 6 December, the day before the Indonesian invasion of Dili, when the impending invasion was discussed. The Commission finds on the basis of the available documentary evidence that the United States was aware of Indonesian plans to invade and occupy Timor-Leste. It also finds that the United States was aware that military equipment supplied by it to Indonesia would be used for this purpose. However, in the light of the its assessment of the importance of good relations with Indonesia, the United States decided to turn a blind eye to the invasion, even though US-supplied arms and military equipment were sure to be used.

419. US-supplied weaponry was critical to Indonesia's capacity to intensify military operations from 1977 in its massive campaigns to destroy the Resistance in which aircraft supplied by the United States played a crucial role. These were the campaigns which resulted in severe suffering and hardship to tens of thousands of civilians sheltering in the interior at the time. The campaigns forced the mass surrender of tens of thousands of civilians, whom it then held in the highly restrictive conditions of the resettlement camps where thousands of civilians died from starvation and illness. During the famine of this time US administration officials refused to admit that the primary reason that East Timorese were dying in their thousands was the security policies being pursued by the Indonesian military. Instead they maintained that that the deaths were due to drought, an argument which the Commission finds to have been without merit.

420. Successive administrations, even those such as the Carter administration which made much of its commitment to human rights, were driven by hard-nosed realism in their policy towards Timor-Leste: they all consistently stressed the overriding importance of the relationship with Indonesia and the supposed irreversibility of the Indonesian takeover, even as they acknowledged that the people of Timor-Leste had been denied their right to self-determination.

421. Although the United States suspended its military cooperation programme with Indonesia after the Santa Cruz massacre in 1991, its policy on Timor-Leste on that and other occasions was reactive rather than proactive. In response to the massive violations that occurred in Timor-Leste in September 1999 President Bill Clinton threw the considerable influence of the United States behind efforts to press the Indonesian Government to accept the deployment of an international force in the territory, demonstrating the considerable leverage that it could have exerted earlier had the will been there.

422. In the Commission's view, the support given by the United States to Indonesia was crucial to the invasion and continued occupation of Timor-Leste. This was so not only because weapons and equipment purchased from the United States played a significant role in Indonesian military operations in Timor-Leste, but also because it never used its unique position of power and influence to counsel its Indonesian ally against embarking on an illegal course of action.

423. The actions of the Government of the United States of America in supporting Indonesia's invasion of Timor-Leste was in violation of its duties, under the general principles of international law, to support and refrain from undermining the legitimate right of the East Timorese people to self-determination[17] and to take positive action to facilitate the realisation of that right.[18]

Responsibility of the United Nations

424. The Commission finds that the United Nations took inadequate action to protect the right of the East Timorese people to self-determination during the period of the invasion and military occupation.

425. The General Assembly passed a resolution on the situation in Timor-Leste every year from 1975 until 1982. During this period the texts of the resolutions became increasingly weak and the number of countries voting in favour of them steadily diminished until in 1981 only about one third of the member states voting on the resolution supported that year's resolution.* In 1982, in a calculated move designed to the keep the question of Timor-Leste alive at the United Nations amid unmistakable signs of growing member-state apathy, the overseas representatives of the Resistance and their supporters at the United Nations narrowly managed to secure the General Assembly's approval of a resolution referring the question to the "good offices" of the Secretary-General who was to consult "all parties directly concerned". Although this mechanism almost entirely excluded East Timorese voices and its direct impact in securing the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination was negligible, it was supported by the efforts of members of the UN Secretariat staff and latterly of the Secretary-General, Kofi Annan, and contributed to keeping the question of Timor-Leste on the United Nations' agenda, which was to prove particularly important in 1998–1999.

426. The Security Council, as the organ of the United Nations with primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security (Article 24(1) United Nations Charter), was best placed to address the situation in Timor-Leste. Although the Security Council condemned the Indonesian invasion in 1975 and again in 1976, it did not find a violation or threat to international peace and security. The Commission considers that there is no question that it would have been entitled to do so under Article 39 of the United Nations Charter and therefore would have been entitled to take enforcement action under Chapter VII. After 1976 no further Security Council resolutions were passed on the question of Timor-Leste until May 1999, when the Council endorsed the 5 May Agreements between Indonesia, Portugal and the United Nations.

427. Under Article 24(2) of the United Nations Charter the Security Council is required to act in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations set out in Articles 1 and 2 of the Charter. Those purposes and principles include the following:

- The maintenance of international peace and security (Article 1(1))
- The development of friendly relations among states based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determinations of people (Article 1(2)), and

* See the chart which represents General Assembly voting on East Timor resolutions, in Vol II, Part 7.1: The Right to Self-Determination.

- The promotion and encouragement of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms (Article 1(3)), and
- The sovereign equality of all member states (Article 2(1)).

428. The Commission finds that by failing to take any enforcement action, and by taking no further action between 1976 and 1999, the Security Council failed to act in accordance with the principles and purposes of the United Nations, and with the specific duties set out in the Charter of the organisation.

429. Moreover, the Commission finds that for most of the period of the Indonesian occupation the five permanent members of the Security Council – the United States, the USSR/Russia, China, the UK and France – as well as states such as Japan, which were non-permanent members at crucial times during the mandate period, put economic and strategic interests above the purposes and principles of the United Nations, which as members of the Security Council they had a duty to uphold. Like the United States, by sanctioning the sale to Indonesia of arms which were used against the Resistance and the civilian population in Timor-Leste, the UK and France were directly involved in supporting an illegal occupation and suppressing the right of the people of the territory to self-determination.

Annexe 1: Responsibility of the Indonesian security forces for violations committed in 1999

Introduction

430. The historical background to the 1999 Popular Consultation is dealt with in detail in Vol. I, Part 3 of the Report: The History of the Conflict.

Evidence considered

431. Statements from victims and witnesses received by the Commission reported 15,681 human rights violations committed in Timor-Leste in 1999. In addition the Commission considered evidence provided in interviews with victims and witnesses, including former serving officers with the TNI, the Indonesian police, former militia members and Indonesian government officials. The Commission was also given access to specific files and statements it requested from the Serious Crimes Unit, which was established by the UNTAET mission and has been under the authority of the Prosecutor General of Timor-Leste since independence. These documents included files and statements used in drawing up indictments for crimes against humanity committed in Timor-Leste during 1999. The UNTAET and UNMISET Human Rights Unit also cooperated with the Commission by providing access to materials relevant to violations committed during 1999.

432. The Commission also closely considered the submission provided by the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), entitled East Timor 1999: Crimes Against Humanity, a Report Commissioned by the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, written by Dr Geoffrey Robinson of the University of California, Los Angeles (USA) at the request of the OHCHR. Dr Robinson had access to the files of the UNTAET mission's Human Rights Unit, the statements and other documents compiled by the Deputy Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, the collection of documents recovered from burned-out TNI installations and other sites by the leading East Timorese human rights NGO Yayasan HAK (The Rights Foundation), as well as himself conducting interviews with victims, witnesses and other sources. The Commission has also had access to much of the documentary material considered by Dr Robinson and has reached many similar conclusions based on these sources, and drawn significantly on the evidence presented in his report. The Commission finds the methodology used in compiling the submission from the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights to be thorough, objective and highly professional. The "Robinson Report", referred to in this Report generally as "Robinson, OHCHR Submission to the CAVR", is reproduced in its entirety as an annexe to this Report.

433. A summary of perpetrator responsibility according to the human rights violations reported to the Commission by witnesses and victims is included in the following Table. A complete set of tables showing the number and percentage of violations attributed to various institutional perpetrators is annexed to this part of the Report.

The responsibility of Indonesia for maintaining security and protecting the population

434. Under the 5 May Agreements in 1999 between Indonesia, Portugal and the United Nations, Indonesian security forces were given responsibility for "maintaining peace and security in East Timor in order to ensure that the popular consultation [was] carried out in a fair and peaceful way in an atmosphere free of intimidation, violence or interference from any side".[19] The agreement further stated that:

> A secure environment devoid of violence or other forms of intimidation is a prerequisite for the holding of a free and fair ballot in East Timor. Responsibility to ensure such an environment as well as for the general maintenance of law and order rests with the appropriate Indonesian security authorities. The absolute neutrality of the TNI (Indonesian Armed Forces) and the Indonesian Police is essential in this regard. [20]

435. Although under the 5 May Agreements, sole responsibility for the maintenance of law and order was given to the Indonesian police service,[21] in practice the police remained subordinate to the TNI even after the restructuring of 1 April 1999.*

436. Following the announcement of the result of the ballot on 4 September 1999, the TNI once again assumed control over security in Timor-Leste.[22] On 6 September the Indonesian President, B.J. Habibie, ordered the imposition of martial law, to begin at 12 midnight on 7 September.[23] After that time the TNI had complete responsibility for the maintenance of law and order in Timor-Leste. This responsibility did not end until the arrival of the UN-sponsored multilateral force, Interfet, on 20 September 1999.

Perpetrators of violations

437. Members of the Indonesian military, police and East Timorese auxiliaries of the TNI (including militia groups) were identified as the perpetrators in 14,922 (95.2%) of all violations reported to the Commission as having been committed in 1999.

438. For the purposes of determining responsibility, the Commission has grouped together the violations committed by the TNI, the Indonesian police and East Timorese auxiliaries, including the militias, because of the overwhelming evidence that the TNI played a major role in creating the militia groups, and was responsible for arming, funding, directing and controlling them. The evidence supporting this finding is set out in detail below.

* On 1 April 1999 a decision on the restructuring of the Indonesian security forces came into force. Its effect was formally to separate the three branches of the armed forces (the army, the navy and the air force) from the police. ABRI therefore formally ceased to exist, and the three armed services were jointly named the Tentara Nasional Indonesia (TNI). However, the Minister of Defence (at the time General Wiranto) retained authority over both the TNI and the police, and as noted in the text, the separation of the police from military services did not in fact end its long-established subordination to the army, as was evident in Timor-Leste during the following months of 1999.

439. Only a small proportion of violations were committed by persons identified by their affiliation to Fretilin, Falintil, UDT, Apodeti or other groups.*

Responsibility of the TNI for the violations

440. Members of the TNI were involved in the overall planning and coordination of the violations committed in 1999. They were also frequently involved in their direct perpetration. In addition they were responsible for the actions of the militia groups which they directed and controlled.

Members of the TNI as direct perpetrators of violations

441. Major incidents in which members of the TNI were directly involved, acting either alone or with the militias they commanded, included the following.

- On 6 April 1999, approximately 2,000 civilians who had sought refuge in the Liquiçá Church were attacked by Besi Merah Putih militia, together with soldiers from the Liquiçá District Command (Kodim) and members of the police mobile brigade (Brimob). Between 30 and 100 civilians were killed, many of whose bodies were taken away and disposed of in secret locations.
- On 12 April 1999, in retaliation for an alleged Falintil killing of a TNI soldier and a pro-autonomy leader, hundreds of civilians in the villages in the sub-district of Cailaco (Bobonaro) were rounded up and required to attend the funeral of the pro-autonomy leader. At least seven suspected pro-independence supporters were executed by TNI soldiers and Halilintar militia at the Sub-district Military Command (Koramil) post 100 metres from the mourners. At least another 13 men were executed in various locations during the following weeks.
- On 17 April 1999, a pro-autonomy rally was held in front of the Governor's Office in Dili attended by the Governor, the District Administrator of Dili, the Sub-Regional military commander for Timor-Leste, Colonel Tono Suratman, the Assistant for Operations to the Army Chief of Staff, Major General Kiki Syahnakri, and four other senior military officers. During the rally the East Timorese leader of the Aitarak militia group publicly urged his followers to kill pro-independence supporters. Immediately after the rally members of the militia and the security forces went to the nearby house of a prominent pro-independence figure, Manuel Carrascalão, where approximately 150 displaced persons had sought refuge. They killed at least 12 unarmed civilians who were seeking shelter in the house.[24]
- On 6 September 1999, members of Laksaur militia, together with members of Indonesian security forces, attacked thousands of refugees who had sought safety in the Suai Church in the district of Covalima. At least 40 and possibly as many as 200 people were killed, including three priests.[25] The bodies were burned, and some were transported across the border to be buried in West Timor, Indonesia.

- Following the massacre at the church in Suai, approximately 125 surviving women and children were detained by Laksaur militia with the assistance of members of the TNI. Many of the women were raped. The survivors were forcibly deported to West Timor where many more were raped or subjected to sexual slavery.
- On 5–6 September 1999, Aitarak militia, together with members of the TNI, attacked hundreds of people who had sought refuge at a number of sites in Dili, including the house of Nobel Laureate Bishop Carlos Ximenes Belo, the Diocesan Offices, convents, and the Dili office of the International Committee of the Red Cross. At least 19 civilians were killed or disappeared from these places of refuge. The previous day, on 4 September, the TNI and militia carried out attacks on the community in Becora, a pro-independence neighbourhood in the east of Dili, killing at least seven men.
- On 8 September 1999, Dadurus Merah Putih and other militias, under the command of Indonesian security forces, attacked people who had sought refuge in the Maliana police station. Before the attack, leaders of the pro-independence umbrella organisation, the CNRT, pleaded with members of the Indonesian police to protect them. But the police remained sequestered in a section of the building and ordered them to go away. At least 26 civilians were killed or disappeared, mostly local CNRT leaders and suspected pro-independence supporters, including one 12 year-old boy. They included people who had escaped from the police station but who had been hunted down and killed in the following days. The bodies were transported to a secret location and disposed of.
- On 10 September 1999, the Sakunar militia, acting under the direction of the TNI, brought civilians from three villages in Oesilo, Oecussi to West Timor, Indonesia, on the pretext that they would be safer there. Once inside Indonesia, TNI and militia separated 50-70 young men who were selected on the basis that they had received some high-school education. The victims were tied together and brought back into Oecussi, where they were lined up and executed in a river-bed in Passabe.
- On 12 September 1999, Laksaur militia and members of the TNI attempted forcibly to deport villagers from the village of Laktos (Fohorem, Covalima) to West Timor, Indonesia. Fourteen men who resisted were killed.
- During 20–21 September 1999, TNI soldiers from Battalion 745 randomly shot civilians during their retreat from Lospalos (Lautém) to Dili. At least 21 civilians, including a Dutch journalist, were killed or disappeared by members of Battalion 745 as it retreated through Lospalos, Baucau, and Dili.
- On 23 September 1999, members of the Mahidi militia, supported by the TNI, opened fire on a group of villagers from Maununu Village, Ainaro District, whom they had rounded up for deportation to West Timor, killing 11 persons, including women and children.
- On 20 October 1999, Sakunar and Aitarak militias and members of the TNI, while rounding up villagers from Maquelab (Pante Makassar, Oecussi) for deportation to West Timor, separated and executed a total of six men in the Maquelab market. Another six were killed later during an attack on the village.

442. In addition to these major incidents, the Commission received a large number of reports of individual violations perpetrated by members of the TNI, either acting alone or with East Timorese militiamen. Among these were reports of numerous rapes, sometimes carried out repeatedly over a period of days, in the context of the general campaign of terror before and after the ballot or during forced deportations after the ballot. The Commission received more than 4,000 reports of torture and ill-treatment carried out by or with the involvement of the TNI or Indonesian police. It received some 731 separate reports of property damage or other economic violations carried out with the involvement of the TNI and police (see Vol III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment).

443. The evidence provided by victims and witnesses in interviews with the Commission, and the statistics compiled from statements compiled by the Commission strongly support the finding that members of the TNI were directly involved in a large number of serious violations during 1999.

The responsibility of the TNI for the actions of militia groups

444. TNI responsibility for the actions of militia groups has three bases. First the TNI was involved in designing, recruiting, funding, arming and training militia groups. Secondly it participated in joint operations with militia groups. And thirdly, knowing the nature and scale of the violations being committed, it failed to take effective action to prevent further violations or to punish the perpetrators.

The role of the TNI in creating and supporting the militias

445. In creating the militias the TNI drew heavily on the variety of East Timorese auxiliary forces that it had developed over the years since 1975. Several of the militia groups had in fact been in existence for a decade or more. Other militia groups recruited their leadership from officially-sponsored "civil defence" and pro-integration groups such as Wanra, Hansip and Gadapaksi. A military document dated April 1998 shows that 12 paramilitary "teams", covering every district of Timor-Leste except Dili and Oecussi, were then in existence. The pre-existing structures greatly facilitated the formation of new groups and the expansion of existing ones, and help explain the speed with which the militias were mobilised in 1999.

446. Senior Indonesian army officers were involved in the planning, formation and recruitment of the militias. Three senior commanders who played a significant role in forming the militia groups were Major General Adam Rachmat Damiri, the commander of the Udayana Regional Military Command (Kodam IX/Udayana) which covered several provinces of central and eastern Indonesia, including Timor-Leste, Colonel Suhartono Suratman who was the TNI Commander of the Sub-Region (Korem) of Timor-Leste, and Lieutenant Colonel Yayat Sudrajat a Kopassus officer who was the commander of the intelligence task force Satgas Tribuana VIII which was deployed in Timor-Leste in early 1999. The Commission was given access to materials collected by UN international investigators working for the Serious Crimes Unit in Dili. The Commission believes the witness statements taken by the UN investigators provide highly reliable evidence. It is satisfied that the statements of eyewitnesses and participants at meetings between pro-integration figures and senior members of the TNI and the central and local governments are accurately summarised in the following passages from the indictment of eight senior Indonesian officials filed by Timor-Leste's Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes in February 2003.[26]

1. In or about August 1998 [the commander of Region IX Udayana, Major General] Adam Rachmat Damiri arranged for a pro-Indonesian East Timorese leader to fly from Timor-Leste to Denpasar, Bali for a meeting. At this meeting, Damiri told the East Timorese leader to establish a group to promote integration.
2. In or about August 1998, Damiri travelled to Dili and met with TNI commanders and pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders. [The commander of Korem 164, Colonel] Suhartono Suratman was present at this meeting. Damiri told the group that international attention was focused on Timor-Leste and this was a problem for Indonesia. He told them that they needed to come up with a plan for creating organisations that would spread pro-Indonesian sentiment throughout Timor-Leste. He told them that they must form a solid civil defence force based on previous TNI-supported models and that this force should be expanded and developed to protect integration.
3. In or about November 1998, Damiri travelled to Timor-Leste. During this visit he again met with pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders in Dili, including individuals who later became leaders of militia groups. Damiri asked the men to join together and assist TNI to fight the pro-independence group Revolutionary Front for an Independent East Timor [Frente Revolucionaria de Timor Leste Independente, Fretilin]. During this meeting with pro-Indonesian leaders, Damiri praised future militia leader Eurico Guterres as being a young man eager to fight for integration and said that he was willing to give Guterres 50 million rupiah to begin his work.
4. In or about November 1998, Suratman met with pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders at his headquarters in Dili. [Tribuana commander, Lieutenant Colonel] Yayat Sudrajat was present at this meeting. Suratman told the group that he wanted future militia leader Eurico Guterres to form a new organisation to defend integration similar to the pro-Indonesian youth organisation Gadapaksi.
5. In early 1999, [Major General] Zacky Anwar Makarim [who was head of the armed forces intelligence agency, BIA, until January 1999] received the founding members of the pro-Indonesian East Timor People's Front [Barisan Rakyat Timor Timur – BRTT] at his office in Jakarta. During the meeting he said that guerrilla warfare would be necessary to overcome independence supporters if the autonomy option lost at the ballot.
6. In or about February 1999, Damiri met with pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders at Regional Military Command IX headquarters in Denpasar, Bali. Damiri told the men that TNI was ready to give secret support to pro-Indonesian forces. He explained that it must be secret in order to avoid international scrutiny and criticism. Damiri asked the men to gather East Timorese who had served in TNI. He told them that they should meet with Suratman for further instructions.

7. In or about February 1999, Suratman met with a pro-Indonesian East Timorese leader in Dili. He told him that because TNI was under a reformist regime, it could not take part in open operations against the independence movement. Suratman asked the pro-Indonesian leader to form a militia group. Suratman said that TNI was willing to provide any form of assistance required by militia groups.
8. In early 1999, [the Governor, Abilio] Soares encouraged the District Administrators [Bupati] to form militia groups in their districts. Some of these District Administrators became militia leaders.

447. In early 1999 the then TNI Timor-Leste (Korem) Chief of Staff, Lieutenant Colonel Supardi, was quoted as saying that the TNI had recruited 1,200 militiamen and would continue recruitment until March.[27] In addition to using financial incentives to encourage recruitment, the TNI used threats and coercion. Targets were established for the recruitment of militia members in each district, of approximately 10 men per village.[28] There are approximately 450 villages in Timor-Leste.

TNI endorsement of the militias

448. Members of the TNI and the Indonesian administration conferred official status on the militias. They did this, for example, by attending and addressing audiences at militia inauguration ceremonies and rallies throughout Timor-Leste. The Sub-Regional Korem commander, Colonel Suratman, met and gave "guidance" to members of the Besi Merah Putih (BMP) militia at the Liquiçá District Military Command (Kodim) headquarters on 16 April 1999, ten days after the massacre of civilians by members of the BMP, TNI and police at the Liquiçá Church, and one day before the militia attacks in Dili in which BMP militia also took part.[29]

449. As already noted, the Timor-Leste Sub-Regional Military Commander, Colonel Suratman and other military officers, including the then Assistant for Operations to the Army Chief of Staff, Major General Kiki Syahnakri, were present at the rally in front of the Governor's Office in Dili, on 17 April, at which militia leader Eurico Guterres addressed militiamen and encouraged them to kill "those who have betrayed integration".[30] The subsequent killings are also referred to above.

450. TNI officers attended and participated in militia inauguration ceremonies in Cassa (Ainaro) on 12 December 1998; Same (Manufahi) on 11 March 1999; Viqueque (Viqueque) on 11 March 1999; Dili (Dili) on 17 April 1999; Maliana (Bobonaro) in April 1999; Suai (Covalima) in mid-April 1999; Oecussi, (Oecussi) on 1 May 1999; Lolotoe (Bobonaro) on 10 May 1999; Laclubar (Manatuto) on 18 May 1999; and Gleno (Ermera) in April or May 1999. The District TNI commander, district police commander and district administrator attended and participated in these ceremonies in their respective districts. *

* See, for example, Kodim 1631/Manatuto, Secret Daily Situation Report, 12 May 1999 [Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc No. 23].

The recognition of militias as part of the formal security structure

451. In addition to these public demonstrations of support, the Indonesian authorities gave the militias official endorsement by treating them as part of the formal auxiliary military structure. In official internal communications, militia groups were regularly referred to as being part of existing civil defence groups, Wanra, Hansip or Ratih. A letter signed by a Kopassus officer in the district of Baucau, dated March 1999, refers to the militia groups Saka, Sera, and Alfa as "Ratih".[31] From April 1999, militia groups were also officially recognised as Pam Swakarsa (voluntary civil security organisations).[32] Classifying the militias as officially-recognised civil defence groups was intended to provide a legitimate basis for TNI and government support to them. In fact it provided evidence that the TNI and Indonesian government recognised the militia groups as official organisations acting under the authority of the government.

452. The official recognition of the militia groups extended all the way up to the Commander of the Armed Forces, General Wiranto, who described the militia forces as consisting of an "armed force" with a larger supporting base of "militant supporters". The degree of control exerted by the TNI over the militias is reflected in its knowledge of the exact number of weapons they possessed. General Wiranto was cited in the Report of the Indonesian Commission on Human Rights in East Timor (Komnas HAM) as saying:

> The armed force is about 1,100 people with 546 weapons of various kinds, including assembled (home-made) weapons; they are joined in pro-integration organisations. The mass of militant supporters is 11,950 people, joined in opposition organisations like Besi Merah Putih, Aitarak, Mahidi, Laksaur Merah Putih, Guntur Kailak, Halilintar, Junior, Team Pancasila, Mahadomi, ABLAI and Red Dragon [sic].[33]

Participation of TNI personnel in militia groups

453. The close connection between the TNI and the militias is most clearly demonstrated by the overlap in their memberships. Many militia members were enlisted TNI soldiers, a fact that has been confirmed through official Indonesian military and government documents.

- In August 1999, UNAMET officials issued a formal complaint to the chief of the Indonesian government task force responsible for liaising with the UN mission, Agus Tarmidzi, and to Major General Zacky Anwar Makarim, the military representative on the task force, that TNI personnel, specifically two named sergeants serving in the Bobonaro District Command, were also serving in the Dadurus Merah Putih (DMP) militia group.* Major General Makarim acknowledged that the two men were indeed members of both the TNI and the DMP militia. In answer to the UNAMET complaint he stated that the two men had been confined to barracks. UNAMET officers stationed in Bobonaro found that this was in fact not true.[34]

* Sergeant Domingos dos Santos and Sergeant Julião Gomes were named in the letter as being active in the militia.

- A 1998 document which lists 49 members of the Makikit militia in the district of Viqueque stated that six of the militia members were also members of TNI Infantry Battalion 328.
- A letter from the Aitarak militia leader, Eurico Guterres, to the TNI Dili Military District Commander (Dandim) openly requested that a particular TNI intelligence operative, 1st Sergeant Elizario da Cruz, be given permission to serve with the Aitarak militia for an indefinite period.[35]
- An official list entitled "List of Members of the Pusaka Special Company, Kodim 1628/Baucau", from the District Military Command in Baucau (Kodim 1628/Baucau), dated 3 February 1999, shows that all 91 members of the Team Saka militia group in the district of Baucau were TNI soldiers, and gives their military rank and serial numbers. The list refers to the militia group as a "special company" of the TNI Baucau District Command (Kodim 1638). The commander of this militia group, Joanico Césario Belo, was concurrently a sergeant 1st class in the Special Forces (Kopassus) and the Regional Commander of Sector A of the national militia umbrella group the PPI (Pasukan Pejuang Integrasi).
- A document setting out the wages paid to members of the Aitarak militia in Dili, dated 24 August 1999, describes payments made to 96 members of the militia group who were either TNI members or government civil servants.*
- The Commission received evidence that the following militia groups were commanded by TNI personnel, most of them linked to Kopassus:
- DMP (Dadurus Merah Putih), based in Bobonaro, was commanded by Sergeant Domingos dos Santos
- Team Alfa (also known as Jati Merah Putih, JMP), based in the district of Lautém, was led by Kopassus Sergeant Syaful Anwar and Lieutenant Rahman Zulkarnaen (Kopassus commander for Lautém District)
- Team Saka, based in the district of Baucau, was commanded by Joanico Césario Belo, who was a Kopassus sergeant
- Team Morok, based in the district of Manatuto, led by TNI member Filomeno Lopes da Cruz.

Violations committed by members of the TNI together with militia groups

454. The Commission received strongly corroborated evidence demonstrating that it was common practice for members of the TNI to accompany militias during operations and that on many of these occasions the TNI officers ordered members of the militia to commit violations. In most cases the militia members obeyed these orders. In a smaller number of reports witnesses stated that when militia members did not obey the orders of the TNI to commit a violation, the TNI members carried out the act themselves.

* According to the report, the 96 were each paid Rp.120,000. [See: Memorandum from Treasurer to Eurico Guterres concerning Aitarak budget, 28 August 1999, SCU Collection, Doc #79].

455. Victims and witnesses provided testimony in statements to the Commission of over 2,000 different violations in which they identified members of the TNI and militia members acting together as perpetrators. The cases reported included 761 cases of illegal killings, 968 cases of torture and mistreatment, 883 cases of arbitrary detention, 553 cases of property and economic violations and 11 cases of sexually-based violations.

456. Drawing on the testimony of rape survivors whom they interviewed during a field visit in late 1999, the combined team of UN Special Rapporteurs reported in late 1999 that:

> [O]n many occasions no distinction could be made between members of the militia and members of the TNI, as often they were one and the same person in different uniforms.[36]

457. An East Timorese former TNI soldier told the Serious Crimes Unit that during the attacks after the announcement of the results of the ballot:

> Combined Aitarak militia and TNI burned houses down in Metinaro Sub-district. The houses were burned down at random…That was because we were not allowed to leave anything from Indonesia behind in favour of the East Timorese pro-Independence people…The orders were still the same: if autonomy lost, East Timor would go back to zero…I knew that things were bad in Dili because we saw [an] enormous [amount of] smoke above Dili. We couldn't identify anymore who was TNI and who was militia, the militia were using the same weapons as the TNI.[37]

TNI directing the actions of the militias

458. In addition to the TNI soldiers who were members of militia groups many officers had roles in directing the militia. The Commission received many reports that members of the TNI who accompanied militia members during incidents in which victims were killed, tortured or suffered other violations, were directing the militias. The Commission accepts the evidence provided by many eyewitnesses, including former members of the TNI and militias, that the TNI directly controlled the actions of militia groups. The Nobel Peace Laureate, Bishop Carlos Ximenes Belo, described the attack on his house on the morning of 6 September:

> Then at approximately 9.15 a Lieutenant Colonel from Kostrad arrived…He asked: "How is the situation here?" I answered that we wanted protection to stop the militias from attacking…but others in my house heard the Lieutenant Colonel…arriving at the end of the road… He shouted at the militias that were waiting there: "Attack now, attack now! If you don't, I'll kill you." At approximately 9.30 they started to ride > around my house on motorcycles, screaming and throwing stones…The youth at my house later told me the police themselves threw gasoline on the fire at the time.[38]

TNI arming of militias

459. The TNI also provided the militias with training, weapons and operational support. The role of the TNI in arming and training militias has been confirmed by numerous sources including Indonesian government and military documents and highly corroborated eyewitness testimony.

460. In early February 1999, the Army Chief of Staff, General Subagyo Hadisiswoyo, said that the army was arming "Wanra" auxiliaries to help the armed forces secure Timor-Leste.[39] In mid-February the armed forces spokesman in Jakarta, General Sudradjat, confirmed that guns had been distributed to the militias but insisted that "we only give weapons to those we trust".[40]

461. At about the same time the leader of the Mahidi militia in the district of Ainaro, Cancio Lopes de Carvalho, told journalists that the TNI had given his group 20 Chinese-made SKS automatic weapons in late December 1998, which had then been used to carry out a number of deadly attacks on nearby villages.[41]

462. The list of the 91 members of Team Saka militia in the district of Baucau referred to above also detailed the type and registration number of the weapons assigned to members of the group. The weapons listed include: 1 PMI/Pindad, 19 G-3s, 56 SP-IIs, 10 SP-Is, 1 FNC, 1 M16A1, 1 AK, and 1 Mauser. The document is signed by Joanico Césario Belo, who is identified as a First Sergeant and Commander of the Pusaka Special Company.[42]

463. A document entitled List of Team Makikit Members Authorised to Carry Weapons, prepared by the TNI District Military Command (Kodim) in Viqueque, lists more than 49 members of the Makikit militia and specifies the type and registration number of the weapon assigned to each member. The weapons listed include 3 M16A-1s, 35 SP-1s, and 11 Garands. Although there is no date on the document, a note in the margin states that it was found at the Kodim headquarters in Viqueque on 28 October 1998.[43]

464. In April 2000 a leader of the Sakunar militia group in Oecussi, Laurentino Moko, reportedly testified in an Indonesian court that he had been given guns in 1999 by two Kopassus officers.[44]

465. In his trial for crimes against humanity before the Special Panels of the Dili District Court, the Team Alfa militia leader Joni Marques testified that he had been trained by Kopassus since 1986, and had received weapons from Kopassus officers after the 30 August ballot.[45] Marques and others were convicted of crimes against humanity for the killing of nuns, priests and others on 25 September 1999. In its judgment in the case the Dili District Court concluded: "Kopassus Special Forces provided weapons and training to the members of Team Alfa".[46]

TNI training of militias

466. In a telegram to all TNI District Commanders dated 13 April 1999 and marked "secret", Colonel Suratman, the Sub-Regional (Korem) commander for Timor-Leste recognised that the militias (referred to as "Ratih") were being trained by TNI personnel in all districts. This provides strong evidence that the programme of support of the militias was being controlled and conducted from at least the level of the Timor-Leste Command. Colonel Suratman ordered the District Commanders to:

> Carry out security precautions and activities in the context of each Ratih training session to ensure that such activities proceed smoothly [and] insist on strict order and discipline in order to prevent any losses, physical or non-physical, inside and outside the training unit.[47]

467. In another document, identified as a TNI intelligence report from the Liquiçá District Military Command (Kodim), dated 18 April 1999, the writer described a visit by Colonel Suratman to that district. The document states that Suratman addressed a large gathering of Besi Merah Putih militia members who had gathered at the TNI Sub-district Military Command (Koramil) post at Maubara (Liquiçá) only two weeks after members of the same militia group, together with TNI and police, had killed scores of unarmed civilians in the Liquiçá Church compound.

> On 16 April 1999 at 1400 hours, the Dan Rem 164/WD [Commander of the Sub-Regional Command, Colonel Suratman] and his entourage arrived at the Kodim headquarters in Liquiçá. Later he visited Koramil post 1638/Maubara in order to offer words of guidance to some 500 BMP members there.[48]

Official use of TNI installations by militia groups

468. In a telegram dated 18 April 1999, the TNI Commander of the Dili Military District Command (Dandim), Lieutenant Colonel Endar Priyanto, reported to his superior officer, Colonel Tono Suratman, that:

> At 1315 hours on 18 April 1999 one element of the Aitarak forces finished their cleansing operation and returned to Company B of Battalion 744/SYB where they joined the other Aitarak groups who had gathered there earlier. They then returned to the Tropical Hotel.[49]

469. This report is dated just one day after the militia rally in front of the Governor's Office in Dili where the militia leader Eurico Guterres, in the company of senior TNI and government officials, exhorted members of the militias to kill independence supporters. The report refers to militia using the TNI base as an assembly point before and after "cleansing operations" just one day after the deadly attacks carried out after that rally, in which militia killed at least 12 people at the Dili home of Manuel Carrascalão.

470. In the district of Lautém, Kopassus (Special Forces) shared its headquarters with the Team Alfa militia group and provided it with logistical support and transportation.

471. In at least two sub-districts in the district of Covalima the Laksaur militia headquarters were located inside the sub-district military headquarters (Koramil). A UNAMET team visited one of these militia bases inside the official TNI compound in June 1999. [50]

472. In Liquiçá, the Koramil in Maubara also served as the Besi Mera Putih militia headquarters.

473. Militia groups used official TNI headquarters as their bases across the entire territory.[51]

474. Weapons were provided, and control over their use maintained by the TNI.[52] The Commission received many reports of militias being armed with modern weapons of the same make and model used by Indonesian military and police.[53]

475. The Commission reviewed and accepted evidence in witness statements and documents collected by the Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes in Timor-Leste concerning a meeting in March 1999 whose participants included Colonel Suhartono Suratman and Lieutenant Colonel Sudrajat, the Kopassus officer who was in command of the intelligence task force Satgas Tribuana VIII, and the civilian governor Abilio Soares.[54] At the meeting Abilio Soares told pro-autonomy leaders that the TNI and he would supply them with weapons and funding. Weapons were subsequently delivered to militias by Lieutenant Colonel Sudrajat.

476. In April 1999, Major General Zacky Anwar Makarim, who was the military representative on of the PT33 task force assigned to provide liaison with the UNAMET mission, offered to supply militia groups with automatic weapons and gave instructions to Colonel Suratman for this to be done. Colonel Suratman ordered Lietenant Colonel Sudrajat to organise the distribution of firearms. Weapons were subsequently supplied to the militias by Kopassus personnel.[55]

Provision of financial and material support by the TNI and other agencies

477. There is substantial evidence indicating that the Indonesian civilian and military authorities funded the militias and provided resources for their use. An estimated US$5.2 million was spent on the "socialisation" programme aimed at convincing the population that they should vote to remain with Indonesia. Approximately US$400,000 was allocated per district. A portion of this amount was set aside for the payment of militia groups through the Indonesian civilian administration.[56] Standard budgets for the "socialisation of autonomy" were drawn up by each district, containing allocations for the militias, and submitted to the Governor for approval.[57] Additional funds were provided through other arms of the Indonesian government and the TNI.

478. The Commission has inspected a number of documents which contain budgets and militia claims, signed by militia leaders, addressed to both government officials and TNI officers. It is satisfied that the funding for the militia groups was drawn substantially from the allocation of funds from the World Bank "social safety net" programme, which was supposed to be delivered to vulnerable groups.[58]

479. There is also evidence that the pro-integration political groups, the FPDK (Forum Persatuan Demokrasi dan Keadilan, United Forum for Democracy and Justice) and the BRTT (Barisan Rakyat Timor Timur, People's Front of Timor-Leste), both of which had close ties to the civil administration, were used to channel funds from the government and the military to the militia (see Vol 1, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation).[59]

480. The FPDK was chaired by the district administrator of Dili, Domingos (Koli) Maria das Dores Soares, while the BRTT's chairman was Francisco Lopes da Cruz, the former UDT president who had been Deputy Governor of Timor-Leste in the early years of the occupation and who in 1999 was a roving ambassador with a brief to promote Indonesia's case on Timor-Leste internationally.[60]

Ability of the TNI to control the militias and the level of violations committed

481. The supreme commander of the TNI, General Wiranto, himself appeared to indicate on a number of occasions that the TNI were in a position to order the immediate disarming of militias if they wished to do so. In his statement to the Serious Crimes Unit, the Special Representative of the UN Secretary-General in the UNAMET mission, Ian Martin, stated that during a meeting on 7 July 1999 in Jakarta:

> I clearly recall General Wiranto telling me that if Falintil was ready to surrender its weapons to the Indonesian police, he could guarantee that the militia would be disarmed within two days…I believe this was not the only occasion General Wiranto said this.[61]

482. A member of the United Nations Civilian Police during UNAMET, Stephen Polden, gave evidence to the Serious Crimes Unit that he had observed a plainclothes TNI officer's apparent ability to call off a further militia attack on the Maliana UNAMET compound on 29 June 1999.[62]

483. The large body of witness and documentary evidence demonstrating that the militias were under the control and direction of the TNI is corroborated by the fact that the TNI was able to bring about a lull in militia violence at particular times before the poll, notably during visits from international dignitaries and, particularly important, monitoring agencies.

484. On 28 January 1999, Colonel Suratman issued an order to all of the TNI District Commanders in which he clearly assumed that the TNI commanders in each district had control over the militias, including their weapons, and that they could recall the militias and confiscate their weapons at will. The order also indicated that the TNI commanders had a role in ensuring that the militias were armed appropriately when undertaking combat operations and other tasks. The terms of the order refer to recent killings by militia and then directs TNI officers to prevent militia from carrying and using weapons which were under the control of the TNI during the forthcoming visit by representatives of the UN Human Rights Commission. It is notable that the reference to the killings is not in the context of any action taken against those militia involved in the killings, only that their programme should be halted during the visit by the human rights group.[63]

485. In the official order Suratman referred to "the planned visit by the UN Human Rights Commission to Timor-Leste on 9 February 1999" and "a number of cases that have occurred in Timor-Leste involving Wanra (that is, militias) that resulted in the loss of life." It then stated:

> In connection with the foregoing, you are ordered to...withdraw the weapons held by Wanra and Ratih [militia] members when they are not conducting special tasks or combat operations in your respective Kodim areas.[64]

486. In another example, on 12 April, Colonel Suratman issued an order by telegram in response to the planned visit by various "foreign guests – including Military Attaches, Ambassadors and NGOs – to Timor-Leste, and specifically to Liquiçá", stating that "in order to avoid criticism of our territorial operations by these foreign visitors, for the time being activities should be limited to base security operations."[65]

Failure of the TNI to prevent militia violence

487. The TNI maintained high troop levels in Timor-Leste throughout 1999 until its withdrawal in September. Troops were stationed at the district, sub-district and village level across the territory. Despite these facts, and the fact that members of TNI were present at numerous scenes of serious human rights violations, the TNI failed to prevent militia violence.

488. One example was the refusal of TNI commanders to intervene to prevent the massacre at Manuel Carrascalão's house in Dili on 17 April 1999. Senior TNI officials had been present at the rally preceding the massacre, where Eurico Guterres spoke and indicated that militia were about to begin "cleansing" Dili of those opposing integration. They witnessed the militia rampage through Dili. Later that day when Manuel Carrascalão went to Colonel Suratman's house to seek his urgent assistance in preventing the militia attack on those taking refuge in his house, Suratman refused to take any action. [66]

489. Another example of a failure to provide effective security was when the TNI refused to take any steps to prevent the ill-treatment and deportation of civilians in Dili on 5 and 6 September, despite personal requests made by Bishop Belo directly to General Wiranto, the Timor-Leste Chief of Police, Colonel Timbul Silaen, and the Timor-Leste Military Commander, Colonel Noer Muis. Rather than take steps to prevent the deportations, TNI personnel took an active role in organising and transporting those being forcibly deported.

490. The Commission considers that there is no substantial evidence to support the proposition that the Indonesian security forces were unable to prevent the violence of the militia groups. Further, the Commission considers that there is a large body of strongly corroborated evidence to support a finding that they could easily have stopped the violence but chose not to do so. In fact it was not an issue of preventing the violence, as the Indonesian security forces were in fact orchestrating and participating directly in it. There is no other plausible explanation for the widespread failure of TNI soldiers to attempt to disarm militia members who violated the Indonesian law and presented a serious threat to security by carrying weapons openly in public.

491. A former United Nations international staff member of the UNAMET mission gave evidence about his request to a TNI soldier to arrest militia members carrying grenades after the imposition of martial law:

> He [the soldier] said to me: "We don't have orders to do that." I was shocked by that, and placed a great deal of significance on that…[T]o me it meant that they had orders not to arrest them, because it was illegal to carry arms. You wouldn't need orders to arrest people who were carrying arms, but you would need contrary orders not to arrest them.[67]

492. In August 1999, there were 17,941 regular TNI troops stationed in Timor-Leste. In addition, there were more than 6,500 Indonesian police on active duty. The TNI are a modern army, equipped with modern weapons with the readily available backing of aircraft, helicopter gunships, artillery and other heavy military hardware. The Indonesian military had demonstrated its willingness to use the full array of this equipment in Timor-Leste throughout the 24-year period of occupation. The police also were equipped with modern weapons, tear gas and other equipment suited to controlling illegal behaviour. The militia groups were a relatively untrained, hastily formed group of largely uneducated East Timorese, many of whom were very young.

493. If there had been any serious attempt by the Indonesian security forces to control the violent acts committed by the militias, then, at the very least, there would have been armed confrontations between the members of the Indonesian security forces and militia groups and large numbers of arrests made by the police. There were no such confrontations, nor were there large numbers of arrests, despite the presence of thousands of police and the commission of thousands of offences under the Indonesian criminal code. The Commission finds the explanation that a force of over 20,000 organised, well-armed military and police could not control a much smaller group of non-professionals to be totally implausible, made even more so by the absence of any evidence of any serious attempts to prevent the violence or punish those responsible.

TNI knowledge, threats and warnings before the mass violence in September 1999

494. Several warnings issued well before the ballot foreshadowed the destruction and violence that followed the announcement of the result. The TNI military commander for Timor-Leste, Colonel Tono Suratman, told an interviewer for an Australian television programme three months before the vote:

> I want to give you this message: if the pro-independence side wins, it's not going to just be the Government of Indonesia that has to deal with what follows. The UN and Australia are also going to have to solve the problem and well, if this does happen, then there'll be no winners. Everything is going to be destroyed. East Timor won't exist as it does now. It'll be much worse than 23 years ago.[68]

495. In addition the Serious Crimes Unit received evidence that in June 1999 Colonel Suratman held a meeting in Dili at which he told TNI soldiers and militia that if the East Timorese people opted for independence in the Popular Consultation everything that Indonesia had given Timor-Leste would have to be destroyed, that a scorched earth policy would be carried out so that an independent Timor-Leste would have to start with nothing, and that these orders would have to be carried out by all forces in Timor-Leste. [69]

496. The extent to which these warnings represented a fixed government policy on the consequences of a vote for independence rather than mere threats designed to secure a pro-integrationist result is not clear.* However, the fact that they were issued by a senior military officer after the signing of the 5 May Agreements at the very least demonstrates a partisanship that was at odds with Indonesia's obligations under the agreements. Moreover, the fact that the warnings were indeed borne out in the violence and destruction committed by the TNI and its militia allies after the ballot indicates that they were not simply empty threats.

The failure of the TNI to punish perpetrators/institutional rewards to those involved

497. The Commission considers that the TNI's almost total failure to investigate or discipline any of its members for their actions in Timor-Leste in 1999, despite ample evidence of the direct involvement of TNI troops in violations, indicates that the senior levels of the organisation did not consider that these violations should be punished. Taken in combination with the other evidence of direct and indirect participation discussed above, the Commission concludes that the TNI personnel who committed violations were not punished because in participating in the violence they had been acting in accordance with, not in contradiction to, their orders.

498. According to the principle of command responsibility, the failure of the senior TNI commanders to prevent those under their command and control from committing violations and to punish those responsible, when they had direct knowledge that the

* A report written by Major General (retired) H R Garnardi in July 1999 for his superior, the powerful Coordinating Minister for Political and Security Affairs, Lieutenant General (retired) Faisal Tanjung, at the very least indicates that the destruction of facilities and infrastructure was being discussed in high official circles at the time. The widely-circulated "Garnadi document" does not, however, provide conclusive evidence that a well-articulated "scorched earth" policy had already been developed by July [see also Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, Chapter 5.3].

499. Not only were the perpetrators and their commanders not held to be legally accountable, they were not even punished through institutional mechanisms. It would be expected that the failure of commanders to maintain security despite being provided with more than sufficient resources to control the situation would at least damage their careers. In fact the opposite was true. A number of senior commanders were rewarded with promotions shortly after they had played a prominent role in the events in Timor-Leste. The Commission considers this to be further evidence that the senior levels of the TNI did not disapprove of the role which these officers played, but in fact approved of it.

500. Senior TNI officers who won promotion after the events of 1999 included:

- Major General Kiki Syahnakri, who as the Assistant for Operations to the Army Chief of Staff and then as Martial Law Commander played a prominent role in Timor-Leste in 1999, was promoted to Deputy Army Chief of Staff in November 2000
- Major General Adam Rachmat Damiri, who was Commander of the Udayana Regional Command (Kodam Udayana/IX) during 1999, was promoted to Assistant for Operations to the Chief of the General Staff TNI in November 1999 and has since worked on TNI operations in Aceh
- Colonel Suhartono Suratman, who was the Commander of the Timor-Leste Sub-Region (Korem) during most of 1999, was promoted to the rank of Brigadier General in August 1999 and appointed Deputy Head of the TNI information centre
- Colonel Mohammad Noer Muis, who succeeded Colonel Suratman as Korem Commander in August 1999, was subsequently promoted to the rank of Brigadier General and has served as the Deputy Governor of the Military Academy in Magelang
- Lietenant Colonel Yayat Sudrajat, the head of the Tribuana Task Force, was subsequently promoted to the rank of Colonel and continues to serve with Kopassus.[70]

501. The supreme commander of the TNI, General Wiranto, indicated during the trial of Timbul Silaen, the head of the provincial police force in Timor-Leste during 1999, conducted in the Ad Hoc Human Rights Court on East Timor in Jakarta, that he considered his senior officers had performed their duties well:

> I evaluate all my subordinates, the Regional Police Chief, the Regional Military Commander, and from my observations from the reports I received, because they were chosen from the best people in the police and the army, they carried out the directives I had outlined.[71]

* The principles of command responsibility are summarised earlier in this Part, and in detail in Vol 1, Part 2: The Mandate of the Commission.

The role of members of the Indonesian police

502. The Commission has found that throughout 1999, both before and after Indonesia signed the 5 May Agreements, the Indonesian police failed to prevent or intervene in acts of violence carried out by militia groups, and only on very few occasions took action to investigate or punish such acts after they occurred. Despite the fact that there were thousands of violations committed during the period, the only action against militia groups appears to have been taken in response to international pressure, when several men were arrested and charged over the attacks on the Maliana UNAMET headquarters on 29 June and on the humanitarian convoy in Liquiçá on 4 July, when UN officials were present. However, despite the seriousness of these offences, those accused received only short sentences, most of which were suspended, and the general pattern of police inaction did not change. In addition in some cases police were actively involved in violations perpetrated by militia groups and members of the TNI. The police force's elite paramilitary component, the Mobile Brigade (Brimob), were most frequently reported to have been active perpetrators of violations.

503. Reports of violations to the Commission indicate that during 1999 police involvement in killings, arbitrary detentions, and torture and ill-treatment reached their highest levels for the entire period 1974–1999. This is despite the fact that the 5 May Agreements had specifically given the police responsibility to maintain security for the Popular Consultation.

504. In the Commission's view the inaction of the police was not due to their inability to control the violence, but rather to their subordinate relationship to the TNI. In view of this relationship and knowing that the militiamen had the support of the TNI, and in some cases were themselves members of the TNI, the police were unlikely to intervene to control their activities. The fact that the thousands of police officers all ignored widespread serious criminal offences on a daily basis is strong evidence for accepting that they were issued with orders not to intervene to arrest militia or TNI members involved in serious violations. The only logical conclusion which can be drawn from this systematic refusal to carry out normal duties is that the Indonesian police were either tacitly or explicitly involved in an arrangement with the TNI in a plan to use violence and intimidation to secure the desired result in the ballot.

505. Although the police were formally separated from ABRI on 1 April 1999, in practice the TNI continued to dominate the police. A former member of the Indonesian police stated:

> I saw him [the Kapolres, the Indonesian District Police Chief] as a military Indonesian officer like the Bupati and the Dandim. I say military, in fact Polri [the police force] was separated from ABRI on 1 April 1999, but that was only administratively. When it came to the work in the field nothing changed after that date. [72]

Collaboration and participation of officials of the Indonesian local and central government

506. Indonesian government officials both in Timor-Leste and at central government level were involved in the systematic violations that occurred in 1999 in a number of ways. At the local level officials from the Governor downwards had responsibility for administering and implementing the programme for the "socialisation of autonomy", which aside from its ostensible objective of convincing people to vote for integration, was also one source of militia funding. A number of District Administrators (Bupati) worked closely with the militia groups in their districts, and some at least were listed as "sponsors" of these groups on official documentation. Many Sub-district Administrators (Camat) were also militia commanders. The general climate of intimidation extended to the civil administration. Many witnesses provided testimony to the Commission that government employees were informed by their superiors that they must support the pro-autonomy programme or forfeit their jobs.

507. Central government ministers played a variety of roles during the period surrounding the Popular Consultation. Some of these roles were peripheral to the programme of violations conducted by the TNI and their militia allies.* However, others were central to the overall strategy pursued both before and after the ballot. Examples include:

- The attendance of the then Foreign Minister, Ali Alatas, at a meeting in Denpasar, Bali in April 1999 at which the role of the militias in the forthcoming months was discussed
- The reportedly key role of the Ministry of Transmigration and Resettlement, headed by Lieutenant General (retired) Hendropriyono, who had had several tours of duty in Timor-Leste as a Kopassus officer, in the preparation of plans for the deportation of East Timorese to West Timor after the ballot
- The involvement of Lieutenant General (retired) Faisal Tanjung, the Coordinating Minister for Political and Security Affairs, in developing the strategy for winning the vote, as well as the contingency plans in the event that the strategy failed.†

Command responsibility within the TNI

508. The Commission has found that senior officers of the TNI actively participated in organising and directing the programme of mass violations. In addition there is abundant evidence that these commanders are responsible and accountable according to the principles of command responsibility. The definition of command responsibility adopted by the Commission provides that persons in positions of authority – whether military or civilian – who had effective control over the direct perpetrators of violations,

* The Ministry of Foreign Affairs, for example, is reported to have provided funding to send a group of Indonesian NGOs to Timor-Leste to act as observers during the Popular Consultation. The UNAMET Electoral Division refused to give them accreditation on the grounds that they lacked the necessary neutrality.

† The fact that the "Garnadi document" discussing such strategic questions (see footnote, above) was addressed to General Faisal Tanjung partially confirms the latter's key role.

and who knew or should have known of the violations, themselves become responsible when they fail to take steps to prevent or punish those violations.*

509. The Commission considers that those in senior positions in the TNI knew or should have known of the crimes that were being committed in Timor-Leste. This information was available through the hierarchy of the TNI itself. For example, General Wiranto gave evidence at the trial of Colonel Timbul Silaen in Jakarta that he (Wiranto) regularly received reports on the situation in Timor-Leste from various sources, including the Military Commander of Udayana/IX Region Major General Adam Damiri, the Sub-regional Military Commander responsible for Timor-Leste, Colonel Suhartono Suratman, and the Regional Police Chief, Timbul Silaen.

510. In addition General Wiranto himself, as well as others, repeatedly visited Timor-Leste during 1999. On his five visits to Timor-Leste, Wiranto was directly informed by senior UN officials, the media and East Timorese leaders of the acts of violence being carried out by TNI and militia groups. Following the arrival of UNAMET in June, the Special Representative of the UN Secretary-General, Ian Martin, made regular reports to Indonesian officials, and to the TNI leadership in particular, which included information concerning the involvement of the TNI and links between TNI and militia groups.[73] In his sworn evidence at the Commission's National Public Hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, he said:

> I and my colleagues were constantly putting our information and concerns to the civilian and military members of the Indonesian Task Force. We met often with Major General Zacky Anwar Makarim, who General Wiranto had told me was his personal representative on the ground. Our civilian police and military liaison officers did the same, in Dili and in the districts. Information and protests were directly conveyed to General Wiranto's advisors and to the Foreign Ministry (DEPLU) by UNAMET's office in Jakarta. The diplomatic community watching East Timor from there was kept well informed. After attacks on UNAMET's office in Maliana and on a humanitarian convoy in Liquiçá, I flew to Jakarta to put directly to General Wiranto our evidence of the relationship between the TNI and the militia, in a meeting on 7 July. International concern at this time led President Habibie to send his ministers to Dili, where I and my colleagues put the same concerns to Foreign Minister Alatas.
> The Security Council was briefed regularly on the basis of our reporting, and it applied pressure on Indonesia through Presidential statements, and through meetings of its President with the representative of Indonesia. The Secretary-General's concern was conveyed repeatedly at many levels, by his Personal Representative, Ambassador Jamsheed Marker, and by senior officials. Key member states, including the USA and Australia, were kept informed in New York, in Jakarta, and when senior members of their governments visited East Timor. I do not know all the details of the various pressures which were applied by individual governments on Indonesia, but they were many.

The central role of Major General Zacky Anwar Makarim

511. From May 1999 Major General Zacky Anwar Makarim was officially a member of the Task Force to Oversee the Popular Consultation in Timor-Leste and from July 1999 he was Head of the Special Team/Adjutant General's Task Force. However the Commission finds that in an unofficial capacity Makarim was involved in the organisation and direction of East Timorese militia groups from at least March 1999 and most likely earlier.

512. Statements by former pro-autonomy leaders to the Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes indicate that the Assistant for Operations to the Army Chief of Staff, Major General Kiki Syahnakri, told East Timorese pro-autonomy leaders in March 1999 that Makarim was the person who would be responsible for organising activities in the lead-up to the Popular Consultation.

513. Statements of former pro-autonomy leaders to the Deputy Prosecutor for Serious Crimes also indicated that Makarim was responsible for organising the supply of weapons including automatic firearms to militia groups, through Colonel Suhartono Suratman, who was Commander of Sub-Regional Military Command in Timor-Leste until 13 August 1999.

Findings and conclusions

514. The Commission finds the following:

1. Senior TNI officers formed the militia groups, gave them assurances that they would be funded, armed and otherwise supported by the TNI, and told them they would be used against pro-independence supporters.
2. Senior TNI officers publicly endorsed the militia groups at rallies and other public meetings.
3. TNI personnel served in these militia groups. Some militia groups were commanded by TNI personnel.
4. The TNI funded the militias. Government funds were also diverted to pay militia members. Regular payments made to thousands of militia members required significant planning, administration and coordination, involving both military and civilian officials.
5. The TNI armed the militias, and were able to withdraw the arms at will.
6. The TNI trained the militias, at official TNI bases and other sites.
7. The TNI allowed militia groups to use military headquarters as their bases, including at times immediately before and after major human rights violations involving the mass execution of civilians.
8. Members of the TNI frequently committed violations together with members of militia groups, as part of a common enterprise.

9. The TNI were able to regulate the incidence of violence at will, including the actions of the militia.
10. With very few exceptions the TNI took no action against militia members who committed violations, despite the fact that it was commonplace for militia to carry arms openly, and to kill, torture and otherwise mistreat civilians in the presence of TNI personnel.
11. Senior TNI personnel issued threats and warnings that massive violations and the destruction of property would take place after the ballot, if the independence vote won. The violence and destruction did in fact take place following the ballot, in accordance with the warnings.
12. Senior Indonesian government officials were advised to make a contingency plan which included mass evacuation and destruction of facilities and key assets, six weeks before those exact acts were carried out by TNI and militia.
13. The level of violence and destruction increased significantly after the TNI was given wider powers over events in Timor-Leste, following the declaration of martial law on 7 September 1999.
14. Members of the TNI, police and government officials involved in the violations were not arrested or disciplined for their role as perpetrators.
15. Almost no action was taken to stop the violations, despite repeated requests from the UN and governments, and the obvious capacity to overcome any militia resistance due to vastly superior numbers and weapons used by the TNI and police.
16. A number of senior TNI officers who held command positions over troops in Timor-Leste at the time of the violations were rewarded through promotion for their actions in Timor-Leste, despite the fact that troops under their control were involved in mass violations and failed in their duties relating to provision of security in the territory.

Conclusions

515. The Commission finds that senior members of the Indonesian security forces were involved in the planning, coordination and implementation of a programme which included widespread and systematic human rights violations committed against East Timorese civilians amounting to crimes against humanity. These senior commanders hold both direct and command responsibility for the crimes against humanity committed.

516. The Commission finds that the initial purpose of the plan that was implemented was to ensure that a majority of East Timorese voted to remain part of Indonesia in the Popular Consultation conducted in August 1999. An integral part of the plan to achieve this goal was the use of East Timorese militia groups as agents of the TNI, in an attempt to deflect charges of responsibility from the TNI itself. The TNI is institutionally responsible for forming, arming, funding, directing and controlling the actions of the militia groups. In addition a significant number of violations were directly perpetrated by serving members of the TNI, both alone and in company with militia groups. Members of the Indonesian police and civilian government officials were also involved both directly and indirectly in the systematic commission of violations. The TNI, the police and the Indonesian government were all involved in protecting the perpetrators from accountability for their actions.

Kodim – general

520. The following data relate to violations committed by personnel serving in the 13 District Military Commands (Kodim) between 1974 and 1999. Table 20 shows the breakdown of violations by Kodim personnel according to type, with the great majority being detentions and the torture and ill-treatment often associated with detention.

Table 4: Breakdown of Kodim violations by type

Type of Violation	Number	%
Detention	3,321	55.0
Torture	1,198	19.9
Ill–treatment	725	12.0
Displacements	545	9.0
Civilian killings	129	2.1
Disappearances	75	1.2
Sexually-based violations	40	0.7
Total	6,033	100.0

521. The greatest number of violations perpetrated by Kodim as a group took place in the period 1981- 83 (41% or 2,462/6,033) and in 1999 (9% or 561/6,033).

Kodim 1627 Dili

Violations

522. The Dili District Kodim committed the largest number of violations in two periods: in 1980–1984 (331/512), and smaller numbers in the period 1990–1994 (100/512).

Kodim 1629 Lautém

Violations

523. Almost 93% of violations by the Lautém Kodim occurred in the period 1978–1986 (849/916), in three distinct phases. Smaller proportions of the violations occurred in 1978–1980 (86/916) and 1984–1986 (113/916) relative to the middle three year period, 1981–1983 (650/916) when the bulk of violations reported to have been perpetrated by the Kodim occurred. Thereafter the number of violations reported fell sharply, although in 1992 (11/916) and 1999 (26/916) more violations occurred than normal. While there were incidents of torture in many years, by far the greatest number was in 1983 (57/92). Nearly all disappearances were reported in two years, 1981–1982 (98/105).

Kodim 1631 Manatuto

Violations

524. Most violations reported to have been committed by the Manatuto Kodim occurred in the period 1980–1982 (73% or 384/530) with the greatest number in 1982 (285/530). Unusually there was no increase in 1999. The largest number of incidents of torture occurred in 1982 (130/146).

Kodim 1632 Aileu

Violations

525. The greatest number of violations occurred in 1983 (113/368). Other years in which the number of violations was higher than usual were 1978 (23/368), 1980 (60/368), 1981 (30/368), 1984 (45/368) and 1998 (22/368).

Kodim 1633 Ainaro

Violations

526. The largest number of reports of violations by the Ainaro Kodim, over 60%, were perpetrated in 1982 (255/416), coming after a slow rise in reports in the years 1976–1981 (115/416 in total). After no violations were recorded in 1983, they rose again in 1984 (25/416).

527. There was a slightly higher incidence of reports of sexual violations by Ainaro Kodim (9/416) relative to other Kodims, though as a percentage of all violations they represented a small proportion (about 2%). All nine reports of sexual violations took place in the period 1980–1982.

Kodim 1634 Manufahi

Violations

528. The highest number of violations committed by the Manufahi Kodim occurred in 1982 (142/542) with the period 1979–1985 accounting for nearly three-quarters (74.3%) of all violations (403/542). There was also a high incidence of violations in 1994 (69/542) and the incidence was relatively high in 1998 (25/542) and 1999 (15/542). Nearly all disappearances (8/9) and civilian killings (7/15) occurred in 1983. Half the incidents of torture occurred in 1980–1982 (63/126) with a large number in 1994 (34/126).

Kodim 1637 Ermera

Violations

529. The pattern of reported violations for Ermera Kodim differs in a number of respects from that reported for other districts. Firstly the reports are mostly from the early and the later periods of the conflict, with virtually no violations reported in the 1980s. Secondly, there was a much higher level of sexual violations perpetrated by the Ermera Kodim. More than one third of reported violations (138/378) occurred in 1976–1978 with 1976 the peak year (84/378). However, in 1981–1983 when most other Kodim appear to have been committing high levels of violations, the number reported from Ermera was low (4/378) and there were only eight violations reported during the entire period 1981–1990. By contrast between 1991 and 1998 there were many violations reported (128/378) and violations reached an all-time peak in 1999 (104/378). The level of reports of sexual violations (15/378) was five times higher in Ermera than the average for all Kodim. Most (12/15) were reported to have been committed in the period 1976–1978. The remainder (3/15) occurred in 1999.

Kodim 1638 Liquiçá

Violations

530. Nearly half of the violations reportedly committed by the Kodim in Liquiçá occurred in the period 1979–1982 (142/279). There are no reports from 1983, but 15 in 1984. In the following years there were few violations reported until 1995–1999 (108/297).

Koramil

531. The Commission received a very large number of reports, 7,486 in total, of violations involving the the 65 Sub-district Military Commands (Koramil) from all periods of the conflict and in all districts. Over half of the reported violations occurred in the period 1978–1984 (3,864/7,486). More than 17% of these violations were reported to have been committed in 1999 (1,301/7,486).

532. While there are reports of violations in every district, the highest number were in Dili District (1,381/7,486, over 18%). Virtually all reported violations in Oecussi District were from 1999 (293/299).

Infantry battalions

Violations

533. A total of 675 incidents of violations by Battalion 744 were reported to the CAVR. Almost 62% of these incidents (415/675) relate to the years 1978 (114/675), 1980 (96/675),1998 (153/675) and 1999 (52/675). Battalion 744 was a territorial unitand permanently stationed in Timor-Leste and active in every district. In general there are long periods in the various districts where there are little or no reported violations, interspersed with periods of significant activity as explained by the following.

- Dili District accounted for almost one third of all violations (215/675), of which the majority occurred in 1980 (82/215) and 1998 (44/215).
- Manufahi District also reported a high number of incidents (154/675), with most of these relating to 1998 (129/154), probably relating to the Alas incident (similar to Battalion 745 below).
- In Ermera District (117/675) most of the reports related to 1978 (87/117). There were no reports in the period 1979–95 followed by a rise in 1996/97 (23/117) and none subsequently.
- Violations in Bobonaro District (48/675) were almost all grouped in the periods 1975–79 (33/48) and 1997 (12/48), with only one report in the intervening period, 1980 – 96.

Infantry Battalion 745

Violations

534. The Commission received reports of 1,073 human rights violations involving Battalion 745 between 1974 and 1999. Over 57% of violations occurred between 1978 and 1980 with almost 35% taking place in 1979 alone. A further 23% date from 1981–1983, compared with just over 7% in 1998–1999. For each of the years 1984–1995 the number of reports is ten or less. Battalion 745 was a territorial unit permanently stationed in Timor-Leste and was active in most districts of the territory. However the largest number of reports of violations were received from the following districts:

- Lautém: About 29% of all reported incidents were in Lautém (309/1,073), mainly in the period 1979–1983 (254/309).
- Manufahi (199/1,073), mostly in the years 1979 (96/199), 1983 (25/199) and in 1998 (42/199) which is probably related to the Alas incident.
- Baucau (137/1,073), principally in 1979–1980 (83/137).
- Manatuto (123/1,073) again in the year 1979 (90/123). By contrast, in the districts of Aileu, Ainaro, Covalima, Oecussi and Bobonaro reported incidents are generally in single figures, accounting for only about 3% of the total (36/1,073).

Civil defence

535. The Commission received a very large number of reports of violations (19,055) by civil defence groups, including Hansip, at all stages of the conflict and in all districts, acting alone or jointly with Indonesian forces. This represents more than one fifth of all the reports of violations received by the Commission.

536. The years with the greatest number of violations were 1978 (2,222/19,055), 1979 (3,220/19,055) and 1983 (2,285/19,055). In total the six-year period 1978–1983 accounts for 69% (2,726/19,055) of reported violations. Geographically the districts with most violations were: Viqueque (3,709/19,055), Lautém (2,913/19,055) and Baucau (2,739/19,055). Whereas for most reported violations committed by all types of perpetrator groups Dili tended to record higher numbers than other districts, it is only slightly above the average level for reported violations by civil defence groups.

537. The data show some differences from the general pattern as follows:

- Lautém District: 56% (1,277/2,285) of all reports in 1983 relate to Lautém District.
- Ainaro District: 79% (429/540) of all reports in 1991 relate to Ainaro District.
- Viqueque District: 85% (171/204) of all reports in 1996 relate to Viqueque Disrict.
- Manufahi District: 85% (305/357) of all reports in 1998 relate to Manufahi District.
- Oecussi District: nearly all reports in Oecussi District (86/88) were of violations committed in 1999.
- Bobonaro District: there were few reported violations in Bobonaro District between 1984 and 1998 (46/701), but the total rose dramatically in 1999 (170/701).

538. The Commission received 180 reports of violations by Infantry Battalion 144 grouped in the following districts.

- Dili District, 1981 – 12/180 reports
- Ermera, 1998 – 45/180 reports
- Covalima, 1999 – 82/180 reports

539. The Commission has been unable to determine the names of commanders of Infantry Battalion 144.

Infantry Battalion 301

540. The Commission received 66 reports of violations by Infantry Battalion 301 as follows.

- Lautém, 1985 – 42/66 reports.

541. The Commission has been unable to determine the names of commanders of Infantry Battalion 301.

542. The Commission received 415 reports of violations by Infantry Battalion 315 as follows.

- Ermera – 38/47 reports from 1977
- Lautém – over half of all reports (225/415) from 1982 (34/225), 1983 (66/415) and 1984 (122/415)
- Viqueque – 21/23 reports from 1992
- Baucau – 38/74 reports from 1992 and 18/74 from 1983

543. The Commission received 86 reports of violations by Infantry Battalion 321 as follows.

- Baucau – 12/19 reports from 1979
- Ainaro – 21/25 reports from 1982
- Lautém – 13/31 from 1983 and 17/31 from 1984

Infantry Battalion 403

544. The Commission received 171 reports of violations by Infantry Battalion 403. A large proportion relate to the period 1976–1979 (148/171 or 87%) and most relate to the three districts listed below.

- Ermera – 28/45 reports from 1976
- Viqueque – 48/78 reports from 1978 and 24/78 from 1979
- Manatuto – reports 23/36 from 1979

545. Years served: 1978, 1987, 1989.

The Commission received 127 reports of violations by Infantry Battalion 407 from particular periods and districts as described below.

- Liquiçá – 14/16 reports from 1979
- Bobonaro – all 27 reports are from 1984

- Viqueque – 42/58 reports from 1992
- Covalima – all 13 reports from 1999

546. The Comission has been unable to determine the names of commanders of Infantry Battalion 407.

547. Years served: 1975, 1993, 1996.

The Commission received 278 reports of violations by Infantry Battalion 512, 66% (183/278) of these reports relate to the period 1976–1980, and 20% (55/178) to the year 1984.

- Ermera – most of the reports relate to 1976–1979 (148/176) (see also Infantry Battalions 315 and 403)
- Manufahi – all 55 reports relate to 1984.

Infantry Battalion 514

548. The Commission received 71 reports of violations by Infantry Battalion 514, almost all of which relate to 1982–1983 (70/71) and the following districts.

- Viqueque – 19/20 reports are from 1982
- Baucau – all 15 reports are from 1982
- Dili District – 18/19 reports are from 1982
- Aileu – all 18 reports are from 1983

549. The Commission has been unable to determine the names of commanders for Infantry Battalion 514.

Year of duty: 1992.

550. The Commission received 156 reports of violations by Infantry Battalion 641, all from Lautém district in 1983 (142/156) and 1984 (13/156).

551. The Commission has been unable to determine the names of commanders of Infantry Battalion 641.

SGI (Satuan Gabungan Intelijen / Joint Intelligence Unit)

552. The CAVR has received a large number (2,659) of reports of violations attributed to the SGI.* The number of violations averaged about 26 per year for the years 1976–1990 (with 64% of these cases in Dili district), then rising dramatically in the period 1991–1999 to an average of 240 per year (or a total of 2,176 out of all the 2,659 reports of violations attributed to the SGI). Reports of violations for the period 1990–1999 (2,167/2,659 or 82%) are concentrated in three districts: Ermera 42% (904/2,167), Dili 27% (581/2,167) and Bobonaro 21% (460/2,167). The term SGI may be too broad to designate a particular commander. The reports therefore refer to the institution in a broad sense rather than a particular commander.

Kopassandha/Kopassus – Special Forces Command

553. The Commission received a very large number (8,710) of reports of violations by Kopassandha/Kopassus in all districts and during all periods of the conflict. The greatest number of violations were reported for the years 1983 (977/8,710) and 1984 (909/8,710), (see Lautém and Viqueque Districts below). There were much fewer reports for the years 1988 (46/8,710) and 1990 (51/8,710), compared to the average. In contrast to the general trend of violations, there was no significant increase in reports for 1999. The reports of violations distributed through the various districts are as follows:

- Viqueque – 20% of all reports were in Viqueque district (1,729). A large proportion of these were for 1983 (352/1,729), which is over a third off all violations for all districts in 1983. Similarily in 1984 (425/1,729) many reports were from Viqueque, accounting for almost half of all violations for 1984 (425/909).
- Dili District – Dili also accounted for a large number of violations (1,480) with most in 1980 (276/1,480).
- Baucau – a large proportion (1,038/8,710) were in Baucau district. Most were in 1986 (415/1,038).
- Lautém – a large proportion of the total violations for Lautém (1,021) were in the year 1983 (331/1,021), which is over a third of all violations for all districts in 1983 (331/977).
- Oecussi – in general there are very few reports of violations for Oecussi before 1999, however nearly all the reports of violations by Kopassus are from 1976 (38/58) and 1977 (18/58) with the remainder (2/58) in 1999.

Marines

Violations

554. The Commission received 156 reports of violations by Marines, mainly in the early part of the conflict and only in certain districts. Over 60% (97/156) occurred in the period 1976–1979. There was a smaller number of reports for 1983 (16/156). There were few reports after this, and a slight increase in 1998 (6/156) and 1999 (6/156).

- Naucau – almost half of the reports are for Baucau distrct in the period 1976–1979
- Viqueque – there were a number of reports (30/156) sporadically in Viqueque district, all before 1986
- Aileu – most reports for Aileu were in the years 1982 (4/17) and 1983 (14/17)

Brimob

555. The Commission received 528 reports of violations by the police mobile brigade (Brimob) in the later phases of the conflict mostly in Dili and Baucau Districts. 90% of violations were reported to have occurred in 1991–1999, with the highest number of violations reportedly committed by Brimob in 1995 (126/528), but their level remained high during the last years of the occupation 1996–1999, averaging 67 per year.

- Dili District – a large proportion of reports were from Dili (205/528)
- Baucau District – a large proportion of reports were from Baucau (178/528)

Rajawali*

Violations

556. The Commission received 881 reports of violations by Rajawali mainly in the later stages of the conflict. The period 1994–1999 accounted for 94% of violations by Rajawali (830/881), especially in 1997 (255/881). While there were reports from all districts (except Oecussi), they were concentrated in the following districts:

- Ermera – over half of all reports are from Ermera (504/881) with the greatest number in 1997 (165/504)
- Bobonaro – accounted for 98/881 reports
- Dili – there was a relatively low number of reports for Dili District (32/881).

Table 19: Known Commanders of Rajawali

Name	Rank	Years served	Position
Priyo Patmonoyogo	Major	10/02/1996

Milsas

Violations

557. Of the large number of reports (1,026) which the Commission received about violations by Milsas the trend matches the general pattern, namely that the biggest number of activities were in 1982 (112/1,026) and at the end of the 1990s: 1996 (168/1,026), 1998 (193/1,026), and 1999 (194/1,026). However there is a significant difference in the spread of violations which show Milsas involved in a number of big incidents in various districts in specific years, as follows:

- Covalima – 25/30 reports in 1976
- Manatuto – 81/112 reports in 1982
- Ainaro – 52/61 reports in 1991
- Manufahi – 38/43 reports in 1994
- Viqueque – 165/198 reports in 1998.

* In the late 1980s and early 1990s Rajawali were Kopassus units; from 1995 until the end of the occupation they were combat units under Kostrad command.

Police*

Violations

558. The CAVR received a very large number of reports (4,316) of police involvement in violations from all districts and all periods of the conflict. There was a higher number of violations relating to the police in the years 1980–1984 (704/4,316) with an average of 141 per year. There was a much higher lever of violations in the years 1991–1999 (3,065/4,316) with an average of 340 violations per year. One quarter of all reported violations for the entire conflict (1,037/4,316) occurred in 1999.

- Dili – over one quarter of all incidents reported were in Dili District (1,130/4,316).
- Covalima – in 1999 there was a higher level of reports in Covalima (225/301).
- Oecussi – almost all reported incidents occurred in 1999 (463/486).

Polres – District Police

559. The CAVR received 951 reports of violations where Polres was named as the perpetrator. There was a higher number of reports in 1984 (73/951) but over half the reports are from the period 1996–1999 (501/951). Certain districts reported greater numbers of violations as follows:

- Dili District – 177/951 reports
- Ermera District – 174/951 reports
- Liquiçá District – 139/951 reports
- Manufahi District – 124/951 reports
- Oecussi District – all 78 reports were from 1999

Table 20: Known commanders of Polres

Name	Rank	Years served	Position
Bambang Hermanu	Lt. Col (Pol.)	1999	Police Chief, Aileu
Drs Rizali SH	Major (Pol.)	1999	Police Chief, Ainaro
Drs. Sodak C. Marpaung	Lt. Col (Pol.)	1999	Police Chief, Baucau
Drs Budi Susilo	Major (Pol.)	1999 Indicted by Serious Crimes for several incidents in Bobonaro district in 1999	Police Chief, Bobonaro
Gatot Subiaktoro	Lt. Col (Pol)	1999	Police Chief, Covalima
Ery T.B. Gultom	Lt. Col (Pol)	1999	Police Chief, Ermera
Drs Irsan Wijaya	Lt. Col (Pol)	1999	Police Chief, Lautém

* The term 'police' is vague and has possibly been used in database entries to represent all references to the police. Employing the specific name of the institution at the micro level (such as 'polsek') is more useful.

Name	Rank	Years served	Position
Adios Salova	Lt. Col (Pol)	1999 Indicted by Serious Crimes for several incidents in Liquiçá district in 1999.	Police Chief, Liquiçá
Drs. Joko Irianto	Major. (Pol)	1999	Police Chief, Liquiçá
Drs J A Sumampow	Lt. Col (Pol)	1999	Police Chief, Manatuto
Drs Abdul Rachim	Lt. Col (Pol)	1999	Police Chief, Manufahi
Drs Wilmar Marpaung	Lt. Col (Pol)	1999	Police Chief, Oecussi
Drs Abdul Rahman	Lt. Col (Pol)	1999	Police Chief, Viqueque

Polsek

560. The reports of violations by Polsek follow a similar pattern to that of Polres. The CAVR received 676 reports of violations where Polsek was named as the perpetrator. There was a higher number of reports in 1980 (31/676) but over 64% of the reports are from the period 1996–1999 (434/676), with a large proportion from 1999 (251/676). Certain districts reported greater numbers of violations as follows:

- Oecussi District – 175/177 reports were from 1999. This is a very high figure for Oecussi District, representing over quarter of all reports for Polsek (177/676)
- Ermera District – 94/676 reports
- Dili District – 79/676 reports
- Liquiçá District – 62/676 reports
- Manufahi District – 36/676 reports

Local Government*

561. The Commission received a very large number of reports of violations (6,467) by members of administrative units identified only as "Government" in all districts during all periods of the conflict. Over half the reports of violations occurred in the period 1979–1984 (3,628/6,467), with higher numbers in the years 1979 (656/6,467), 1981 (803/6,467) and 1983 (828/6,467). The greatest number of reports was from the year 1999 (920/6,467). Most reports came from the following districts:

- Dili District (1,327/6,467)
- Viqueque (1,017/6,467)
- Lautém (794/6,467)
- Baucau (632/6,467)
- Oecussi – nearly all reports were from 1999 (410/431)
- Covalima – over half of reports were from 1999 (121/226).

* The term 'government' may have been used generically. It may be more useful to specify which institution (eg at sub-district level) is intended.

Provincial Government

Violations

562. The Commission received 269 reports of violations by provincial government officials. There is no pattern of general or widespread violations, but rather of isolated incidents as described above. Most reports of violations occurred in the period 1979–1983 (226/269 or 85%) and to a lesser extent in 1999 (28/269).

District Government

Violations

563. The pattern of reports of violations is similar to that of the provincial government. The Commission received 360 reports of violations by district. Again there is no pattern of general or widespread violations, but rather of isolated incidents. Most violations occurred in the period 1979–1983 (171/360 or 48%) with similar levels of reports in the years 1991(22/360), 1992 (32/360), 1995 (24/360) and 1999 (32/360).

Village Government

Violations

564. The Commission received a very large number of reports of violations perpetrated by the Village Government (2,266). The pattern is of widespread reports across all districts during all periods of the conflict as well as involvement in particular incidents as for the Regional and District Government as described above. A large proportion or reports are from the period 1979–1984 (983/2,266 or 43%), with greater numbers in 1991 (115/2,266 – 100 of these were in Ainaro District) and 1999 (527/2,266 – 317 of these were in Oecussi).

9 Community Reconciliation

Yes and the perpetrators…must recognise their mistake and ask for forgiveness…the communities already told me bring them back. We will live together, we will punish them in our way, we will demand from them: "Oh, you burnt this house, help us and we will rebuild together."[1]

Former CNRT President, Kay Rala Xanana Gusmão, 2001.

Introduction

Overview of this part

1. One of the Commission's core functions was promoting reconciliation in Timor-Leste. This objective informed the design of all Commission programmes and the way such programmes were implemented. The Commission adopted a holistic, integrated approach to promoting reconciliation in Timor-Leste, involving all levels of society in its work. It also approached the goal of reconciliation from a variety of angles through the broad range of programmes it undertook during its operational period. It was understood by the Commission that, if it was to be truly effective, it must engage individuals, families and community groups from all sides of the conflict, reach to the highest levels of the national leadership, and continue for many years to come.

2. The Commission's main reconciliation initiative at the grassroots level was its Community Reconciliation Process (CRP) programme. This was a novel and previously untested programme designed to promote reconciliation in local communities. It aimed to achieve this through reintegrating people who had become estranged from their communities by committing politically-related, "less serious", harmful acts during the political conflicts in Timor-Leste.* The underlying belief of the programme was that communities in Timor-Leste, and those who had harmed them in less serious ways, were ready to reconcile with each other. The CRP procedure was based on the philosophy that community reconciliation could best be achieved through a facilitated, village-based, participatory mechanism. This mechanism combined practices of traditional justice, arbitration, mediation and aspects of both criminal and civil law.

3. Accordingly, the Commission was given a mandate by Regulation 10/2001[2] to organise community-based hearings. At these hearings, victims, perpetrators and the wider community could participate directly in finding a solution to enable perpetrators of "harmful acts" to be reaccepted into the community. The regulation set out the basic steps to be followed in a CRP but did not spell out the precise procedure, allowing flexibility for the inclusion of elements from local traditional practice.

4. The CRP was a voluntary process. Hearings were conducted in the affected community by a panel of local leaders, chaired by a Regional Commissioner with responsibility for the district where the hearing was held. At the hearing the perpetrator was required to admit fully his participation in the conflict. Victims and other members of the public were then given the opportunity to ask questions and make comments on the perpetrator's statement. Hearings were often an extremely emotional experience for the participants and could continue all day and into the night. After all relevant actors had spoken, the panel brokered an agreement in which the perpetrator consented to undertake certain actions. These could include community service or the payment of reparations to victims. In return for performing these actions the perpetrator was reaccepted into the community. Traditional practices, or lisan† were incorporated into the procedure, varying according to local custom.

5. Before a hearing could be conducted, the Office of the General Prosecutor (OGP)[3] was required to consider the case and agree that it could proceed through a CRP rather than be prosecuted in the courts. Following the hearing the drafted reconciliation agreement could, after judicial consideration, become an Order of the Court. If the Court approved, and the perpetrator carried out his or her obligations, immunity from civil or criminal action would be granted.

6. The results of the CRP programme indicate that it has made a real contribution to community reconciliation in Timor-Leste, and the reintegration of perpetrators of past wrongs into their communities. 1,371 perpetrators successfully completed a CRP, many more than the initial target of 1,000, and many more requested that the CRP programme continue. Perpetrators, victims and other participants have reported to the Commission that the CRP programme contributed significantly to the maintenance of peace in their communities and to settling past divisions. Perhaps the most important

* During the design of the CRP, community consultations were held at which community members expressed the strong feeling that they could not reconcile with those responsible for more serious crimes, such as murder, rape and torture, until they had been formally prosecuted and tried.

† Lisan is a combination of beliefs, customs and traditions of East Timorese people. Lisan varies from community to community and is generally an important aspect of community life, especially in rural areas. It is often referred to as adat in the Indonesian language.

indicator of CRP's success, however, is that, despite predictions of revenge attacks on perpetrators for their role in the violence of 1999, Timor-Leste has enjoyed a high level of peace and stability during the difficult initial years of nation building.

Background

The situation in 1999

7. The intense violence and destruction that followed the Popular Consultation of 30 August 1999 resulted in the internal displacement of over 300,000 people, while a further 250,000 to 300,000 either voluntarily fled or were forcibly taken to West Timor.[4]

8. Approximately 180,0005 of the refugees to West Timor had returned to Timor-Leste by October 1999. Among those who remained in Indonesia were many of the militia commanders, East Timorese members of the Indonesian military (Tentara Nasional Indonesia, TNI), officials of the civilian administration and pro-autonomy politicians thought to have been responsible for the serious human rights violations that occurred in 1999. The International Force for East Timor (Interfet) and then UNTAET announced that if those suspected of having committed serious crimes returned to Timor-Leste, they would be arrested and prosecuted.

9. The refugees also included people who had played only a relatively minor role in the violence and destruction. Thousands of East Timorese had joined militia groups, including many who had been forced into doing so. Many had participated in house-burning, beatings, intimidation and looting. A large proportion of the refugees were people who had played no role in the violence, but were family members of others who had, or had supported the political goal of integration but not the associated campaign of violence.

10. As the numbers of returnees grew, it became apparent that a significant number of those who had been involved in "less serious crimes", or who had simply supported integration, were afraid to return to their communities. The violence surrounding the ballot had been carried out with the powerful protection of the TNI. Its victims had been unable to resist or fight back. It was widely predicted that, given the opportunity, those victims would take revenge on the people who had attacked them and their families, or even those who had been pro-integration.

11. Although the events surrounding the ballot were freshest in the minds of all East Timorese at the end of 1999, that violence was in fact inseparable from the entire history of the political conflicts going back to 1974. Many were still divided over their political affiliations during the internal conflict of 1975. Many who had supported independence during the Indonesian occupation nursed anger and resentment towards those who had collaborated with the Indonesian security forces; independence supporters, their friends and family members had suffered violations as a result of such collaboration. The Indonesian withdrawal after the ballot seemed to open up the possibility that these long-standing grievances would flare into violence.

12. This climate of uncertainty and apprehension most immediately affected the range of people who had been "on the wrong side" in 1999: those still in the camps in West Timor who had played relatively minor roles in the conflict; those who had returned to Timor-Leste but had taken shelter in the relative anonymity of major towns; and the increasing number who had returned to their villages but were living on the fringes of community life, kept at arm's length by their fellow villagers.

13. At the same time institutional developments were both shaping thinking on, and narrowing the options for, both justice and reconciliation. UNTAET had established the Special Panels of the Dili District Court, the office of the Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes and the Serious Crimes Investigation Unit. These institutions, collectively known as the "serious crimes process", were mandated to investigate and prosecute perpetrators of serious crimes that had been committed during the conflict. They received significant budgetary support from the UN and were largely staffed by UN international personnel.

14. The Special Panels had jurisdiction over the serious criminal offences of crimes against humanity, genocide, war crimes, torture, murder and sexual offences.[6] Legislation provided that the Special Panels would have exclusive jurisdiction only over cases of murder and sexual offences that occurred between 1 January 1999 and 25 October 1999. Crimes against humanity, war crimes, genocide and torture are internationally recognised as crimes of universal jurisdiction, which meant that technically the Special Panels could deal with these crimes regardless of when or where they had been committed. However, due to its overwhelming workload, the Serious Crimes Unit made an internal policy decision to limit prosecutions for all of the six offences within its jurisdiction to those crimes committed during 1999. These decisions were taken because of the massive caseload arising from 1999, but they meant that serious crimes committed prior to 1999 would not be prosecuted.

15. The Ordinary Crimes Panels of the Dili District Court had jurisdiction to deal not just with new offences, but also with the potentially enormous number of "less serious crimes" committed during the political conflicts. East Timorese judges, prosecutors and defence counsel, most of whom had had little or no practical legal experience before their appointment, had responsibility for the Ordinary Crimes process.

16. Despite the best efforts of these legal professionals and those involved in the administration of the courts, it quickly became apparent that the nascent formal legal system was straining to keep up just with new crimes and those offences that came within the mandate of the serious crimes process. There was little or no possibility that the backlog of "less-serious crimes" could be investigated or prosecuted. Total impunity for these past offences would seriously hamper efforts to promote respect for the rule of law in the emerging nation. It might also encourage vigilante justice and revenge attacks, which could easily ignite the brittle emotions of the population, sparking renewed community violence.

17. In this context policy makers began seeking a solution that would require less resources and would not place further strain on the struggling formal justice sector. It also needed to be able to address a large number of cases in a relatively short period of time, assist in the reintegration of offenders into their former communities and help to maintain the fragile peace of the territory.

18. In the absence of any formal mechanisms operating at the village level, some communities had sought to resolve outstanding disputes through traditional processes adjudicated by local spiritual leaders. The Community Reconciliation Process was an attempt to draw on the high regard in which these customary practices were held, and fuse them with the legal principles on which the emerging state of Timor-Leste was founded. The resulting mechanism combined direct participation by local leaders, perpetrators, victims and community members with formal requirements involving the OGP and the courts. It was hoped that this combination would not only assist in safely reintegrating perpetrators into their communities, but also reduce the pressure on the formal justice system, contribute to the fight against impunity, and help to settle residual anger caused by the political conflict.

Traditional justice in East Timorese society

19. When the designers of the CRP decided that it should incorporate customary law, they were able to draw on a rich cultural tradition. Customary systems of law, dealing with both criminal and civil disputes, were part of the tradition of lisan. This tradition was well-established in Timor-Leste long before the arrival of the Portuguese in the 16th century. Both the Portuguese and Indonesian administrations recognised only the legitimacy of the formal justice systems they had created. However, the mechanisms of the formal sector were not highly developed under either regime, and were concentrated mainly in Dili and other towns. Traditional methods continued to provide the only effective means of resolving disputes for most of the population, particularly those living in remote rural areas. Reliance on lisan procedures became even more important during the Indonesian occupation because the formal system of justice was perceived as an instrument of selective oppression rather than a means of protection of the rights of the people.

20. Traditional beliefs continue to play an important role in the life of most East Timorese. Communities rely on traditional conflict resolution practices that allow an aggrieved person to seek resolution of a dispute through the intervention of elders known as lia nain[*]. These practices bring together the parties, their families and often other members of the community to participate in a ceremony to resolve a dispute. The ceremony usually takes place with the parties seated on a mat (biti in Tetum), hence the term nahe biti boot (lit: "spreading the large mat") to describe the traditional procedure for resolving disputes. The opening of the mat marks the opening of the process of seeking a resolution. Normally, the mat should not be rolled up again until a resolution has been reached.

21. Participants believe that their ancestors, who are summoned at the beginning of the ceremony, are witnesses to the nahe biti boot ritual and validate the proceedings.

* The lia nain (literally: keeper of the word) are considered men of law, involving an important spiritual and customary role.

Their presence makes the process binding, and any failure to accept the outcome is believed to have serious consequences.

22. Within this system the lia nain play an important role as both facilitators and adjudicators. A variety of factors influence how a case is handled; including how serious the conflict is thought to be, and whether the dispute is between different families or within the same family. These factors also determine the number, position and social standing of the leaders who should be engaged in the resolution process.

23. The form of lisan procedures varies significantly between different regions of Timor-Leste. However, despite these variations the basic procedure of nahe biti boot is a cultural constant across Timor-Leste.

Nahe biti boot

A typical nahe biti boot ceremony takes the following form:

The lia nain, dressed in multicoloured woven tais (traditional weaving),* wearing anklets made from horse hair, and adorned with ceremonial items such as kaibauk (silver horns) and the chest-ornaments known as belak, open the ceremony by performing a dance while chanting and reciting incantations which invite answering calls from the audience. The solemn act of unrolling the mat then takes place. This marks the opening of proceedings and indicates that both sides to the dispute have agreed to sit together to try to resolve their differences. The mat should not be rolled up again until the dispute has been settled. The process usually begins in the morning and depending on the seriousness and complexity of the dispute, can continue until late into the following night.

After the mat has been unrolled, a woven straw basket (mama fatin)† containing betel nut, lime, betel leaves, tobacco, palm wine (tua) and other items are laid out. The parties to the dispute and the lia nain will chew the betel nut, leaves and lime, and drink tua after the dispute is successfully settled as a gesture of friendship and a sign that the conflict is over, and to publicly demonstrate that both sides are now reconnected in a peaceful relationship with each other.

"Lulik *is all that is sacred…*lisan wisdoms and practices…not only sacred objects. The lia *nain carry sacred objects such as a stick (rotu) or a traditional dagger representing the presence of* lisan so the parties

* Tais are traditionally hand woven textiles with symbols and patterns unique to the clan of the weaver.

in the dispute have to submit to lisan law." – Father Jovito de Jesus Araújo, Deputy Chair of the CAVR.[7]

Once these rituals are complete, the parties to the dispute are given the opportunity to present their cases to the group. Generally, they are invited to give their versions of the events surrounding the dispute. The adjudicators or other participants may then question them. At a certain point, the lia nain or the assembled members of the community call a halt to this phase of the process and announce that the time has come to move on to the next part of the proceedings, the determination of penalties.

If the complainant has convinced the lia nain of the justice of his case, the penalties are usually punishment of the perpetrator or compensation of the victim, or a combination of both. Although such outcomes may have a retributive dimension, they are reached through an adjudication process that involves discussion and debate with all parties involved. This differs significantly from the formal justice system, where punishment is imposed by the state after considering evidence provided by advocates representing the prosecution and defence.

Punishment meted out under lisan traditionally takes one of two forms, social or physical.[8] Social punishments include being ostracised by exclusion from communal activities, or having one's social status lowered. In the past physical punishments could range from incarceration to capital punishment. However, such punishments could be avoided by the payment of an amount of compensation acceptable to the victim or the victim's family. Where a perpetrator will not or cannot pay the agreed compensation, the perpetrator's family may take responsibility for the "sentence" or "fine".

A defining characteristic of the lisan system is that it involves the wider community in the discussion about the dispute and how it is to be resolved. If an individual has been wronged, other members of that person's kin group share in the injustice. Consequently, lisan ceremonies focus on individuals, but they also engage the interests of wider family groups. In reaching agreements or deciding on sanctions, consideration is often given to relationships between families and between communities. This inclusive approach to justice, based on the individual's sense of the self as part of a greater whole that extends beyond the family group, has been shown to strongly motivate people to reconcile.[9]

Because of its wider communal context, public demonstrations of reconciliation through rituals and ceremonies are a crucial part of re-establishing or maintaining social stability. While practices and rituals vary across the country, certain principles remain constant. Firstly, as with most aspects of lisan practice, the ancestral spirits are called upon to witness and validate the process. Secondly, the perpetrator (and sometimes the family of the victim) contributes materials for the performance of the lisan ceremonies. These typically include betel nut and palm wine to be shared in a closing ritual – symbolising reunification. Often a sacrificial animal is brought to the meeting. It may play a variety of roles, but commonly its entrails are read to determine whether the process has been completed to the satisfaction of the ancestors. Thirdly, it is customary for a communal meal to follow the ceremony. This ritual helps to generate a binding agreement, allowing closure of the dispute that, in turn, restores social balance and unity.

Origins of the Community Reconciliation Process/CRP

24. In May 2000 the UNTAET Human Rights Unit facilitated a workshop, led by two international experts, on the theme of a possible truth and reconciliation commission for Timor-Leste. Included in the report from this workshop was a recommendation that a more practical, community-based solution be devised for dealing with the large number of perpetrators of less serious crimes, particularly those committed during the period surrounding the Popular Consultation in 1999.[10]

25. In August 2000 the CNRT, which included representatives of East Timorese political parties and other groups that had supported a referendum, held a national congress and unanimously passed a resolution calling for the establishment of a truth and reconciliation commission. The proposal was passed to the National Council, the East Timorese consultative legislative council set up by UNTAET, and a request for assistance was forwarded to UNTAET. The Transitional Administrator, Sergio Vieira de Mello, asked the UNTAET Human Rights Section to take the lead in assisting East Timorese counterparts to conduct background research and take steps towards the establishment of a 'truth and reconciliation commission'. A Steering Committee was formed which included representatives of the CNRT, human rights NGOs, women's groups, youth organisations, the Catholic Church, the Association of Ex-Political Prisoners (Assepol), Falintil, UNTAET (through its legal and human rights sections) and UNHCR.

26. The concept of the community reconciliation procedure was developed during the consultation process conducted by the Steering Committee between September 2000 and January 2001. The consultations were extensive, covering all districts and including meetings at aldeia, village, sub-district and district level. Consultations were also held with the country's main political and human rights groups. During the community meetings participants were asked for their opinions on dealing with "less serious crimes" through community-based hearings rather than through the courts.

Results of district consultations

Community views on reconciliation

Some common community views on a possible reconciliation process included:

- It should be a community-based process, during which perpetrators would be required to tell their victims and those who knew them well the truth about the violations they had committed.
- Any reconciliation process should take place at the village level. Participants expressed dissatisfaction that the reconciliation initiatives up to that point had focused on leaders. Although, it was accepted that leaders had also to reconcile, it was felt that there should also be a formal mechanism to try to resolve grass-roots level differences, whose origins lay in the conflicts of the past.
- It was not realistic to imagine that national leaders could simply command the population to reconcile. A forum was needed where those who had harmed their communities could explain their actions and apologise for them.
- It would be important that aside from victims and communities, liurai[*] (chief of a village), spiritual leaders and other figures who enjoyed the respect of the community should be involved in any reconciliation procedure.
- Any mechanism adopted should incorporate traditional lisan dispute resolution procedures, however, lisan alone would not be sufficient. An approach was needed which would link traditional mechanisms to the formal justice system.
- The fact that the vast majority of East Timorese belonged to the Catholic Church should be recognised and integrated into the design of the process, particularly their acceptance of the Catholic doctrine of confession and absolution.

* Traditional social structure is based throughout Timor-Leste on "kings" known as liurai. Prior to the arrival of the Portuguese, Timor-Leste consisted of numerous small kingdoms under the hereditary control of a liurai. The liurai system and other customary institutions, retain strong influence in Timor-Leste, particularly in rural areas. However, we also know that this traditional system has been disrupted and factionalised by colonisation and war. For example, after the Dom Boaventura rebellion of 1911-1912, the most significant liurai-led revolt against Portuguese rule during the colonial period, the Portuguese administration required that all liurai obtain approval before taking up office.

- Anger towards those who had co-operated with the Indonesian occupation forces, particularly those who joined militia groups, remained strong in many communities. Something needed to be done to try to lessen this anger.
- Many perpetrators of "less serious crimes" had not returned to their home communities, but had settled in Dili or other places where they were not known. These persons should return to their home villages, and explain their actions to their communities.
- Pro-autonomy supporters said that there was a need to educate the population so that they understood that supporting the political goal of autonomy was not a crime, and accepted that individuals should not be punished for having taken that political position.
- If a formal programme was to go ahead, it should be backed up by a comprehensive information campaign, down to the village level.

Some common concerns raised about the proposed commission included:

- There is a risk that hearings could open old wounds, especially if the Commission's investigations went beyond recent violations back to 1974. For similar reasons some thought that the Commission's activities should be confined to reconciliation and should not include truth-seeking at all.
- The proposed Commission could not, logistically, deal with a large number of hearings in remote villages, given the difficult terrain and the shortcomings of the transport and communication systems.

27. Following the district consultations, the Steering Committee prepared a draft bill. After several months of discussion, the National Council approved Regulation 10/2001 on 13 June 2001. The Transitional Administrator promulgated the Regulation on 13 July 2001.

The Community Reconciliation Process

Summary of the CRP Procedure

Under the mechanism provided for in Regulation 10/2001 perpetrators of "harmful acts", whether criminal or otherwise, could voluntarily provide to the Commission a statement. The statement included a full description of the acts they had committed, an admission of responsibility and other relevant facts. The statement would then be forwarded to the Office of the General Prosecutor, to decide whether the General Prosecutor's jurisdiction to prosecute would be exercised or, alternatively, whether it was a case that could suitably be handled through CRP. If approved for CRP, the case would then be returned to the Commission, which had to organise a hearing in the perpetrator's community.

Hearings were presided over by a panel of three up to five local leaders, including a Regional Commissioner of the CAVR who would act as chair. At the hearing the perpetrator was required to make a formal public admission, and could be asked questions by victims and community members. Traditional lisan procedures and the participation of spiritual leaders were incorporated into the process in accordance with local custom. After hearing from all parties the panel would decide what appropriate "acts of reconciliation" the perpetrator should perform in order to be accepted back into the community. These acts might include community service, an apology or the payment of reparations. If the perpetrator accepted the panel's decision, an agreement would be drafted in simple terms. It would then be forwarded to the appropriate District Court, where it would be formalised as an Order of the Court. On completion of all required "acts of reconciliation" the perpetrator was automatically entitled to civil and criminal immunity for all actions covered in the agreement.

Objectives of the process

28. Part IV of Regulation 10/2001, entitled Community Reconciliation Procedures, sets out the steps to be followed in implementing a Community Reconciliation Process (CRP). The broad objective of the CRP, as set out in the Regulation, was:

> [T]o assist the reception and reintegration of persons into their communities…in relation to criminal or non-criminal acts committed > within the context of the political conflicts in Timor-Leste between 25 April 1974 and 25 October 1999.[11]

29. The procedures set out in the Regulation incorporated principles drawn from criminal law, civil law and traditional mechanisms for dispute resolution.

The procedural framework

30. The procedural framework of CRP involved the following six steps:

Initiation of the process

31. Any person, who had committed a "criminal or non-criminal act…within the context of the political conflicts in East Timor", which had caused that person to be estranged from his or her community, could approach the Commission to submit a statement.

32. This statement had to include:

- A full description of the relevant acts
- An admission of responsibility
- Identification of the relationship between the acts committed and the political conflict
- Identification of others involved in those acts, both as additional perpetrators and victims
- A renunciation of the use of violence to achieve political ends
- A formal request to participate in a CRP in a specified community.

33. Before accepting the statement, the Commission informed the deponent that the statement would be sent to the OGP, who retained exclusive jurisdiction over all serious crimes, and that the OGP might use the statement in future legal proceedings.[12] The CRP Division staff then forwarded the completed statement to the national office of the Commission.

Determining whether a case was appropriate for CRP

34. The CRP was not intended to impinge on the jurisdiction of the Serious Crimes Unit or the Special Panels. Rather, it was a mechanism designed to deal with "less serious crimes" and to run in tandem with the serious crimes process. This was in accordance with the principle that there could be no reconciliation without justice for those who had committed serious offences. At the same time the procedure recognised the inability of the formal justice system to deal with "less serious" violations and the need to provide an achievable solution while promoting reconciliation. This approach was confirmed by Schedule 1 of the Regulation:

> In principle serious criminal offences, in particular murder, torture and sexual offences, shall not be dealt with in a Community Reconciliation Procedure.[13]

35. Under the Regulation, the OGP made the decision on whether a case could appropriately be dealt with in a CRP, after preliminary review by an internal Commission statements committee. The statements committee checked whether the case came within the Commission's mandate and made a preliminary assessment of its appropriateness for a CRP. This assessment, together with a copy of the statement, was then forwarded to the OGP. The OGP considered the acts admitted to in the statement, and checked the name of the deponent and the events described in his statement against information in its own files. It then decided whether or not to exercise its exclusive jurisdiction to investigate the case with a view to possible prosecution. If the statements committee approved the statement and the OGP decided not to exercise jurisdiction, the CRP could proceed.

36. Schedule 1 to the Regulation set out guidelines, rather than strict rules, for the OGP to make this determination.[14] The criteria to be considered included the nature of the crime committed by the deponent, the number of acts committed and the deponent's role (whether he had organised, planned, instigated or ordered the crime, or was following the orders of others). Examples of acts appropriately dealt with by CRP were "theft, minor assault, arson, the killing of livestock or the destruction of crops". A CRP could also deal with non-criminal actions that were considered to have caused harm to communities, such as collaboration or secretly providing information, which led to violations being committed. CRP was not designed to deal with criminal offences not related to the political conflicts in Timor-Leste.

37. By leaving the decision concerning appropriateness to the OGP, the Regulation recognised that the requirements of justice were paramount and should never be subordinated to the need for reconciliation. This kind of decision was more appropriately made by legal professionals with knowledge of the cases currently being investigated, rather than Commission staff. Decisions as to whether there is sufficient evidence to prosecute someone for a particular crime require consideration of whether the evidence supports the necessary legal elements of the crime. Such decisions involve complicated legal concepts like "common purpose", "conspiracy" and "accessory before or after the fact". In addition the only evidence available to the Commission was the relatively superficial voluntary statement given by the deponent.

38. The inclusion of guidelines, rather than an exhaustive list of offences recognised that, although compiling such a list might seem desirable, it would actually constrain the OGP from using its discretion and making the determination on a case-by-case basis.

39. The OGP had 14 days to make its determination, although it could request an extension of a further 14 days.[15] The Regulation allowed the Commission to proceed with organising a CRP if the OGP did not notify it of its intention to exercise its jurisdiction over the case within two weeks of receiving the statement.

40. In notifying the Commission of its determination, the OGP used one of two standard form letters. One letter was used if the OGP intended to withhold the case, thereby exercising its exclusive jurisdiction over "serious criminal offences". It included the following language:

> The following persons are currently under investigation by the Serious Crimes Unit…The Office of the General Prosecutor exercises its exclusive jurisdiction.[16]

41. The other letter advised that the case could be appropriately dealt with by CRP, as follows:

> Based on the statements provided it appears that the following persons may have been involved in serious crimes as part of a widespread or systematic attack. However, because of the total number of cases currently under investigation, the Serious Crimes Unit will not be investigating these persons in the foreseeable future; accordingly, the Commission may proceed with the reconciliation process.[17]

42. As the content of these letters show, the OGP was not determining through this process whether a case involved a serious crime or not, but only whether, taking all the circumstances presented to it into account, it would exercise jurisdiction to prosecute the matter.

Preparation and completion of a hearing

43. If the Commission received authorisation to proceed with a case through a CRP, it delegated the organisation of a community hearing to a Regional Commissioner with responsibility for the community where the hearing was to take place.[18] The Commissioner was responsible for forming a CRP Panel to preside over the hearing. The panel was constituted by between three and five community representatives, with the Regional Commissioner acting as chairperson. Panel members were selected through consultations between the Commission (represented by the Regional Commissioner) and the community. No guidelines were set out in the Regulation as to how this should be done or what criteria should be used for selection, except for the requirement "to have appropriate gender representation within the panel".[19]

44. The Regulation gave the panels considerable flexibility in determining their own procedures during the hearing, but required that they must hear from the deponent, victims and other community members who could provide relevant information.[20] The panel could question the deponent about the involvement of others in the disclosed acts, including "the identity of those who organised, planned, instigated, ordered or participated in the commission of such acts".[21] The panel could also determine the scope and depth of specific lines of questioning, and probe areas that it felt the deponent had not addressed adequately. Provision was made for holding closed hearings, if it was felt that the disclosure of certain information could endanger the deponent or other members of the community, as well as for information to be submitted to the panel in written form.[22]

Discontinuation of a CRP hearing

45. Once a CRP hearing had begun, there were two possible reasons for adjourning it. Firstly, if the deponent refused to answer a question without justification (as determined by the panel), the hearing could be halted and referred back to the OGP.[23] Secondly, if credible evidence were given at the hearing of the deponent's involvement in a "serious crime", the hearing would be stopped. This evidence should then have been recorded and referred to the OGP along with notice of the adjournment.[24] The OGP was required to respond promptly with a determination on the credibility of the evidence.

46. If the OGP agreed that the referral was justified, the hearing had to be adjourned and official notification provided to the deponent and the OGP.[25] If the OGP did not think there was sufficient evidence to demonstrate involvement in a serious crime, or if the OGP failed to notify the Commission of its decision, the Commission had the authority to resume the hearing if it considered it appropriate to do so.

The Community Reconciliation Agreement

47. After hearing testimony and questions, the CRP Panel was responsible for determining an act of reconciliation "most appropriate" for the deponent to undertake. The options were community service, reparation, a public apology or "other act of contrition".[26] The panel did not have the power to compel the deponent to comply with its decisions, but could only recommend that a particular act of reconciliation be undertaken. If the deponent agreed with the recommended action, the CRP Panel then drafted an official record of the agreement called a Community Reconciliation Agreement (CRA). In the event that the deponent subsequently refused to undertake the act of reconciliation, the Commission was required to refer the matter back to the OGP.

48. In cases where CRAs were successfully brokered, the Commission submitted a copy of the agreement to the District Court that had jurisdiction over the community where the hearing was held. The court then had to register the CRA as an Order of the Court, unless it considered that the act of reconciliation was not proportional to the offences admitted to, or that it would violate human rights principles. On completion of all the required acts of reconciliation listed in the agreement, the deponent received notification of his or her legal immunity from criminal and civil liability for all of the harmful acts admitted and incorporated into the CRA.[27]

49. The Regulation imposed no legal obligation on deponents to participate in CRP hearings, or to enter into Community Reconciliation Agreements. However, once an agreement had been signed, the deponent had a legal duty to fulfil the obligations set out in it. Failure to fulfil these obligations constituted a criminal offence for which the penalty was a maximum term of imprisonment of one year, a fine of up to US$3,000, or both.[28]

CRP's reliance on both lisan and law

50. During the planning stages of the Commission, some people expressed the view that lisan alone was sufficient to deal with "less serious crimes", and that a more formal process was not needed. However, the Commission's experience of the CRP has led it to conclude that the mixed procedure it adopted gave its work a dimension which lisan or the formal justice sector alone would not have provided.

51. The CRP owed its success to a combination of factors: the status of the Commission as a recognised national institution, the use of uniform procedures, and its basis in law, and its inclusion not only of the lia nain but also of a broader range of stakeholders that included representatives of the Catholic Church, local government and civil society. The CRP was also able to deal with a large number of cases within a relatively short period of time, in every sub-district throughout the territory, something that neither the formal justice system nor lisan-based dispute resolution mechanisms could have been relied on to achieve.

52. Lisan procedures evolved to address isolated cases at the community level. They were not designed to deal with violations and "harmful acts" on the massive scale that occurred during the political conflicts, particularly during 1999. CRP was designed to address this abnormal situation, rather than to handle the routine disputes customarily dealt with by lisan. In fact a number of community leaders expressed views that the CRP had reinvigorated lisan. The respect which communities accorded to the CRP extended to the community and lisan leaders who played such an important ceremonial and mediating role in the hearings, thereby undoing some of the damage that manipulation of traditional procedures by members of the Indonesian security forces had wrought during the occupation.

53. CRP was able to offer a legal solution for "less serious crimes" which were outside the ambit of lisan. The role of the OGP and the registration of each successful Community Reconciliation Agreement as an Order of the Court added a degree of formality that participants appreciated and respected. In addition, the immunity from civil or criminal prosecution, which followed successful completion of the agreed "acts of reconciliation", provided a legal finality that was outside the scope of lisan.

Implementation of the CRP programme

Staff

54. Responsibility for the CRP programme was divided between the national office and field staff working at the district level. At its peak, the CRP division consisted of 47 staff. At the district level, the co-ordinators in each district co-ordinated the CRP programme. They ensured that reconciliation-related activities were synchronised with other district team responsibilities. District staff worked closely with local communities to raise awareness of the CRP programme and to encourage prospective deponents to give statements. CRP staff spent much of their time with potential deponents, explaining the process, exploring the possible benefits and drawbacks of participation, and helping them write their statements.

Timeline

55. According to the overall strategic plan of the Commission, district teams were to spend three months working in each of the sub-districts in their respective districts. Each team included staff working on the CRP programme as well as those engaged in truth-seeking, victim support and other activities. These teams operated between July 2002 and March 2004 (see Vol. I, Part 1: Introduction, for more information on the Commission's Strategic Plan).

56. The CRP programme aimed to complete its activities in each sub-district according to the following timeline.

Table 1: Timeline for CRP activities in the three-month operational period in each sub-district

Public education/ socialising	Initial statement taking	Processing and approval of statements at National Office & OGP*	Arrangements for CRP Hearing	Holding hearings
Month 1		Month 2	Month 3

Initial challenges

57. The CRP was an untried and unfamiliar concept, both in Timor-Leste and internationally and, not surprisingly, there were teething problems. It was clear by November 2002, the end of the first three-month phase of the programme, that most communities were not yet confident or interested enough in CRP to take part in it. In particular, potential deponents were not coming forward and giving statements: in the 13 sub-districts covered by CRP teams in that phase only 143 statements had been taken and only six CRP hearings, involving 50 deponents, had been held.

58. Staff members reported that the slow beginning of the programme was due to the fact that community members did not yet understand what the CRP was and how it worked. Verbal explanations helped, but it was difficult to build sufficient support for a concept that people had not experienced. There was also some confusion about the difference between statements given for truth-seeking purposes and statements

* OPG by law had a 14-day period to review statements, and the right to request an additional 14-days if required. This request, with time, became standard practice. Hence the time taken for processing (including transporting statements to and from the district and the Commission's own review process) frequently exceeded the month shown here.

that would be used as the basis for CRP. In addition, the relationship between the Commission and the formal justice system was, for many people, unclear. Many said that the only information they had received on issues related to justice for the massive violations that had been committed came from the Commission's education campaigns.

59. In order to overcome these problems, the CRP teams began to ask local leaders to encourage individuals in their communities to participate. A film of a CRP hearing was produced and shown to village audiences. However, the greatest spur to involvement in CRP, came from the experience of an actual hearing. News of a successful hearing travelled fast and far. Early fears that communities would not participate began to dissipate as news of the steadily growing number of hearings that had been completed persuaded more and more communities that they too should hold hearings.

60. Because the Commission had to cover the entire country within its operational timeframe, it could not extend the time spent in each sub-district beyond the three months. However, a CRP could be held only after a number of preliminary steps had been completed – the public information meeting, the collection of deponents' statements and the OGP approval process. These steps ate up much of the allocated three months. Consequently, in any particular sub-district, hearings were usually held at the end of the three-month period. Successful hearings then stimulated requests for others, but sadly, not all of these could be organised because it was time to move on to a new sub-district.

Community involvement

61. Educating communities about the CRP was essential if potential deponents, local leaders and the broader community were going to involve themselves in the process to the extent that they felt that they owned it. One aspect of this was that they not only hold the hearing, but that they contribute to its design. The Regulation set out the basic elements of the CRP, but it left much leeway for local communities to determine its precise character in accordance with local custom.

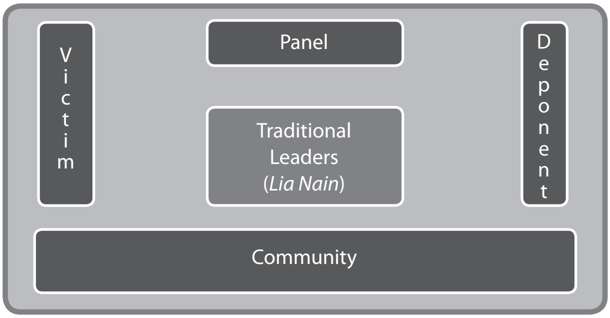
62. Local communities were also able to give the district team information about the area and helped the teams identify which villages and individual cases would be most appropriately dealt with through the CRP, bearing in mind such factors as the impact the conflict had had on particular villages and whether perpetrators had already returned from West Timor. This was essential knowledge for the teams to be able to work effectively.

63. The consultations before a CRP included meetings at the district, sub-district, village and aldeia level. The district meetings gave a general introduction to the role and legal basis of the Commission, and presented the timetable it intended to follow in the district. At the sub-district level meetings, government officials, community leaders and representatives of civil society would attend. Participants with local knowledge were also invited to raise other issues that might complicate or facilitate the CRP.

64. Further consultations were then held in the villages and sub-villages selected as locations for CRP hearings. Those attending this meeting discussed and agreed on the hearing's format, including what role local custom and traditional leaders would play. The membership of the panel for each hearing was chosen. Panel members were selected for their ability to act in a just and impartial manner, their influence and credibility in the community, and their demonstrated commitment to reconciliation.

65. The district team also arranged a series of preparatory meetings to brief participants on their roles in the forthcoming hearing. Deponents, panel members and victims named in deponents' statements were each invited to attend separate briefings. The sessions involving panel members included training in mediation and arbitration skills, and role-plays of situations that might arise during the hearing. Typically these briefings took place a few days before the CRP hearing, so that the information provided would be relatively fresh in participants' minds.

The CRP hearing



Principles for CRP hearings

- The primary aim of the CRP is to assist reconciliation between perpetrators, victims and their community.
- The CRP procedure relies on the voluntary participation of all parties.
- The methodology is facilitation of an agreement with the perpetrator, with the participation of the victims and their families, community leaders and the wider community.
- The victim and other interested parties must have an opportunity to be heard.
- The hearing should provide an opportunity for all parties to witness the perpetrator's confession.
- Hearings must be non-violent, and, in preparing for the hearing, steps must be taken to avoid the possibility of physical conflict.
- Hearings should be alcohol-free, so as to prevent emotions running out of control.
- The process should recognise the healing potential of understanding the political context that predisposed people to commit crimes.

Hearing layout

66. District teams were encouraged to conform to local community practice in setting up the CRP hearing, but typically the seating arrangement would follow the pattern shown below:

Typical seating arrangement in a CRP hearing

67. The seating arrangement for CRP was similar to the one commonly used in traditional community dispute-resolution ceremonies, where the lisan leaders were present throughout the hearing and were seated in a special place between the parties to the dispute. Often they would be seated on the ground on the mat that symbolised the lisan process. Commissioners and panel members took their places at the front, facing the community. Victims took their place to the right of the panel, perpetrators to the left. Persons, such as family members or Commission Victim Support staff, could sit with victims to offer support.

Procedure

Formal opening of the hearing

68. Often CRP hearings began with lisan rituals, which varied according to local custom. These were followed by a short speech from the Regional Commissioner or another representative of the Commission welcoming guests and participants.

Speeches

69. An opportunity was given to local leaders, such as the village head, the district administrator, sub-district co-ordinator or other government representatives, priests, nuns or other religious figures, and any National Commissioners who were present, to say a few words. These speeches generally focused on the meaning of reconciliation and its importance to the community.

Collective prayer

70. Religion plays an important role in most communities in Timor-Leste. Consequently, the recitation of a collective prayer was customary and helped to create a spirit of concord at the beginning of the hearing.

Opening of the hearing/introduction from the Chair of the panel

71. The panel chairperson formally opened the hearing and introduced the other panel members. The panel then welcomed all guests present, and thanked them for their support and co-operation. It also extended its gratitude to the deponents, victims, victims' families and other members of the community present at the hearing.

72. The chair explained:

- The Commission's background – its origins, establishment, mandate and objectives
- The functions and objectives of the Community Reconciliation Process
- The legal context of the hearing, including a reading of the decision by General Prosecutor of Timor-Leste permitting the hearing to proceed
- The CRP statement-taking process.

73. The deponents' case summaries were then read out publicly.

Deponents' testimonies

74. Each deponent then gave an oral account of the acts for which he or she was seeking reconciliation. Deponents were asked to give as full an account as possible, and many used the opportunity to explain and put into context what had happened. Other participants were not allowed to interrupt deponents who were giving their testimony.

Questions of clarification from the panel

75. Questions from the panel normally followed each deponent's testimony, although sometimes the panel waited until all deponents had finished testifying. The type of questions varied, from clarifying any inconsistency between the oral and written testimonies, to seeking insight into the deponent's motivation for committing the act, or identifying others involved in the acts, including the chain of command.

Questions of clarification from named victims

76. Victims were given an opportunity to make a statement about the incident and to question the deponent about what had happened. For many, this was the first time that they had had an opportunity to tell their story before the community, or confront the perpetrator about the harm they had suffered.

Questions of clarification from community members

77. The members present then had time to ask the deponents about their actions, as well as to tell the Commission about other harmful acts the deponents had committed but not disclosed in their testimonies. This was also an opportunity for other community members who had been directly victimised by a deponent, but whom that deponent had not named as victims, to make themselves known to the panel. Commission staff recorded the personal details of these community members as part of the hearing record.

78. Both victims and community members were asked to limit their questions to the acts described in the deponents' testimonies or other acts of the deponent which had not been disclosed. If a person accused a deponent of involvement in a serious crime, they would be asked to provide further information in support of the allegation. If the panel judged that the evidence indicating that the deponent might have committed a serious crime was credible, the hearing was suspended, as required by the Regulation.

Panel-moderated discussion of the acts of reconciliation

79. Following the questions, the panel called together the deponents and victims to explain the principles of a Community Reconciliation Agreement (CRA), and the requirement that it should include the "acts of reconciliation" that the deponent had to carry out. In some cases these discussions also involved lisan leaders. Sometimes the panel conducted these discussions in the presence of all the interested parties together. Sometimes they spoke with each group of participants separately.

80. The panel explained that the "acts of reconciliation" were intended to demonstrate to all present the sincerity of the deponent's commitment to reconciliation with his or her victims and the community at large. They were not intended to burden deponents with obligations that were beyond their means. The hearing guidelines recommended that "acts of reconciliation" take the form of an apology, a symbolic fine, an act of community service or a combination of these acts. It is evident from the hearing monitoring reports that panels followed these recommendations.

Declaration of the acts of reconciliation

81. If the deponent agreed to undertake the recommended "acts of reconciliation", the chair of the Panel announced publicly the obligations which that deponent had agreed to fulfil.

Apologies/oaths from the deponents

82. Each deponent was then obliged to apologise publicly for his or her acts, and would promise on oath not to repeat such actions. At many hearings lisan rituals accompanied the oaths to bind the deponents to their commitments.

Signing of the Community Reconciliation Agreement

83. The panel chairperson explained to those gathered that each deponent must sign a CRA. This document included:

- A description of the acts perpetrated by the deponent
- Any new information about violations that the deponent had neglected to include in their original statement
- A description of the acts of reconciliation determined in the hearing
- A statement that the deponent acknowledged responsibility for the acts described in the CRA, and renounced all forms of violence in pursuit of political ends.

84. Typically, the CRA was read out to those assembled. The deponent and all panel members then signed the CRA. The chairperson explained that the CRA documentation, including the deponent's original statement, would be submitted to the relevant District Court, where it would be reviewed. After all the acts of reconciliation had been completed, the CRA would be registered as an Order of the Court. This, it was explained, would bring legal finality to the matter.

Closing of the CRP hearing

85. Usually, CRP hearings concluded with closing words from either a local leader or a CAVR Regional Commissioner or staff member. The day's events were then summarised and a moral teaching presented on the theme of togetherness, the objective of the day.

Caicasa Community Reconciliation Process hearing

This CRP hearing was convened on 30 January 2004 in the Village of Caicasa, Maubara Sub-District, Liquiçá District. The hearing involved 20 deponents, all men, who were former members of the Red and White Iron (Besi Merah Putih, BMP) militia group. Caicasa, a sprawling community in the hills to the south west of Liquiçá town, was the birthplace of the BMP, one of Timor's most notorious militia groups.

Because of the large number of deponents and the nature of the acts committed, four hearings had been planned for Caicasa. The first had been successfully completed the previous week. This was the second hearing.

Once the deponents, panel members and victims were all present, the formalities began. The Commission's district co-ordinator for Liquiçá explained how the day's proceedings would unfold. The village chief then made a statement in which he asked those assembled to remain calm and listen quietly to what people had to say. He pointed out that there would be an opportunity later to ask questions and seek clarification.

The Regional Commissioner chairing the CRP panel then set out the procedures in more detail, providing a thorough explanation of the importance of the process in both local and national contexts. The Commissioner encouraged the community to speak out if they felt that the deponents had not made full disclosures, but stressed that they must allow the deponents to explain themselves first. The Commissioner said that deponents and other participants should speak in the language with which they were most comfortable. For the majority, this was the local vernacular, Tokodede, although many also understood Tetum and Indonesian.

The Regional Commissioner then read out the official letters from the Office of the General Prosecutor, written in Indonesian, which provided authorisation for each deponent's case to proceed by way of CRP.

Summaries of the 20 deponent statements were then read out by CRP staff members. The deponents in this hearing had been grouped together because a common theme in their statements was the claim that they had been forced to participate in the militia group, had not held positions of responsibility in the group and had admitted to only minor offences. (Statements dealing with more serious acts had been allocated to the other three hearings scheduled for the village.)

The deponents were then given the opportunity to make an oral presentation to the victims and the assembled community. Many were plainly nervous, having trouble with the microphone and having to be gently coaxed to face the victims and their community. The length and quality of the oral testimony varied from several minutes of animated story-telling to a few seconds of mumbled apology. In several cases deponents listed the violations for which they were not responsible: "I did not kill. I did not intimidate anyone. I did not burn houses or steal."

Many were low-level militia members who had been drafted into the BMP and had performed menial tasks. Some deponents had information to share about well-known incidents, such as the Liquiçá church massacre of 6 April 1999; others had been present at the militia rally in Dili on 17 April 1999, which had been followed by the killings at the house of Manuel Carrascalão. One deponent had been present at a militia meeting attended by General Wiranto, but claimed he could not understand what was being said as it was conducted in Indonesian. Some of the deponents clearly found giving their presentations difficult and distressing.

After the oral testimony, panel members, victims and community members were given an opportunity to comment and put questions to the deponents. Questions ranged from requests for specific details, such as the dates when deponents joined the BMP and the names of others involved in specific attacks, to more general inquiries about, for example, how people who were involved in the clandestine movement could be forced to work with the militia.

One victim put several questions to his nephew, who was one of the deponents, requesting more detail about an attack on his home that had resulted in the killing of his livestock. He felt that the version that had been presented at the hearing was not consistent with what he had heard privately about the attack from some of those involved. Some questions were not directed at any particular deponent, but were comments on or an account of other acts that the speaker felt should be taken into consideration.

When deponents denied allegations against them, sections of the assembled community sometimes voiced their disapproval. Some deponents were clearly unable to remember the details of events, while others were plainly being evasive. The chair of the panel intervened to remind the deponents that presenting the truth of what had happened was a precondition for reconciliation. It was not the Commission's role to punish them, but it was a criminal offence to give false information in a CRP hearing.

Several questions were directed at a particular deponent, D, about the disappearance and murder of a villager called B. D was known to have been with a man called F, who had tied B up before he was taken away. Community members assumed that B had been killed. F had also applied to participate in a CRP, but his request had been rejected by the OGP, presumably because the evidence indicated that he might have been involved in a "serious crime".

F was still living in the community. He had not been arrested and indicted, and his file remained with the Serious Crimes Unit. Members of the community felt that F also needed to explain what had happened to B, but he was not at the hearing. In his absence they questioned D about the case. Having denied complicity in B's presumed murder, D was persuaded by the panel to explain in more detail exactly what he believed had happened.

Another deponent was asked about the murder of an old man. The deponent was clearly familiar with the matter and responded angrily that he was tired of being accused of responsibility for the murder. He acknowledged that he had been present when the killing had taken place. He said that he had already given what information he had about the case to the authorities, and that he now wanted an end to the allegations against him. As more questions were directed at him, he countered by accusing one of those who questioned him of himself being an informer for the Indonesian security forces. As tempers flared, CRP staff intervened to calm the situation.

In this situation, as in many others, it was clear that the CRP provided an opportunity for deponents not only to admit what they had done, but also to state what they had not done, by responding to and clearing up allegations based on rumour and unreliable information.

Although the deponents provided much information to the families of victims and the wider community, their answers sometimes appeared to be calculated more to avoid acceptance of responsibility or blame than to provide the truth. Many of the answers given by deponents appeared to be accepted by those attending the hearing, but some clearly were not. They were greeted with loud protests and other vocal responses from the community.

The Commission's representatives were also asked questions, chiefly about "unfinished business". People wanted to know what would happen to other perpetrators who wanted to come forward after the Commission had finished its work. There were also questions about whether there were plans for a process of reconciliation with the refugees in Atambua in West Timor.

Eventually there were no more questions, and each deponent was given an opportunity to make a formal apology, ask for forgiveness and commit himself not to repeat his mistakes. Most of the deponents were applauded by those gathered, although a few were not.

The panel chairperson asked for ideas and input on what would be appropriate "acts of reconciliation". After consultation with the victims and the traditional leaders, the panel decided that the deponents had demonstrated that they should be re-accepted into the community, and that they should be required only to make a public apology to the victims and their community.

The lisan leaders then asked the deponents to participate in a traditional ceremony, at which several chickens were slaughtered, and their entrails examined for blemishes. Of the four chickens examined, one had blemished entrails, leading the traditional leaders to conclude that some of the deponents had not told the whole truth, and to proclaim that they would have to live with the consequences of this. Their finding accorded with the impression of observers at the hearing that members of the community were content with most of what they had heard, but had found some of the deponents' statements unsatisfactory. Particular individuals were not picked out for criticism, but there appeared to be a common understanding among those gathered which deponents had not told the whole truth.

Despite the fact that it did not completely satisfy community members, the hearing was clearly an important local event. Over 200 community members, men and women from all age groups, attended the hearing. Many displayed their sense of the importance of the occasion by wearing traditional attire. Those who attended included the families and friends of deponents and victims. The most common observation of participants at the end of the hearing was one of appreciation, qualified by reservations about the way a few of the deponents had conducted themselves. Participants stated that they were happy that a significant number of former militia members who had joined in the campaign of violence against the community had been publicly shamed for their actions and had apologised. They also said that the hearing had helped the entire community understand what took place during the conflict.

The role of lisan in the hearings

86. The Regulation set out the basic steps for CRP hearings. In addition, the Commission drew up procedural guidelines to ensure a minimum degree of uniformity across all districts. These guidelines, however, provided much flexibility for inclusion of other steps or practices, and the Commission encouraged communities to employ local cultural practices in order to promote a feeling of ownership.

87. The extent to which lisan rituals were actually used and the form they took varied greatly between communities. Despite this, some practices were common to most CRP hearings. In particular, the ceremony of nahe biti boot was part of most CRP hearings.

Marking the formality of the occasion

88. Lisan rituals were often performed in preparation for the CRP hearing and then again to mark its opening. Spiritual leaders, dressed in traditional clothes and carrying lulik (sacred) objects, danced, while chanting and reciting monologues, often to the accompaniment of drums. In Timor-Leste drums are usually played by older women who, at the same time, dance in short lines revolving around a common centre like the spokes of a wheel. The women hold their slender drums under one arm while beating swift, complex rhythms with both hands.

89. The opening fostered the feeling that the CRP was not just being held for the benefit of the individual perpetrators seeking readmission to community life, but as a community event of significance for the entire village. The chants and recitations of the lisan leaders were intended to be heard not just by the living audience but also by the custodians of the community, the ancestors, who, it was believed, would also be witnesses to the hearing that was about to begin. The colourful clothes and the lulik (sacred) objects and other ceremonial paraphernalia, the chanting, the drumming and dancing heightened the excitement of the event and the interest of the audience and participants. The CRP therefore had a dual aspect: it brought to the surface painful memories of past wrongs as part of a difficult search for truth and accountability, but it was also an event that the community found absorbing and at times entertaining. This combination enabled it to become a reaffirming experience that could dispel past antagonisms and bring the community together.

90. Following the opening the mat was often solemnly unfurled on the ground in front of the table at which the panel would sit. Mama fatin were placed on the mat, together with betel nut, tobacco and other objects that would be used in the ceremony. The lia nain, perpetrators and victims would chew betel nut together after settlement of their dispute.

91. Early in the proceedings it was made clear that the CRP would draw on both customary procedures and ones associated with modern government, such as speeches made by people connected to the government, and reading the letters from the General Prosecutor authorising the hearing. It was the experience of the Commission that the formal aspects of the procedure, whether based on lisan or on modern legal principles, added significant weight to the respect that the communities gave to the CRP.

Lisan and the Regulation

92. It was often not possible to separate the lisan elements of the CRP from those elements sourced in the Regulation. The drafters of the Regulation consciously drew on lisan principles. For example, the Regulation's requirement that deponents admit their actions publicly is a lisan principle. However, the Regulation did not require deponents to apologise publicly to victims, although this is a practice sanctified by lisan. Both lisan and the Regulation also enable victims and the community to offer their points of view on the matters at stake.

93. A major difference between the two systems was that in lisan proceedings, it is the lia nain who decide what sanction should be imposed on the perpetrator. In the CRP it was the panel that was authorised to propose suitable "acts of reconciliation" to the deponent, after hearing the views of all interested parties, including victims, the community and the lia nain themselves. In the CRP the deponent participated voluntarily and could refuse to agree to undertake the proposed "acts of reconciliation". (In such cases the matter would be referred back to the OGP.) Under pure lisan, the perpetrator is compelled to accept the sanction that the lia nain decide.

94. Another difference between lisan and the CRP was that in traditional lisan hearings the victim must agree with the proposed solution for it to be acceptable to the lia nain. In the CRP the Panel was required only to consider the views of the victims in making its determination of what "acts of reconciliation" would be suitable. This aspect of the procedure ensured that cases could be completed where a perpetrator's actions had affected many victims in several communities. In such cases gaining the agreement of all the victims would have created insuperable logistical problems. It would also often have been difficult to identify the victim whose consent would have been required. For example, if a perpetrator burned three houses, each home to 15 persons, the formal consent of each of those individuals would be required, possibly as well as that of, for instance, any other person whose possessions may have been inside the house at the time.

95. Despite the fact that the CRP did not formally require the consent of victims, in practice the agreement of the principal victims was required for the hearing to proceed to completion. Local communities often regarded this fundamental principle of lisan procedure as binding and thus believed that no deponent should be re-accepted into his community without the consent of the victims. In a small number of cases victims did not consent to accepting back deponents and the panel decided to refer the case back to the OGP. In a number of these cases the victims stated that the deponent had not come to them "with an open heart" as evidenced by his reluctance to tell the entire truth about what had occurred. In these circumstances the victims could not accept that the apology was genuine.

Similarities and differences in lisan practices

96. Some lisan procedures were specific to individual communities, while others were common to a large number of hearings. Even where particular lisan practices were common in different parts of the country, the interpretation and significance attached to these practices could vary. Thus, coconut water sprinkled on deponents and observers in a ceremony in a village in Maliana might signify the "cooling" of the "hot" emotions associated with past acts, whereas in Liquiçá the same act might signify the purification and cleansing of the participants.

97. In many cases the perpetrators made their apologies or oral commitments in front of lulik objects, the sacred objects revered by members of the community as links to their ancestors. Doing so was a sign of the depth of the deponents' commitment to their declarations, since they had been witnessed by the community and ancestors. In other hearings different rituals, such as the drinking of palm wine mixed with the blood of an animal, were performed to convey the deponents' sincerity.

98. The custom of taking "blood oaths" to affirm that a commitment was binding had been manipulated and thus significantly weakened during the Indonesian occupation. Realising the power of this ritual for the East Timorese people, members of the Indonesian security forces had coerced and encouraged individuals to "drink blood" to show their deep commitment to integration with Indonesia. A number of participants in the CRP programme commented that during the occupation the power of lisan rituals had diminished because of such manipulation. They also said that the prominence given to lisan within the CRP, including the element of official recognition had helped to restore its place as a unifying force within communities.

Where lisan was not involved

99. Lisan played a significant part in about three-quarters of CRP hearings. One of the reasons for the absence of lisan in the remaining cases was that the CRP sometimes involved parties belonging to different lisan groups. Finding a way of involving all the lisan leaders with a stake in the case would have been an impossibly demanding task for district staff who were under pressure to complete one set of sub-district hearings before moving on to the next. In such cases the CRP procedure, which applied equally to all individuals regardless of their customary allegiances, was applied without the assistance of lisan.

The case of V

V was a deponent from Fatululik in the district of Covalima. He had declared in his statement that, as a member of the Laksaur militia, he had threatened fellow villagers with a gun. At the time Laksaur was trying to drive people across the border to West Timor. In his statement, V also gave an account of the killing of a cow belonging to a resident of a neighbouring village, Fatuloro. He identified as victims of his actions both his home community and the individual from Fatuloro.

Lisan would have allowed the elders of his community to facilitate a hearing between him and his community, but because his actions harmed members of two separate communities, the negotiations would have had to involve both sets of lisan leaders or risk being perceived as biased in favour of either the deponent or his victims. The Commission made a judgement that involving both groups would lead to confusion and potential conflict. Consequently it decided to proceed without the participation of either group of elders. A resolution was reached in a hearing in Fatululik on the 14 February 2003. At the hearing V made a full confession and a public apology which was, after questioning, accepted by the victim. He also donated a cow that was slaughtered and eaten at a communal meal after the hearing.

Special cases

100. A number of deponents had committed acts that affected many victims or several communities, and yet practical constraints dictated that there could be a CRP hearing in only one of these. Commission teams developed two different approaches to this issue. The first was that reflected in the above example where a hearing was run in which no *lisan l*eaders were involved. The second approach was for the Commission teams to conduct the hearing and involve the lisan leaders who represented the community with which the deponent said he wished to reconcile. In these cases a judgement was made that it was too difficult to combine several sets of lisan procedures and personnel, but it was better to include at least one of these groups than none at all. Victims and community representatives from all the affected communities were welcome to participate.

The case of M

M gave testimony in a hearing in his home community of Ediri Village in Liquiçá District on the 11 March 2004. In his testimony, as in his earlier statement, he told of his forced conscription to the BMP militia and his rise to the position of local commander. He admitted that he had taken part in, and ordered, the confiscation of livestock. He also said that he had witnessed the capture of a local youth who was later killed by two of M's subordinates, though not, he claimed, on his orders. As a commander, he had taken part in operations in a number of neighbouring villages, but he had identified the victims of his actions as coming only from his home community.

The Liquiçá team organised the hearing, which ran for a whole day, and featured a series of lisan ceremonies and rituals. The ceremonies included calling in ancestors to witness the proceedings, and confirm through the reading of pigs' entrails that the truth had been spoken. The deponents' negative acts were bound into a coconut, which was subsequently removed and disposed of by the deponent in the forest. He returned to the site of the hearing bearing a second coconut representing his positive acts, which he presented to those assembled.

101. On occasions when the deponent had identified a community outside his own that he wished to reconcile with, the CRP made arrangements with the leaders and lia nain of that community to enable a hearing to take place according to that community's customs. Reports indicate that it was not uncommon in such circumstances for lisan representatives of the deponents' own community to attend as observers, rather than as customary authorities, as the case was effectively outside their "jurisdiction".

CRP hearing in Lela Ufe, Oecussi, 22 November 2002

The people of Lela Ufe, a village in the enclave of Oecussi, first came into contact with the Community Reconciliation Process through the work of a Commission team that visited them in September 2002. The team found a community eager to embrace the process and quickly secured applications from many members of the community wanting to apply to take part in a hearing. The proceedings that followed provide a good example of how the richness of the local lisan traditions was incorporated into the CRP Programme.

From the aldeia of Bebu alone, 31 people applied to participate in the CRP. Those applying generally did so because of acts committed as members of the Oecussi-based Sakunar (Scorpion) militia. Most of these acts had been committed in 1999, and included intimidating fellow community members, burning houses, destroying livestock and participating in operations under the instruction of the Indonesian military.

All of the community members who had applied were given approval to participate by the Office of the General Prosecutor, and the hearing date was set for 22 November 2002. To prepare them for the hearing, Commission staff briefed the deponents, victims and panel members. They also consulted with community leaders about which customary ceremonies should be performed and which local leaders should be invited to participate.

On the night before the hearing, many of the participants gathered together to perform an invocation ceremony. The ritual of hadeer ai-riin (Tetum: "waking the post") takes its name from the belief that a wooden post used in the ritual is a contact point between the worlds of the living and of the ancestors. The post is "woken", and contact established through the ritualised sacrifice of an animal. Calling on the ancestors in this way and making offerings to them in advance of an important ceremony is thought to ensure that the ceremony goes smoothly.

The following morning, proceedings got underway. As people gathered together at the place that had been designated for the hearing, Commission staff ensured that all deponents and victims were present and welcomed those who had come to witness the proceedings. Before formally beginning the hearing, the lia nain performed the opening ceremony in an area close by.

The elders had prepared the ai-riin, in this case a post made from a wood known locally for its power to recall those who have become lost. The post stood at the centre of a circle of stones. The stones represented the spirit of unity. Within the circle lay other objects – coconut water, a large fan-like leaf, a machete and betel nut – each of which represented principles to be upheld in the hearing: the coconut water and the leaf were there to cool the tempers of people who still felt the "heat" of anger; the machete symbolised the power and strength of the ceremony, while its presence on the ground in the circle was a reminder that weapons were to be laid to rest by the process; and the betel nut, which would later be shared by the participants, symbolised the community's reunification.

At the close of the lia nains' introductory ceremony, two tais were laid out. The first was a tais mane or man's tais, representing qualities of transparency, of allowing things to be seen as they truly are, in order that good can be distinguished from bad. The second was a tais feto, or woman's tais, which is believed to hold powers of balance and measurement, that allow events to be weighed against one another. The two tais were laid on the ground, together with mats woven from palm leaves, in the area where the panel were to sit. Once again, this was an act that was rich with symbolism. The spreading of the mats (nahe biti boot) represented the opening of the issues which had divided those who were to speak. The mats would not be rolled up again until these issues had been resolved. As the opening ceremonies drew to a close, the lia nain sounded a gong calling all present to come and bear witness to the process, and the panel took their seats.

Around 700 people attended the hearing. Chiefs of 18 of the surrounding villages had come to observe, along with representatives of the church and local and international NGOs. Many of the ordinary villagers who came to the hearing had walked long distances to be there.

The process lasted for the entire day, and the dedication and the proceedings ran smoothly and to the apparent satisfaction of the community members watching. One deponent's case was adjourned after accusations that he had been involved in a "serious crime" were deemed to amount to "credible evidence". The cases of the remaining 30 deponents proceeded to their appointed conclusion with the communities saying that they were ready to accept them back. Acts of reconciliation were decided after consultation with the victims, the community leaders and the deponents themselves. They ranged from a simple apology to the donation of tais and other ceremonial objects to victims.

The lia nain had requested that before the acts of reconciliation were made public and the proceedings formalised by the signing of the Community Reconciliation Agreement, they be given time to perform further rituals to close the proceedings.

A cow, bought for the occasion by the deponents, had been slaughtered. The lia nain read the entrails to verify that the ancestors were happy with the outcome and that all had spoken the truth during their testimonies. The message of the entrails was favourable. Some of the animal's blood was taken and mixed with coconut water before being sprinkled over the deponents as together they held on to the ceremonial post and received the blessing which marked their re-entry into the community and the purification of their past acts.

After the customary ceremonies were over, each deponent in turn apologised publicly for their past acts and swore never to harm their communities again. They then signed the Community Reconciliation Agreements. At the close of the hearing relief showed on the faces of the participants, particularly the deponents'. All signs of the tension and anger that had sometimes been evident during the hearing were gone, and the atmosphere became festive. Those who had attended celebrated with a feast in which, as a token of good will, the cow brought by the deponents was eaten. Community members continued to sing and dance into the early hours of the morning.

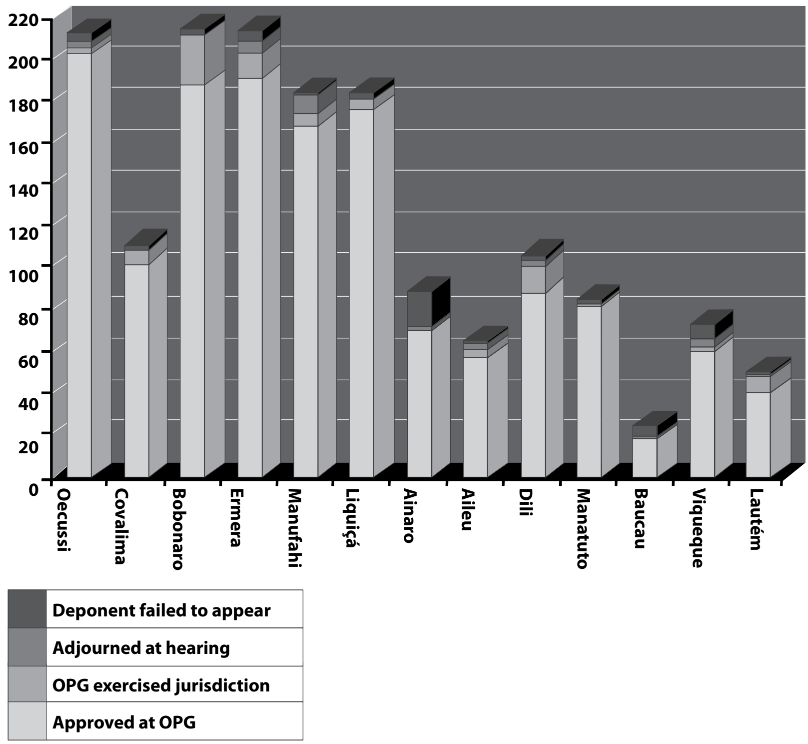
Over a year later, when the Regional Commissioner for Oecussi revisited the area to return the court-registered agreements, he observed how the previously divided community now enjoyed extremely good relations. Deponents and victims from the hearing had formed a co-operative to grow cassava and maize.

Results of the CRP programme

Overall

102. In summary, during the operational period of the CRP programme:

- The Commission received a total of 1,541 statements from deponents requesting to participate in CRP, all of which were forwarded to the OGP
- Cases involving 1,371 deponents were successfully completed through CRP hearings
- The OGP did not grant approval for 85 cases to be proceeded with by way of CRP. These cases were retained by the OGP
- 32 cases were adjourned during the hearing because credible information came to light, which indicated that the deponent might have been involved in a "serious criminal offence", or because communities refused to accept the deponent
- These figures show that nearly 90% of all cases received proceeded to completion. The remaining 10% were cases where the deponent did not attend the scheduled hearing, the hearing was adjourned, or the OGP did not consent to them proceeding by CRP.



The statistics below provide an overview of the work carried out through the CRP programme.

Diagram: Results of applications for CRP

Variations in results between districts

Statements received

104. The Regulation specifically provided that the CRP should prioritise acts committed in 1999 as one of the CRP's goals was to reduce the anger in communities fuelled by the recent events. The violence during 1999 had been most intense in the districts closest to the borders with Indonesia – Oecussi, Bobonaro, Ermera, Covalima and Liquiçá. Not surprisingly these were the five districts from which the largest number of deponents applied for a CRP. The average number of deponent statements taken in all 13 districts was 119, but the number from this western region averaged over 180 per district. By contrast the average number of statements received from the four most easterly districts (Lautém, Viqueque, Baucau and Manatuto) was only 54 per district.

105. The figures for Covalima District were anomalous. Although the number of statements taken there was only just below the average, that was lower than would have been expected considering that Covalima is a border district and was severely affected by the violence in 1999. The district team responsible for Covalima considered that the relatively low rate of participation was due to the fact that less perpetrators of harmful acts had returned to Covalima from West Timor compared to other districts. National staff monitoring reports on the district also found a lack of cohesion among the district team members, which affected the implementation of the CRP public information programme.

106. The district that provided by far the lowest number of statements was Baucau. A number of factors may have contributed to this result. Baucau had not been subjected to the same level of destruction following the ballot as other areas, and that in part was a reflection of the fact that the militia group there was neither as well-organised nor as militant as in the districts that suffered worse in 1999. It seems likely then that animosities generated by the events of 1999 in Baucau were less intense than in most other districts. At the same time the performance of the district team, which was hampered by a lack of cohesion and personality clashes, probably also contributed to Baucau's relatively weak showing.

Exercise of jurisdiction by the OGP

107. Dili and Bobonaro Districts each had well over twice the national average percentage of cases in which the OGP exercised jurisdiction (the national average was approximately 5%). An examination of these cases found that the OGP exercised its jurisdiction in these districts not only more frequently but also more consistently over the course of the programme than it did in other districts. The Commission also found that the higher rate is not explained by a higher prevalence of serious acts in those two districts. The acts declared in the rejected statements were generally of the same nature as acts admitted by deponents from other districts, whose applications to proceed through a CRP were approved.

108. One possible explanation for this is that individual prosecutors within the Serious Crimes Unit of the OGP, each assigned to work on particular districts, took different approaches to dealing with CRP cases. The absence of clear guidelines for making decisions introduced a large element of discretion into the process and some prosecutors may have decided that borderline cases, in which the statement of the deponent alone did not clearly establish that the crime was serious enough to prosecute, should be dealt with through a CRP. On the other hand, other prosecutors may have decided not to approve cases in which they felt further investigation was needed to ensure that a CRP was appropriate.

Deponents failed to attend

109. The districts of Viqueque and Ainaro recorded the largest numbers of deponents who failed to attend their hearings, despite having submitted statements and received official permission to proceed. The high figure for Ainaro District is explained by the non-appearance of a single group of deponents. They did not attend after community leaders objected to the hearing because it would deal only with those involved in relatively minor crimes and harmful acts. A significant number of perpetrators from this community remained in West Timor, and the community leaders decided that a hearing that focused on past violence should not be held until they returned. The reason for the high non-attendance rate in Viqueque is unclear.

Number of deponents in a CRP

110. The number of deponents who participated in a one-day hearing ranged between one and 31. Hearings were generally conducted in a single day for logistical reasons, as well as to allow community members to attend without seriously disrupting their everyday lives. Some people had to walk for an entire day to attend a hearing and they were not provided with accommodation or food, so extending a hearing over a number of days would have made their attendance difficult. In the one hearing that took place over several days, a three-day hearing held in Passabe, Oecussi District, 55 deponents testified.

Actions dealt with by CRP

111. The vast majority of deponents in the CRP were males aged between 25 and 35 years at the time they committed the acts deposed. Affiliation and participation in militia groups, arson, assault, illegal incarceration and the destruction of property were the acts most often included in deponents' statements. A smaller proportion of cases concerned deponents giving support or supplying information to the Indonesian occupying forces, and unresolved issues arising out of the political conflict of 1974-76. The CRP did not deal with any cases in which the deponent directly participated in murder, rape or torture. However, a small number of cases were proceeded with in which deponents admitted to being present at the time in which "serious crimes" were committed.

Acts of reconciliation

> It's important to involve a payment, not necessarily to punish the deponent, but so that everyone can see the deponent giving and admitting responsibility, and then see the victim accepting the object and so accepting that person.[29]

112. In general, the "acts of reconciliation" that deponents agreed to fulfil were relatively lenient. Communities consistently stressed the importance of deponents telling the complete truth to the gathering and demonstrating a real sense of remorse. The hearing itself was often a difficult and painful experience for deponents. If it was felt that the deponent's admission and apology were complete, open and sincere, often the community was satisfied with only symbolic acts of reparation or community service. Community service, for example, usually consisted of a task performed once a week over a set period that was usually no longer than three months. Examples of required tasks included: the repair of public buildings, tree planting, the erection of a village flagpole, and cleaning of church grounds or other facilities.

113. Sometimes the victims and the wider community joined the deponent in carrying out the agreed task. In such cases, the perpetrator did the work as a compulsory part of his or her agreement, while the victims and community members participated voluntarily as a demonstration of their good faith and belief in the process. The joint participation of perpetrators and victims in a common community service project was a graphic demonstration of the power of the CRP to bring previously polarised parties together.

114. Community Reconciliation Agreements sometimes included a requirement that the deponent make reparations to victims. Reparations varied from payments in cash or in kind, which sought to reimburse the victim for goods lost, stolen or destroyed, such as livestock, to more symbolic payments with a ritual value. Thus, in a number of hearings, particularly ones held in rural areas and the enclave of Oecussi, deponents gave victims ceremonial objects such as tais (hand-woven textiles), belak (chest ornaments) and morten (coral necklaces).

The power of apology

The number of cases in which the deponent was required only to make a public apology was far higher than had been expected. On the whole public apologies were given and received in a spirit of solemnity, especially when made in the context of a lisan ceremony.

Some may find it surprising that many villages required only a full and open apology as a prerequisite for reconciliation, and did not demand reparations, community service or other acts that might be considered punitive. One factor which helps to explain this phenomenon is the close-knit nature of East Timorese communities. It can be highly emotionally demanding to freely and openly admit past faults, apologise and ask for forgiveness when the audience includes family members, the local religious and political leaders who will influence your future life, and the entire community whom you will face and interact with the following day, and every day thereafter. By comparison, the public admission of guilt and apologies in front of strangers whom you will not encounter again would carry rather less weight.

Although many apologies were delivered and received with suitable solemnity, some were delivered in a cursory manner that failed to satisfy victims and community members. Possibly, some deponents lacked sincerity because they were not convinced that they were responsible for any harm done. This was more common where the young men were forced into joining the militias and saw themselves to be victims. In other cases individuals may have felt pressured by local hierarchies to participate in the CRP, even though they had not reached the point where they felt genuine regret for their actions.

The effectiveness of the CRP programme

115. To assess the effectiveness of the CRP programme, the Commission conducted two internal monitoring and evaluation surveys during the implementation phase. The assessments sought to evaluate the level of satisfaction of participants in the process, and identify issues of concern that could be addressed in future hearings. The assessments were based on responses to a standard set of questions by people who had participated as deponents, victims, or members of the panel or local community.

116. The first evaluation, conducted in March-April 2003, was based on interviews with 40 participants – ten deponents, ten victims, ten panel members and ten community members – who came from five districts. Each of the interviewees had attended a CRP hearing in the preceding three months.

117. The second evaluation was undertaken in August 2003 by district teams in each of the 13 districts. A total of 116 persons who had participated in CRP were interviewed in this assessment.

Reintegrating perpetrators into their communities

I feel very happy with the process because now we can live in peace. Before I couldn't really talk to the [deponents]. I wanted them to declare what they did. I felt I said what I needed to say. Now I feel more free. I feel close to the deponents.

Victim - Aileu[30]

Before the [CRP] I felt ashamed to walk around the village. Now when I walk around, I feel more free. People didn't talk to me sometimes before. Now I feel that people are more open. Before I felt a weight on me when I went to work in the fields.

Deponent – Aileu[31]

Before I took part [in the hearing], when we met each other in the street we still felt hatred towards each other. We had not genuinely given our selves to each other. We Timorese can hold our anger for a long time.

Deponent – Los Palos[32]

Now I've got my job back as a high school teacher. They called me back to work because they saw that I declared everything in the hearing. Everybody is now moving on with their lives. I can move about freely again.

Deponent – Dili[33]

We attended two biti boot meetings – one at the Aldeia and one at the village level. They were good because through reconciliation we could confess everything that we had done – fighting, burning houses – including the one belonging to the head of the village. Through the process we could apologise and they forgave us. We fixed the roof – it wasn't a punishment but a sign of reconciliation. After reconciliation we felt better, because in the reconciliation process we agreed that nobody could say that we are refugees – the case is closed.

Deponent - Aileu[34]

118. The research conducted by the Commission showed that deponents, victims and community members all felt that the CRP process had made a major contribution to reconciliation. Almost all deponents interviewed stated that their relationship with their community had improved significantly as a direct result of participating in a CRP hearing. Ninety-six % of all persons interviewed said that the CRP had achieved its primary goal of promoting reconciliation in their community.

119. One reason given for the positive response is that the CRP provided a forum for an open exchange of information. This allowed both perpetrators and victims to release emotions that had been bottled up. Although the exchanges could arouse raw emotions, anger and tears, if it was felt that deponents had made a real effort to provide the truth and were genuinely remorseful, victims and community members could accept them in a way that had not been possible before the CRP.

Concerns over the fragility of reconciliation

Who is going to look after our problems in the future? What is going to happen if someone hits me in the future? Who is going to monitor this? We have not yet received the letter back from the court. We need the letter and we also need others to monitor the situation in the future. If new problems arise, how are we going to resolve them?

Deponent - Ainaro[35]

120. Although there was a feeling that the CRP had assisted in promoting reconciliation and cooling community anger, many villagers continued to express concern that the new-found peace in their communities was fragile. Some deponents worried that the community acceptance that the CRP had granted them might not always protect them against revenge attacks or social isolation. However, the fact that the CRP programme was anchored in legislation and had a connection to the formal justice process was seen to be important.

Restoring the dignity of victims

121. Whatever their reservations, most victims were ready to forgive deponents. Victims usually said that because deponents were willing to participate in the CRP, they in turn were willing to forgive. All 21 victims interviewed by the Commission in its internal evaluation reported the maximum rating of forgiveness. However, a number of victims expressed frustration that those who had killed or raped their family members remained free in West Timor, and could not be brought back to face their communities or the courts. In many cases, victims of less serious offences were also victims of serious crimes. Although they expressed satisfaction with the results of the CRP, they were dissatisfied with the progress that had been made towards achieving comprehensive justice.

Establishing the truth about human rights violations

> I'm not like these others [two other deponents in the scheduled hearing, both militia members]. I did nothing wrong, I didn't commit any crimes. I can live with the community and if people want to avoid me, that's their business. I want to take part in the CRP because I don't want my children and my grandchildren to have problems one day. It's important to me that this stops here.
> Deponent - Dili[36]

> I was not obliged to go through the CRP but as a citizen I wanted to go ahead. I felt I needed to give my statement about 1999…I was a liurai (traditional king) during the occupation and my work was very public. I made contact with Falintil and I assisted them with money… A new organisation was formed soon after called the FPDK [Forum Persatuan Demokrasi dan Keadilan, United Front for Democracy and Justice]. My name was put there by the Camat (Sub-district Administrator). I didn't go along to any activities. As a liurai, I was asked to give them the names of people who should join the Darah Merah (militia group) by the Camat. I had to put forward 20 names from this village. If I didn't give any names to the Camat there would have been much suspicion of me. We all had to live with "ulun rua" (two faces) in those days in order to survive. In 1999, after the referendum, the FPDK was disbanded. It didn't really do anything bad.

Deponent - Ermera[37]

122. The CRP provided deponents not only with an opportunity to admit to victims and their peers the details of what they had done, it also allowed them to clarify what they had not done. The conflict had often been chaotic, and information had been distorted, exaggerated and invented. Because there was no way of determining the truth, rumour became a substitute for the truth. It was common for deponents in CRP hearings to admit responsibility for certain acts, and then be accused by the community of committing other acts as well. In many cases, deponents were able to provide detailed rebuttals of these allegations. In this way deponents were able to limit the accusations against them to those based on fact, and challenge convincingly those based on false rumour.

123. Many deponents stated that they had been forced to participate in militia activities during 1999. Communities accepted that this type of duress was common during the conflict and that many young men had been forced to guard militia posts and take part in other militia activities. The CRP gave the opportunity to victims and others to question whether the acts committed by the perpetrators had in fact been coerced, or if this was just being offered as an excuse.

124. In other cases, deponents accused of collaboration with the security forces or of other harmful acts provided explanations that they had in fact been working under the direction of clandestine leaders, and that their collaboration was only a cover for their real role.

CRP hearing in Fahelebo, Liquiçá, 29 October 2002

Preparations for a CRP hearing in the village of Fahelebo were undertaken on the assumption that the procedure would be relatively short, simple and straightforward. The only deponent to testify had already admitted that he had taken part in the beating and humiliation of another member of the community and his statement had been corroborated by the victim.

However, as the hearing progressed, a story emerged that illustrates how "perpetrator" and "victim" are often inadequate terms to describe the complex roles which individuals played during the political conflicts. One of the positive attributes of the CRP was its capacity to expose and clarify these complexities, so that the participating community was able to gain a fuller understanding of what had taken place.

The deponent, P, began his testimony by recalling events that had occurred in May 1999. At the time he had been the police officer responsible for the village and had been contacted by J, the local Babinsa (TNI non-commissioned officer assigned to a village). J informed P that a pair of boots belonging to an Indonesian soldier had been stolen and that he suspected a local man, D, had carried out the theft in order to send the boots to Falintil fighters in the forest.

The person suspected of stealing the boots, D, was summoned. When he was brought before the group D was first punched and kicked by the Babinsa before P intervened to separate the men. At this point P slapped and kicked the victim and pushed him to the ground, demanding he perform ten push-ups in front of the group, and then crawl on the ground. Following his ordeal D was left lying on the ground.

Initially, on hearing the description of events outlined in P's testimony, the panel considered sentencing him to three days labour, repairing the local school's doors and windows. However, P then proceeded to explain his motivation for participating in the beating and humiliation of D.

P explained that at the time of the incident militia activity was intense and uncontrolled. On hearing that D was suspected of stealing the boots to supply to Falintil, P was afraid that D might be killed or his village attacked in retaliation. P further stated that he was related to D and wanted to protect him. He had intervened in the hope that by humiliating him in front of the others they would be satisfied and he would thereby save D's life.

The local community recognised that at that time there was a real risk that D might be killed for stealing the boots. D accepted P's explanation of what had happened and that he had acted not to persecute him but to save him. In consultation with the panel he, as the victim, offered to participate in the community service sanction to demonstrate that what had transpired between them in the past was now laid to rest and their relations restored.

A ritual slaughter of a chicken and a pig and a communal feast followed the hearing. At the close of the hearing a representative community elder stated that in many circumstances individuals and communities had been divided and separated by the political conflict, which had forced them to act in ways they would never have chosen. The causes for these divisions had now been removed.

Promoting reconciliation

125. According to those who took part in it, the CRP programme made a major contribution to building reconciliation at the individual, sub-village and village levels. It provided a forum in which individuals were able to give expression to beliefs and emotions that had previously been suppressed, to share anger and regret, and resolve to leave the violent past behind. The political conflict created a legacy of mistrust and resentment that was felt through every level of East Timorese society. By giving communities an opportunity to explore historical events, CRP helped to disentangle the web of suspicion that had been seriously impeding reconciliation.

126. The CRP programme, however, was one of a variety of reconciliation initiatives undertaken by the Commission. Whereas CRP targeted grass-roots level tensions, the Commission also sought to defuse long-standing tensions at the national level. In the public hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974-1976[38], for example, "agents of the process", including political leaders who had led the political parties at the time of the internal conflict, as well as the present-day representatives of those parties, spoke to the nation. They publicly accepted responsibility for their actions, expressed regret for the harmful acts they or the institutions they represented had done, and at the end of the four-day hearing affirmed their solidarity in a moving closing ceremony. At this extraordinary event, held before a packed audience and broadcast across the nation, Timor-Leste's political elite gave a public demonstration of how past differences can be put aside in order to strengthen the new nation.

127. Other public hearings aired the experiences of victims from all sides to the conflict and so contributed to a more balanced and accurate public perception of shared history. Victims' Hearings and Healing Workshops helped restore the dignity denied to individual victims, and dispelled some of the residual anger that fuels continuing division. Community mapping exercises promoted a village-level exploration of the past and helped to develop a collective version of events. The weekly radio programme produced by the Commission encouraged reflection and debate on reconciliation. Through the information campaign in West Timor, refugees became aware of the work of the Commission, including the CRP programme for those that returned to Timor-Leste, and that they could give statements that could contribute to a balanced Final Report. It is hoped that this Report will also foster reconciliation by producing a version of events that is based on careful and objective research rather than limited information and rumour.

128. The Commission recognises, however, that the goal of reconciliation is far from being fully realised and that it must remain a major component of national policy for many years to come. Only through the continuation of practical, grass-roots programmes, further historical clarification and education, and constant recognition that the challenge has still to be fully met can the people of Timor-Leste hope to free themselves of the divisions created by the past. The Commission recognises that some of these divisions were the product of manipulation by foreign actors, particularly Indonesia. However, the people of Timor-Leste themselves accept a degree of responsibility. The past must be faced, faults on both sides admitted, and politically-related hatred and violence recognised as bringing only misery. Continuing to pursue reconciliation is of fundamental importance, not only for those now living within the borders of Timor-Leste, but also as part of the quest of rebuilding trust and a common understanding with those who share our East Timorese heritage but remain in West Timor.

Lessons learned

129. As the CRP programme was unique, the Commission could be guided by the experiences of institutions engaged in similar work in other countries, but could not simply replicate them. In undertaking this new and untested programme, the Commission achieved more than it set out to do, but there was often a gap between reality and what had been conceived on paper. Some valuable lessons can be learned from the experience of the planning, preparation and implementation of CRP, both for any future community reconciliation programme in Timor-Leste, and for others considering similar programmes.

Implementing the programme

130. Firstly, preparing the ground for the CRP programme to begin was a much larger, more complex and more time-consuming task than had been expected. Before the first hearing could be held, procedures had to be agreed and set down, the roles of the participants decided, training manuals written, staff trained, a public information programme organised, an outreach programme to influential figures in the districts implemented, support and transportation provided for staff working in the sub-districts, hearing sites made ready, perpetrators' statements taken, procedures for working with the OGP settled and many other tasks completed. The strategic plan did not anticipate all the challenges that would occur at this preparatory stage, and this meant that the hearings began later than expected.

131. The national CRP office also underestimated the time and effort needed for communities to become familiar with what was an entirely new concept. As familiarity increased during the life of the field programme, so did the level of community participation.

The role of victims

132. Further, although all categories of participants in the CRP programme, including victims, indicated that they had benefited from participation, more consideration could have been given to the role and contribution of victims. The Commission recognises that no process can hope to heal victims' wounds or compensate them for what they have lost. The CRP gave victims a voice and some degree of accountability for harmful acts that otherwise would not have been dealt with. However, the "acts of reconciliation" required of perpetrators in general delivered only token reparations. Some victims also reportedly felt indirect community pressure to reconcile with the perpetrator.

133. The role of victims in any justice process is a complex issue. As far as the CRP is concerned, it must be put in the context of the Commission's guiding principles when it designed the programme. The Commission wished to finalise a large number of cases, while respecting community social structures by giving a powerful role to local leaders, recognising that communities wished to heal local divisions and symbolically close the period of conflict, and that in Timor-Leste the concept of individual identity is closely entwined with the individual's sense of belonging to a community. Amid this complicated mix of objectives and constraints, the suffering of victims and their right to a remedy must be honoured and remembered at all times. Guidelines establishing a right of victims to a say in the decision on what "acts of reconciliation" the perpetrator should perform, and a stronger place for victims in the formal decision-making structure of the CRP would have helped to ensure that their interests were not overlooked.

Acts of reconciliation

134. One surprising outcome of the CRP was that the "acts of reconciliation" that perpetrators were asked to undertake were, in general, significantly less onerous than the Commission had expected. In many hearings involving low-level offences, the perpetrator was not asked to undertake any further action; a complete acknowledgement of the truth and a public apology were held to be sufficient. The type of "act of reconciliation" also differed between districts.

135. For example, deponents in Oecussi were more likely to be asked to pay financial compensation, and deponents in Bobonaro were more often required to undertake community service. This aspect of the programme was influenced by local custom and, in some cases, the views of the local leaders who sat on panels. On the one hand, this was a positive result in that the hearing format was flexible enough to accommodate local views. On the other, it meant that there was a lack of uniformity in dealing with similar offences. A set of guidelines suggesting what "acts of reconciliation" would be commensurate with what offence would have assisted in achieving uniformity.

The relationship between the Office of the General Prosecutor and the Commission

136. Over the course of the CRP programme community interest, and with it requests for hearings, increased dramatically, resulting in a caseload that was 50% higher than the Commission had initially planned for. This unexpected level of demand put great pressure on both the Commission and the OGP.

137. Under the tight schedule of three months per sub-district, the Commission needed the OGP to process cases quickly if they were to be heard before the district teams moved on. In the early stages of the programme, the OGP was frequently unable to meet the 14-day deadline for the turnaround of cases and sought the 14-day extension in almost every case. A major cause of delay was the need for translation. The Serious Crimes Unit was staffed largely by United Nations international personnel whose working language was English, whereas all CRP statements were in either Tetum or Indonesian. Some individual prosecutors also took a very cautious approach to their responsibilities.

138. These initial problems were resolved through closer co-operation between the two institutions, achieved through regular communication and information sharing. As the demand for CRP hearings grew, particularly towards the end of the operational period, the workload of both institutions increased dramatically. Due to hard work and a more pragmatic attitude on both sides, the programme was ultimately completed within the timeframe.

The relationship between the CRP and the courts

139. Each of the 1,371 Community Reconciliation Agreements had to be considered by the District Courts and, if approved, issued as an Order of the Court. As the end of the operational period approached, completing the certification process proved to be a serious challenge. The courts were already overburdened with a large backlog of cases. To clear the backlog the Commission assigned a CAVR staff member to work in the registry of each District Court. Once measures to expedite the review of CRAs were in place, cases passed through the courts relatively quickly. A decision to give Commission staff members the responsibility for notifying deponents of the courts' decisions removed another bottleneck.

140. Although viewed from one angle the CRP cases added to the workload of an already strained legal system, the programme may also have lightened its load. Some, if not all, of the cases handled by the Commission through the CRP programme may have been taken to the police by victims and perhaps even prosecuted. The programme effectively averted the need for police investigation, the preparation of indictments by prosecutors, judicial hearings, and an expanded court administration and prison system to deal with those cases.

Broader impacts of the CRP programme

CRP as a symbol of the end of the conflict

> Today is the end of 24 years of suffering, violence and division for our community. In 1999 we saw the Indonesian soldiers and militia leave. On 20 May 2002 we celebrated our independence as a nation. But it is only today that we as a community can be released from our suffering from this terrible past. Let us roll up the mat, and this will symbolise the end of all of these issues for us. From today we will look only forward. Let us now eat and dance together, and celebrate the future.
> Community leader-Maliana[39]

141. Besides giving communities the opportunity to explore and find solutions to problems between individuals in dispute, for many communities the CRP provided a symbolic closure to the long period of conflict. Although the formal objective of hearings was to allow deponents to gain re-admission to the communities by telling the truth and performing "acts of reconciliation", in fact the give-and-take between deponents and other participants often produced a more rounded and more accurate version of events that was of wider benefit to the community.

142. It is likely that the CRP performed this important function because it gave communities their first chance to focus on their own particular experience. Moreover, it gave them this opportunity in a contained and safe forum within which they could open up old wounds before declaring, on the basis of a broadly acceptable resolution, that the wounds should now be closed.

Contribution to the fight against impunity

143. After the end of the conflict in October 1999 national leaders and representatives of the international community repeatedly told the population of Timor-Leste that they should not seek to avenge past wrongs and must rely on formal justice mechanisms for solutions. This faith in the rule of law was unfamiliar to most East Timorese, as during the occupation the law had come to be seen as an instrument of oppression or simply irrelevant. However, for various reasons there was little progress in achieving justice for past offences in the three years after the end of the conflict. Considered in this context, the success of the CRP was an example for the new nation of the value of the rule of law. This was particularly so because the programme reached into remote parts of the country, and many participants reported to the Commission that the CRP was their only experience of any official legal mechanism since the departure of the Indonesian military.

144. In addition to buttressing the rule of law, the CRP held many perpetrators of "harmful acts" accountable, who would otherwise probably have enjoyed complete immunity. Although these persons were not forced to undergo trials nor imprisonment, their experience in the CRP and their subsequent "acts of reconciliation" were often painful and humiliating. Follow-up interviews indicated that the admissions and apologies that deponents made frequently had a lasting effect on their lives.

145. In this manner the CRP, together with the increasing number of successful prosecutions for "serious crimes" in the Special Panels, demonstrated that there was not complete impunity for past offences. It also served to weaken the case for an amnesty for past offences. Community members who had experienced the CRP found it difficult to accept the argument that amnesty was the only option for dealing with the massive number of unresolved "less serious crimes". Moreover, the proposal simply to drop the cases against perpetrators of such crimes seemed unfair after other perpetrators had been required to go through the painful process of a CRP.

The failure to bring those most responsible to account

> We were just ordinary people. We were forced to join the militia. Why should we go through this process while the big people continue to be free? *
> Two of our family members were killed during the violence. Those who killed them have not yet come back from Atambua. While my wife was still pregnant with our first child, I was jailed in West Timor from 1997 to 1999 because I was involved in the clandestine movement. I was beaten many times and thrown into the sea. Until now my eyes are dizzy and I cannot see very well. During 1999 our house was also burned and our things destroyed.[40]

146. The Regulation clearly prohibited the CRP from dealing with offenders who were most responsible for serious violations. There was a perception that this category of offender had evaded justice of any kind and that they remained free and unrepentant. This sense of injustice was expressed in different ways at almost all CRP hearings. The Jakarta Ad Hoc Tribunal had not yielded any tangible results and the Serious Crimes Process was unable to reach the majority of perpetrators of gross violations, who remained in West Timor or other parts of Indonesia. Further, because of resource constraints, the Serious Crimes Unit had still to investigate a number of persons suspected by their communities of being responsible for serious crimes, even though they had returned to Timor-Leste. In a number of cases these individuals had not returned to their original villages but remained in Dili. Community members commonly expressed frustration and anger that they had not been held to account for their actions in any way.

147. Even within the category of offender eligible for CRP, many individuals who were suspected of committing "less serious crimes" or other acts did not choose to participate in CRP hearings in their villages. The voluntary nature of the process meant that if these persons did not choose to give a statement, they could not be forced to. Although in theory they remained liable to arrest and trial, the likelihood that this would happen diminished as the legal system became increasingly overburdened with new cases.

148. The result of this uneven treatment of offenders was that often communities expressed appreciation of the actions of those perpetrators who stood before them and accounted for their actions, but they were clearly dissatisfied at the apparent impunity enjoyed by more serious offenders who, for whatever reason, remained beyond the reach of the formal justice system.

* Justice System Monitoring Programme, Unfulfilled Expectations: Community Views on CAVR's Community Reconciliation Process, Lia Kent, Dili, August 2004, p. 15. (available at www.jsmp.minihub.org.) This is not a quote from a deponent, but JSMP reported that it was a "common refrain" heard from deponents in the CRP. The JSMP report added that "[t]he perception is that those most responsible live comfortably, and with impunity, whether in West Timor or in Timor-Leste".

CRP's contribution to capacity building

149. One indirect benefit of the CRP was the skills and experience in dispute resolution and reconciliation mechanisms that members of staff, panels and communities acquired during the programme.

150. All CRP staff received training before beginning their work in communities, which was supplemented by further courses during the implementation of the programme. Training focused on developing the range of skills needed to conduct CRP hearings. These included skills in:

1. Mediation
2. Achieving solutions acceptable to parties in disagreement
3. Dealing with aggrieved victims
4. Special issues relating to victims of sexual assault
5. Conflict resolution and the dissipation of anger or violent reactions
6. Role-plays and problem-solving exercises based on the kinds of situations staff members were likely to face in the CRP hearings
7. Chairing meetings or panels
8. Basic legal principles relating to natural justice and procedural fairness
9. The legal requirements of CRP, as set out in Regulation 10/2001.

151. In addition to this training, staff and Regional Commissioners participated in many hearings throughout the life of the programme, allowing them to develop these skills. In total more than 50 East Timorese completed this training and were thereby equipped with skills that could have wider application.

152. Panel members also received training before they presided over hearings. Their training was primarily aimed at preparing them for the forthcoming hearing, and included imparting a general knowledge of methods of mediation and dispute resolution. A total of over 1,000 East Timorese Panel Members received this instruction and participated actively in at least one hearing in which they were required to utilise the skills they had learned. As panel members were community leaders drawn from each of the 65 sub-districts of Timor-Leste, this training should enhance local capacity to resolve disputes throughout Timor-Leste.

153. The methodology of the CRP, which included conducting proceedings in a calm, respectful manner and giving space for the views of all affected parties, also provided a valuable model for communities to draw on in resolving other disputes. It is estimated that over 40,000 East Timorese (almost 5% of the population) attended and participated in CRP hearings. This widespread experience of confronting difficult problems and seeking to resolve them in ways that were agreeable to all parties made a valuable contribution to maintaining peace during the volatile and emotionally fragile period following the end of the conflict.

154. The Commission closely followed the Regulation requirement that a minimum 30% of all Regional Commissioners be women,[41] and that panels have "appropriate gender representation".[42] As Regional Commissioners and panel members, women played an active role in the hearings, which can only have had a beneficial role on gender equality in Timor-Leste.

CRP: a unique approach to justice

155. The different systems of formal prosecution through the state legal system and the CRP programme were developed for different reasons, and made different contributions to justice. The formal criminal justice system has developed over centuries to deal with the ordinary type and level of crime that occurs in a relatively stable society. It deals with cases on an individual basis in an objective manner, with a view to the decision being generally applicable to other perpetrators of the same offence. The formal justice system represents the power of the State in condemning anti-social behaviour.

156. The CRP, by contrast, was designed to address a particular caseload, arising from a specific situation, where violence and human rights violations had occurred on a massive scale, and where whole communities had been torn apart by what had occurred. It was in this extraordinary post-conflict context that the CRP was designed to address both justice and reconciliation.

157. Certainly, the CRP was not able to offer the same depth of investigation, legal certainty, uniformity of application and guarantees of due process and fairness that the courts can provide. However, the diverse legal and other traditions brought together to constitute the CRP gave it dimensions that fall outside the purview of the formal justice sector.

158. The CRP was able to finalise a far greater number of cases than would have been possible if the same amount of resources and time had been devoted to the formal justice sector alone. It was also able to focus on repairing community and individual relationships, and tailor sanctions to suit each case.

159. Participants often expressed their appreciation that the CRP hearings were held in their home communities. Victims and community members had an opportunity to participate in a full sense. By contrast, court hearings are usually held in major centres and villagers who attend court hearings face formidable economic, logistical and psychological obstacles. The participation of the general community and the role of traditional leaders, church leaders and other respected persons, also added a strong sense of ownership to the CRP. Agreements reached had the force of all of these respected local institutions behind them as well as that of the law.

160. In a court hearing, victims may or may not give testimony, and if they do, they have to limit themselves to what they experienced. They are unable to express opinions or to address the perpetrators directly and tell them how they have suffered as a result of their actions, ask them to clarify questions, or explain why they committed the crimes. Feelings of remorse have no bearing on the guilt or innocence of the accused, only on the severity of sentence. Whether a victim is satisfied with a perpetrator's explanation, or if they accept or forgive the perpetrator is irrelevant. Only lawyers are allowed to ask questions of witnesses and community members, who may know the context well, are prohibited from speaking. In CRP, however, all of these factors were a normal part of the procedure.

161. Participation in formal justice mechanisms is often a humiliating procedure for victims. They must give evidence alone, may be closely questioned or cross-examined on details of their experience and are forced to relive painful memories. In contrast victims in the CRP hearings were afforded a place of honour. They were accompanied by family or friends as well as trained Commission support staff. The victims were able to express their feelings and had a direct role in deciding the fate of perpetrators. Victims interviewed by the Commission reported feeling that their community held them in higher esteem as a result of the CRP.

CRP hearing in Holsa, Maliana, Bobonaro, 30 June 2003

Of the 1,371 deponents who completed CRP hearings over the 18 months of the programme, no two had the same story to tell. The reasons for participating varied greatly, reflecting the many faces of the community tensions that grew out of the political conflicts. While most of those who appeared before their communities spoke of their collaboration with the Indonesian regime and the militias associated with it, the nature of that collaboration was diverse.

The testimonies of the three deponents who participated in a CRP hearing in the village of Holsa, on the edge of the town of Maliana, highlighted clearly the different ways in which people had been drawn into the conflict and the often complex nature of their acceptance back into their communities.

At the beginning of the hearing, which took place at the end of June 2003, certain differences were immediately obvious from the appearance of the deponents. JR, a member of the national police force of Timor-Leste, had arrived wearing his uniform, but after a request from the Regional Commissioner, he changed into his civilian clothes and sat erect at one end of the row of seats reserved for the perpetrators. Next to him sat JM, wearing the lipa (sarong) and long beard, signs that he was an elder. At the far end of the row sat the youngest of the three, G, casually dressed in shirt and jeans.

JR spoke first and in his testimony outlined his reasons for testifying to the CRP. Before the Popular Consultation of 1999 he had served in the Indonesian police (Polri) for many years, and it was his long experience in Polri that had led to his selection for the East Timorese force. He was finding, however, that because of his past people found it hard to accept him. He was regularly taunted by the local youth as polisi milisi (a militia policeman) the implication being that as a member of the Indonesian police force, he had been complicit in militia attacks and other violence against the population.

JR described how he had tried during his years of service in the Indonesian police to protect the communities he had worked in. He had warned them of impending military or police operations and deliberately failed to pass on information to his superiors about the location of Falintil fighters and their clandestine supporters. Through his participation in the CRP hearing, JR was hoping to clear his name as a collaborator and become a respected police officer.

The next to testify was JM. He said that he was a member of the lisan community and that was the reason that he had been targeted by a local militia group, Dadurus Merah Putih (DMP). He described how one evening in May 1999 two armed men had taken him from his house to the house of the local DMP commander. He was told that he must perform lisan rituals for the militia the next morning at seven o'clock.

JM's protests were ignored, and the next day he went to attend the ceremony, together with a local nun who had also been forced into coming. He performed the rituals that the militia told them to. These included administering a "blood oath" to bind the militia members to their leaders. JM described the loss of status he suffered as a lisan elder as a result of performing sacred rituals for the militia, but protested that he had had no choice but to comply with their demands. He hoped that by explaining his actions to the CRP, he would be accepted back by the local lisan community.

The final testimony of the day came from G. He described how, in April 1999, he and his friends had been summoned by the local battalion commander to attend a roll-call at the military post. During the roll-call, they were told that they were going to take part in a military operation. They left after the roll-call was finished, and proceeded to the nearby village of Raimaten where they were instructed to burn two houses. Another man, who was still living in West Timor at the time of the hearing, carried out the burnings. After house-burnings some members of the group, including the deputy commander of the local TNI battalion, stole property belonging to other villagers. G described how the commanders of the operation did not consider him and his friends "fierce" enough to join in the burning and looting. He was able to identify all of those who had ordered and co-ordinated the action. Community members were aware that the alleged perpetrators had all gone to West Timor after the referendum and not returned. G wanted to resolve suspicions in the community that he had been actively involved in the theft of property and the destruction of the two houses. He answered all questions from victims and others and satisfied them of the truth of his explanation.

The three deponents, although from different backgrounds and with different reasons for participating in the CRP, all expressed satisfaction with the outcome of the hearing. The owner of the burnt houses accepted G's version of events. JM's account of the circumstances in which he had been forced to carry out lisan ceremonies for the militia allowed the other lisan leaders present to understand why he had acted as he had, and to forgive him.

On the day of the hearing it was unclear whether the community had found JR's account of his true role as a member of the Indonesian police persuasive. However, in an interview with Commission staff several months later, he said that he felt that community attitudes towards him had changed for the better since the CRP hearing.

Reflections

Conclusion

162. The CRP programme was devised to address the need to reunite communities that the political conflicts had divided. As there was no precedent for this kind of programme, the prospects for its success were uncertain at the time the Regulation was passed.

163. Implementing the programme posed logistical, administrative, educational, political and legal challenges. These challenges ranged from reaching some of the remotest villages in the country, to establishing working relationships with the OGP and the courts, to attracting the support of local leaders and community members, to handling emotionally charged disputes between perpetrators and victims. All of these challenges were met, through a great deal of hard work and dedication on the part of the staff, advisors and Commissioners of the CAVR.

164. In addition to the large number of individuals who were successfully reintegrated into their communities, the CRP produced a number of other benefits. It created a mechanism for communities to explore their own part in the history of the conflict and to clarify the role of individual perpetrators and victims in these events.

- It gave communities an opportunity to celebrate an end to hostility and division, and symbolically close the conflict.
- It trained a number of East Timorese, from every district, in the principles and practice of mediation and arbitration, and offered a model of peaceful dispute resolution to tens of thousands of participants.
- It reinforced the value of the rule of law, and contributed to the fight against impunity by resolving a significant number of cases that could not realistically have been dealt with through the formal justice system.
- It helped the formal justice system to find its feet in the vulnerable period of its infancy by relieving it of the burden of having to deal with a significant number of outstanding cases.
- Together with other, complementary programmes, it encouraged a general attitude of support for forgiveness and reconciliation among community members.
- It sent a clear message to East Timorese refugees in West Timor that if they returned to Timor-Leste, a specific mechanism was in place which would assist them to reintegrate, and that communities strongly supported this non-violent approach to settling past differences.

Unfinished business

165. The Commission recognises that transitional justice mechanisms established following massive violence and upheaval can never hope to provide closure for all the crimes and human rights violations committed. Timor-Leste, through the work of the SCU and CAVR, has been more successful in finding effective responses than many other countries facing similar situations. However, the substantial body of cases that have not been processed in any way at all remains an obstacle to reconciliation in Timor-Leste.

166. From the initial planning phase of the CRP the Steering Committee recognised that the Commission could not deal with all cases of "less serious crimes" committed between April 1974 and October 1999. It set itself the more modest objectives of finalising a significant proportion of these cases and thereby making a contribution to reconciliation, dispelling some of the anger that permeated life in many communities and averting revenge attacks.

167. The programme achieved these goals but, having done so, created the new expectation that everyone who wanted to take part in a CRP would have an opportunity to apply. This clearly was not possible within the time the Commission had to complete its work. Despite a target of approximately 1,000 individual cases, and the actual completion of almost 1,400, the CRP Division estimated that at least 3,000 additional perpetrators could have participated in a CRP had the programme been able to continue. Communities were disappointed that so many cases that could have been dealt with through the CRP had not been, and were overwhelmingly in favour of extending the programme or replacing it with something similar.

168. Another area of unfinished business was the more than 100 cases that the OGP had retained. The OGP had decided to hold these cases for further investigation because evidence indicating involvement in a serious crime had arisen either in the OGP's own files, in a deponent's statement or during a hearing.*

169. The Serious Crimes Unit has continued to struggle with a larger caseload than it can manage and, as of the date of publication of this Report, the OGP had not proceeded with any of the CRP deponent statements that it had decided to retain. If the OGP eventually finds no grounds for proceeding with these cases, their diversion will have deprived perpetrators who had been willing to participate in a CRP of an opportunity to settle issues from their past with their communities, or to provide additional information clarifying their involvement.

170. The under-resourcing of the SCU has had broader repercussions on the work of the CRP. The SCU has limited its investigations and prosecutions to crimes committed in 1999. At the time of writing it has completed less than half of the cases of serious crimes reported and is expected to cease its operations in May 2005.† This has resulted in a situation in which the vast majority of human rights violations committed during the whole period of the political conflicts have yet to be dealt with in any fashion. The fact that many perpetrators have voluntarily participated in the painful and often humiliating experience of a CRP hearing, while those guilty of more serious crimes seem unlikely ever to be held to account, has produced a situation of unequal accountability and a perceived justice deficit. This imbalance and the institutional factors that underlie it must be addressed when considering future strategies and needs in the area of reconciliation and justice.

The future of the CRP

171. The success of the CRP programme has generated much debate about whether the programme should continue, either in its existing or in some other format. At the time that CRP was designed, it was unclear whether communities would find it acceptable. The results clearly show that communities throughout Timor-Leste found the CRP to be extremely valuable and, as mentioned, at the end of the operational period there was a high level of unsatisfied demand for the process.

172. On 7 July 2004, the Commission hosted a one-day workshop entitled "Resolving the Past to Embrace the Future". The workshop identified what needs to be done to foster reconciliation in the future. Participants in the workshop included members of the National Parliament, judges, lawyers, representatives of local and international NGOs and civil society groups, as well as the CAVR's National Commissioners.

* If such evidence was presented during a hearing, the Regulation required that the hearing be adjourned, and the case be referred back to the OGP (Regulation, s 27.5).

† As preparations were being made for the delivery of this Final Report to the President of Timor Leste in July 2005, the United Nations placed a moratorium on the closure of the Serious Crimes Unit, pending consideration of the report of the Commission of Experts. (Note: the Report was delivered in October 2005 after the Parliament extended the deadline. Ed)

173. The main conclusions and recommendations of the workshop were:

- The process of community-based reconciliation should continue. Any successor to the CRP should also focus on the resolution of lesser crimes and have among its fundamental objectives the restoration and repair of community relations.
- The CRP has served as a model for reintegration of community members who committed "harmful acts" in 1999. Demand for the service that the CRP provided for this group will continue to be strong, coming from perpetrators who have already returned to Timor-Leste as well as those who have yet to return. The workshop recommended that cases arising from events that occurred in 1999 should be dealt with separately from those that occurred between 1974 and 1998.
- The government should create an independent institution to facilitate the community reconciliation processes post-CAVR. The institution that undertakes this work should do so within a framework of clearly defined objectives and responsibilities. It was generally agreed that the systems and modus operandi of the CRP provided a model for how its successor could be implemented.
- Any subsequent community reconciliation initiatives should retain the relationship between the customary and the formal justice systems.[43]

174. It is clear that grassroots demand for the continuation of the CRP is strong and that there is a determination in many sectors of East Timorese society that that demand should be met. The main obstacles to doing so are largely institutional. They include finding an appropriate institutional home where the work of the CRP can be carried on, and reformulating the relationship between this successor institution and the formal justice system at a time when the future of "serious crimes" prosecutions is uncertain. The Commission's own recommendations in this area are contained in Vol. IV, Part 11: Recommendations.

Acolhimento and Victim Support

Part 10. Acolhimento and Victim Support

10 Acolhimento and Victim Support

Introduction

1. This part reports on the programmes of the Commission's Acolhimento and Victim Support Division. As its name suggests, this division worked to fulfil two central, but quite different, functions of the Commission. Both functions cut across all aspects of the Commission's mandate in that both acolhimento and the support of the victims of human rights violations were core principles of all the Commission's programmes.

2. The importance of acolhimento to the Commission's work is reflected by its inclusion as the first of the three guiding principles mentioned in the name of the Comissão de Acolhimento, Verdade e Reconciliação de Timor-Leste. Unlike truth and reconciliation, acolhimento is not directly mentioned in Regulation 10/2001. Unlike reconciliation, victim support and truth-seeking, it was not an explicit function of the Commission, but something both less tangible and more far-reaching. Acolhimento was the spirit that informed all aspects of the Commission's work. It became the centrepiece of the Commission's work out of recognition of the importance of Timorese people accepting each other after so many years of division and conflict. Most immediately it was a response to the situation of East Timorese who had gone to West Timor in 1999, those who had returned to Timor-Leste as well as those who remained in camps and settlements in West Timor. Two specific programmes were developed in response to their needs:

- A monitoring and information programme for recent returnees
- An outreach programme, implemented with NGOs in West Timor, to those East Timorese still living across the border.

3. Victim support, by contrast, was an objective of the Commission that was specifically spelt out in Regulation 10/2001. Section 3 of the regulation provided that the Commission was to "help restore the dignity of victims of human rights violations". The regulation did not, however, prescribe how the Commission should go about achieving this objective.

4. Like acolhimento, the principle of supporting victims of human rights violations was integral to the way the Commission worked in carrying out its other functions of truth-seeking, reconciliation and producing its Final Report. Helping individuals and communities who had suffered to recover, and restoring their sense of dignity, was inseparable from the task of repairing relationships damaged by conflict and of building lasting reconciliation. The Commission was to be the voice of the victims, who had for so long been unable to express the suffering that they had experienced, and to make a practical contribution to their healing.

5. The Acolhimento and Victim Support Division also carried out specific programmes. These included:

- Public Hearings at both the national and sub-district level
- A series of Healing Workshops at the Commission's national headquarters
- An Urgent Reparations scheme for victims with urgent needs
- Village-level participatory workshops, called Community Profile workshops, to discuss and record the impact of the conflict on communities.

Structure of the Unit

6. The Acolhimento and Victim Support Division was based in Dili. The national office of the Commission coordinated all the Acolhimento programmes. Although Regional Commissioners sometimes made visits to villages where recent returnees lived, or to camps in West Timor, most of the work was managed from the national office.

7. Victim support work, however, relied on staff in the districts to implement the programme at the district level. It was fundamental to the work of supporting victims to reach out to all communities in Timor-Leste. This was particularly important in the rural areas, where many communities are isolated and where those who suffered violations during the conflicts may now feel forgotten by those at the national level. District teams were made up of people from the local area. Two members of each team, one man and one woman, were responsible for outreach and district support.

8. The structure and responsibilities of the Acolhimento and Victim Support Unit are described in detail in Volume 1, Part 1: Introduction.

Interpretation

Acolhimento

9. National Commissioners did not try to reduce acolhimento to a single concept. It was both part of the spirit of the Commission's approach to its work and the spirit it hoped to foster in the community. Acolhimento involved people embracing each other as Timorese, of coming back to our selves, living under one roof, after many years of division and violence.

10. The concept therefore had meaning for our Timorese brothers and sisters who remained in Indonesia after the exodus of 1999, and to those who fled in 1975 or later and lived in exile in countries around the world. But it had a wider resonance for all of us, whether we left Timor-Leste or stayed. Twenty-four years of conflict dispersed Timorese people across the world, divided families and communities, and created divisions even within individuals. Acolhimento represented something of the spirit of respectful acceptance of each other and ourselves as human beings, as people responsible to ourselves and to each other. Acolhimento is a precondition for both having the courage to speak, and for hearing the truth and seeking reconciliation.

11. Acolhimento grows from an appreciation and celebration of our rich cultural heritage. This heritage includes our traditional culture that was suppressed for so many years, as well as our experiences of colonialism, war and occupation. It is a way to help us accept the many dimensions of being Timorese, living with what we have been through, and creating a society that includes all of us, even those who have done wrong in the past. In this sense, the behaviour of the father in the Biblical parable of the prodigal son is a demonstration of the spirit of acolhimento.

12. While in English the Commission was called the Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation, it is the view of the Commission that the word "reception" does not adequately reflect all that we mean by "acolhimento". For that reason, "acolhimento" rather than "reception" will be used throughout this part.

13. Regulation 10/2001 defines "victim" as:

> a person who, individually or as part of a collective, has suffered harm, including physical or mental injury, emotional suffering, economic loss or substantial impairment of his or her rights as a result of acts or omissions over which the Commission has jurisdiction to consider and includes the relatives or dependents of persons who have individually suffered harm. [Section 1]

14. Victims of human rights violations committed by all sides to the conflict were recognised by the Commission. They included Timorese civilians who suffered at the hands of different Timorese political parties in the civil conflict of 1975, Timorese who suffered from violations by the Indonesian military and its various auxiliaries, and those who suffered violations committed by members of Fretilin or Falintil after the Indonesian invasion.

15. The Commission also sought to honour those who had died as a result of the conflicts, and to offer support to their families and communities. A huge number of people died in Timor-Leste over the 25 years of the Commission's mandate, both as a result of the war-related population displacements, bombardments and starvation, and as a result of more targeted violence. In such a context, the risk that the individuals who died will be submerged in global statistics is real. Recognising the dead by identifying and honouring them was an important part of the Commission's work. The limited time and resources available to the Commission has meant that it is an undertaking on which much more remains to be done.

* The Commission acknowledges the debate around the use of the term "victim" which can denote passive victimisation, as opposed to the more empowering term "survivor". The Commission has chosen to use the term victim, partly for linguistic consistency between the three languages of the Final Report, and partly because it is of the view that many Timorese were victims in their experience of the political conflicts in Timor-Leste. Many Timorese did not survive. As this Part describes programmes for empowering those who have survived, the term "survivor" has also been used interchangeably here.

Acolhimento

Acolhimento is an unusual element to include in a truth and reconciliation commission. It is the process of wholehearted welcoming, accepting and showing unreserved hospitality in Timorese culture. This formal courtesy is given to all human beings, even to those who have caused harm. It is noble behaviour in the face of being hurt or feeling anger. It creates space for both parties to change. It is the basis for understanding, for saying sorry and seeking forgiveness.

The Timorese sense of acolhimento comes partly from Luke 15: 11-32, the story of a wealthy father and his two sons. The younger son leaves home, taking his share of his father's wealth, which he squanders. Impoverished and feeling remorse, he decides to return home. He is prepared to beg for mercy. As an unworthy son, he thinks he deserves treatment as a servant in his father's house. Seeing his son at a distance, the father has true compassion. He runs to embrace him and welcomes him home with extravagance, without blame or judgement. The older son witnessing this is hurt by his father's manner. Feeling resentment, he challenges his father. The father replies, "Son, you are always with me. All I have is yours. We should make merry and be glad as your brother was dead but is alive, was lost and is found." The parable teaches that reconciliation can be more difficult if one feels wronged than if one is in the wrong, seeking forgiveness.

Toward reconciliation and stopping the cycle of hate

Communities can be strengthened in the spirit of acolhimento by making connections and providing a space for justice and reconciliation. This is a long and complicated process. It needs truthfulness, admissions of wrongdoing and efforts to put things right by mutual agreement. Only then, can there be the possibility of forgiveness and the restoration of balance in community relationships.

The perpetrators of human rights abuses in Timor-Leste since 1974 who are prepared to admit their crimes and who wish to seek mercy from their communities can find reconciliation through an established process. Some do want to return to their families, to their land, and to their communities to help rebuild Timor-Leste. Violence diminishes the perpetrator. In a quest to return to live together again, truth-saying is part of the path to personal recovery and to community justice.

People in communities who experienced deprivation and who faced a long struggle to survive need healing. Violence wounds the body and also harms the spirit. It is possible with time to recover. People need to express their true losses and to be heard. But forgiveness is not forgetting or giving amnesty. People become free as the truth is told, and from a mutual resolve that things can be better. This takes time and effort on both sides.

East Timorese in West Timor

A truth commission was proposed in late 1999. One third of the population of Timor-Leste had been driven into West Timor, Indonesia. There were serious concerns for the safety and early return of these people. In the three months after October 1999, about 100,000 people returned spontaneously, and since then a further 120,000 have come. About 30,000 East Timorese remain in West Timor. If they were free of intimidation, negative propaganda and the effects of five years' privation as refugees maybe they would return to Timor-Leste. Many are ordinary people, missing their family and friends, and missed by their communities.

The process and practice of forgiveness

The return and reintegration of militia, ex-TNI and pro-autonomy supporters is a serious challenge. Perhaps less of a challenge is the case of the civil servants from the 1974-1999 period. Some may want to remain in Indonesia; others may want to return. The East Timorese government has said that the welcome of acolhimento can be extended to those who decide to return while the process of truth and reconciliation occurs. Many groups and communities have worked hard for the peaceful reintegration of returnees from West Timor. This is a tribute to their strength and patience.

The Commission has sought to mediate the return of perpetrators of minor crimes to their communities through the formal community reconciliation process, which allows the parties to interact, discuss and seek to resolve outstanding issues and concerns. The spirit of acolhimento has informed the design of this mediation process, combining it with the East Timorese tradition of lisan[*], restorative compensation as a part of social responsibility. Over 1,400 returnees have submitted to this healing process, which was monitored by the Commission's District Teams and by local authorities to forestall problems experienced by recent returnees. With time, too, survivors can have understanding and regain confidence on their path to forgiveness.

However, those guilty of serious crimes have to accept the requirements of legal justice in the East Timorese Courts as mandated by the Constitution. Survivors must wait for justice in these cases.

The challenge for individuals, families and communities, indeed for the nation of Timor-Leste, is to accept the process of re-establishing trust in relationships, to live well together, and to work to create a just society.

Reception and outreach

Background

16. In addition to its programmes for community reconciliation, truth-seeking and victim support, the Commission also established a programme called Acolhimento. The Acolhimento programme was created to respond to the situation of East Timorese who had moved or been moved to West Timor in 1999, both those who had returned to Timor-Leste and those still living over the border. East Timorese began crossing into West Timor as early as April 1999, settling in camps and settlements in Belu District, which borders Timor-Leste. However, by far the largest influx of refugees into West Timor occurred in the early weeks of September 1999 after the announcement of the result of the Popular Consultation. Most of these refugees were forcibly evacuated by armed militia and Indonesian troops. The approximately 250,000 refugees who fled or were forcibly evacuated to West Timor were accommodated in several large refugee camps, such as Noelbaki, Tuapukan and Naibonat in Kupang, two camps in Kefamenanu as well as about 200 other smaller camps or shelters.[1] They represented about one third of Timor-Leste's population at the time. Indonesian soldiers and East Timorese militia tightly controlled the refugees' movement in and out of these camps, as well as their access to humanitarian aid.

* Lisan is a combination of beliefs, customs and traditions of East Timorese people. Lisan varies from community to community and is generally an important aspect of community life, especially in rural areas. It is often referred to as "adat" in the Indonesian language.

17. Refugees returned from West Timor in two main phases. In the first, a three-month period after October 1999, over 100,000 people poured back into Timor-Leste. Then, over the next three years, another 120,000 refugees returned in smaller groups.[2] Returnees came back to an uncertain reception in their communities. Many had been supporters of integration before the Popular Consultation and some had been active members of the militia in their communities. Some found that their land and property had been taken over for use by other families. How to minimise conflict between returnees and their communities featured prominently in the Steering Committee's discussions as it went about its task of designing the Commission's mandate (see Volume I, Part 1.2: Background to the Creation of the Commission, for more detail).

18. Despite the large numbers of refugees who returned home, many remained in Indonesia. In February 2002 when the Commission was established, there were more than 60,000 refugees still in West Timor. On 31 December 2002, all remaining refugees were formally declared residents of West Timor and lost their status as refugees. There were still between 25,000 and 30,000 East Timorese in over 150 locations throughout West Timor at that time. UNHCR estimates put the number remaining in West Timor, as of 30 November 2004, at about 25,000.

19. Life is not easy for most of these people. Many live in sub-standard conditions. Most survive through subsistence farming or by running small stalls selling agricultural produce and essential goods, such as cooking oil, soap, salt and sugar.

20. Further, local communities in West Timor often resent their presence. East Timorese sometimes farm with the permission of local residents, sometimes without. In some areas, East Timorese have encroached on forested land, which has placed a strain on both the dry West Timor environment and on relations between the newcomers and local communities. Where East Timorese in West Timor have prospered economically, there have also been instances of local jealousy. Finally, the refugees themselves include former militia indicted for serious violent crimes.

21. However hard the refugees' lives and however unwelcome they may be in West Timor there are many reasons for them not to come home. Those with a pro-autonomy background fear political and economic discrimination, not being accepted back into their village communities, and prosecution. Those with government positions enjoy relative economic security in Indonesia. Many lack confidence in the economic future of Timor-Leste. Moreover, for those in the camps and settlements, the decision to stay is sometimes not theirs to take. Rather a group or camp leader, who has his own reasons for deciding to remain, makes it for them. Importantly from the Commission's point of view, many refugees do not have access to clear or accurate information about the true situation in Timor-Leste.

22. The fact that so many East Timorese are still in West Timor is one indication that the divisions surrounding the political conflicts endure. The Commission, as an institution for acolhimento, was concerned with reaching across this divide to help create the conditions for East Timorese people from all political sides to accept each other. Therefore the West Timor programme focused on information, dialogue and creating better understanding.

Monitoring recent returnees

23. Under its monitoring programme, Commission staff met recent returnees to monitor their situation, provide information about the community reconciliation process, and bring matters raised by returnees to the attention of local authorities, Regional Commissioners and Commission staff in the districts, as well as UN agencies, such us UNHCR and IOM (International Organisation for Migration).

24. During 2003, staff made 20 visits to returnee transit centres run by UNHCR and IOM: 19 to the centre at Batugade in Bobonaro, and one to the Ambeno centre in Oecussi. Commission staff also visited 33 villages in seven districts where returnees had recently arrived from West Timor.

25. Monitoring was not a high-profile programme. Rather it took the form of low-key visits to returnees and their families to see how they had been received and whether they felt that they had reintegrated into their communities. Commission staff also visited village heads and other community leaders to check, informally, whether the return of refugees had created any problems in their communities.

26. Liaison work with UNHCR and IOM was mainly to coordinate visits to returnees and to share information about returnees' needs. UNHCR and IOM advised the Commission if they were giving support to cross-border initiatives that the Commission could participate in, including presidential and other official visits.

27. Many returnees came back with mixed feelings of alienation, disempowerment and trauma, as well as uncertainty about their economic survival and social status. When they arrived, they found a Timor-Leste that was strange to them in many respects, whose legal, government and economic systems, for example, were unfamiliar.

28. The Commission noted that most returnees were well-received by their communities. In some villages the population helped the returnees to build temporary shelters, or provided accommodation to those in need. Returnees enjoyed access to communal resources such as water, health clinics and schools. Returnees could also compete for jobs in the districts, as teachers, nurses, police and military.

29. In some cases returning ex-militia leaders were received with harsh words from the young people in their communities. However, in most cases, local police were quick to take control of the situation and regularly patrolled areas where there were recent returnees to prevent violence. Often conflict between returnees and the local population arose, not because of recent political differences but due to long-standing family or clan disputes over land or other supposed breaches of traditional law.

30. The greatest challenge facing the returnees was that of making a living. Many had lost assets during the violence in 1999 and were not able to recoup their losses during the years they spent in the refugee camps. Disputes over land and property were often a major issue. Some returnees had been civil servants during the Indonesian occupation and had received a monthly wage. On their return to Timor-Leste they found that others had already taken up most of the limited employment opportunities in the districts. They and their families frequently had to relearn the skills of subsistence agriculture. Consequently, many returnees chose to rebuild their lives away from their home village, moving to Dili or other urban centres in search of other ways to meet their daily needs.

31. For single women and their children, daily survival was more difficult. In some cases, women and children returned to Timor-Leste in poor health caused by long-term malnourishment in the camps. On their return, they had to plant and wait for the next harvest in order to feed themselves. Although local authorities, UN agencies and NGOs gave special attention to these families, there were some who slipped through the net of support.

32. The Commission is aware of a small number of returnees who eventually chose to go back to West Timor. This occurred, for example, in the villages of Lauala (Ermera, Ermera), Leimea (Hatolia, Ermera), Maubara (Maubara, Liquiçá) and Balibó town (Balibó, Bobonaro). The Commission visited these villages and found that returnees had decided to go back to West Timor for different reasons. In some cases, the returnee still had immediate family members living in West Timor. In other cases, the returnees were ex-militia leaders who had not yet had an opportunity to be part of a community reconciliation process and had experienced intimidation or minor assault by the local population.

Accompanying returnees home

Commission staff, in conjunction with UNHCR and IOM, accompanied a number of returnees on their journey home. Usually these were returnees who were seen as vulnerable in some way and were accompanied to decrease their anxiety. The following are just three examples from the months of May-June 2003:

On 29 May 2003 Commission staff accompanied a woman and her children to Laga, Baucau. Her husband, who was a Milsas (a member of Hansip trained to become a soldier) attached to the sub-district military command in Kupang (West Timor), came on this visit on his Indonesian passport. He wanted to bring his family home and then return to West Timor. When they arrived in Laga, the family was greeted warmly and the local population helped unload their belongings.

On 10 June 2003 a 19-year-old man returned home to Leopa (Dato, Liquiçá), by himself. Commission staff accompanied him to his house, where his parents received him warmly.

On 12 June 2003 Commission staff accompanied a 34-year-old man and his five-year-old son to his village in Aidabaleten (Atabae, Bobonaro). He had been a member of the militia group, Harmoni, but although he had taken part in patrols he had not committed any crimes. He had visited his family six times before deciding to return permanently. His family and the local population received him well and helped him unload the IOM truck carrying his belongings.

Reflection on monitoring programme

33. Timorese communities have shown acceptance and a willingness to receive returnees. However, this should not be taken for granted. A significant number of East Timorese still in West Timor may choose to return in the coming years. In addition, it is likely that for some of those who have already returned they will encounter difficulties in fully reintegrating into their communities. The strong demand that community reconciliation hearings should continue indicates that there remain many unresolved issues at the local level, including ones concerning those who have returned since 1999.

34. It is important to continue monitoring the situation of new returnees and to work with communities to provide support as required. This may involve civil society, NGOs and various government agencies. The need to monitor the reintegration of returnees and to be alert to potential conflicts arising from their return is addressed in Vol 4, Part 11: Recommendations.

Outreach to West Timor

35. The Commission was not designed to help repatriate the East Timorese in West Timor. Nevertheless, the tasks of promoting acolhimento and reconciliation provided it with a strong justification for reaching out to refugees and informing them about the Commission and the situation in Timor-Leste. As an independent national institution, the Commission wanted to demonstrate to the remaining refugees that the new nation of Timor-Leste was serious in its commitment to build an inclusive society based on rule of law and the universal principles of human rights. It was also considered important to give the East Timorese in West Timor an opportunity to participate in the truth-seeking programme by giving their statements to the Commission.

36. In late 2002 the Commission conceived and designed its West Timor programme. It began to implement it in early 2003. For reasons of efficiency and security and because its mandate was only in Timor-Leste, the Commission decided to work through Indonesian NGOs that were already engaged with the refugee communities in West Timor.

The West Timor outreach programme

37. The Commission's West Timor programme had four main objectives:

1. To increase awareness and understanding of the Commission's mandate among refugees and community leaders.
2. To facilitate the dissemination of information on the Commission's activities in its two main tasks of truth-seeking and community reconciliation.
3. To ensure that the Commission listened to East Timorese from all sides of the political conflict in the preparation of its Final Report.
4. To share with East Timorese refugees in West Timor the message that Timor-Leste is serious about healing past divisions, and normalising personal and community life based on the principles of inclusiveness and respect for human rights.

38. The Commission's West Timor programme mainly involved disseminating information to refugees about the community reconciliation process and engaging them in truth-seeking. In respect to the reconciliation work, the aim was not to conduct reconciliation procedures in West Timor. Rather it was to ensure that communities, including perpetrators of less serious offences, understood how the Commission could help reintegrate people into their home communities if they chose to return to Timor-Leste.

39. The objective of offering people the opportunity to give their statements was to gather information that was both accurate and important for the Commission's truth-seeking work. The Commission wanted to be sure that it had listened to the stories of people from all sides of the political conflict. By acknowledging that East Timorese in West Timor were also heard, it hoped to contribute to their personal healing process.

40. The programme targeted specific groups within the communities in West Timor. These included pro-autonomy political and former militia leaders, individuals and groups who had not yet made their decision on whether to return, women as the group most likely to be unable to make a free choice about repatriation, and those who had chosen to stay in West Timor but who had experience or knowledge of human rights violations to share with the Commission.

Programme implementation

41. In January 2003, the Commission invited five West Timor NGOs to its Dili headquarters to plan a programme based on the four objectives outlined above. Each of the NGOs had experience working with East Timorese refugees in West Timor. They were:

- CIS (Center for Internally Displaced Persons Service)
- Truk-F (Tim Relawan Untuk Kemanusiaan Flores), Flores Volunteer Team for Humanity
- Lakmas (Lembaga Advokasi anti-Kekerasan terhadap Masyarakat Sipil), Institute for Advocacy to eliminate Violence against Civilians.

- Yabiku (Yayasan Amnaut Bife 'Kuan'), Village Women's Care Foundation
- YPI (Yayasan Peduli Indonesia) Indonesian Care Foundation.

42. With support from PIKUL (Foundation for Strengthening Local Institutions and Capacities) and CRS (Catholic Relief Services), these five NGOs formed a coalition to carry out its work with the Commission.

43. The Coalition divided into four teams, each of which was to work in one district of West Timor. Three of the four teams worked in the districts where they had long-standing relationships with refugees. CIS worked in Kupang, Lakmas and Yabiku in Kefamenanu (North Central Timor District), and YPI in Atambua (Belu District). These organisations had already gained the trust and respect of people in their districts, which proved useful in building support for the Commission's West Timor programme. The fourth team relocated from Kupang to Soe (South Central Timor District), and was quickly able to establish relations with key figures in the refugee community.

44. Representatives of the NGO Coalition came to Timor-Leste in February 2003 for a two-week orientation programme. The programme included briefing and planning sessions with National Commissioners and Commission staff, and developing an understanding of background, mandate and organisation of the Commission. Training was also provided in areas such as human rights and transitional justice, and in specific skills such as statement taking. The group made field trips to districts in Timor-Leste to observe Commission district teams working in communities. It also attended the Commission's first national thematic hearing, on political imprisonment.

45. A five-month work plan was then developed with the Commission that ensured that all refugee communities in West Timor would have an opportunity to learn about the Commission and participate in the statement-taking process.

46. Once the programme started, National and Regional Commissioners made monthly visits to West Timor to monitor the Coalition's progress, to help with any problems and to contribute to the public information process. The Coalition noted in its final report to the Commission that "the Commissioners' visits were like a locomotive that drew refugees to attend focus-group discussions". The first monitoring visit, at the end of March 2003, was also used to launch the programme and publicise its objectives. Commissioners met leaders of the provincial government and the church, NGOs and the media in order to build support for the programme's activities. A written recommendation from the governor of the province of Nusa Tenggara Timur was particularly helpful to the Coalition in gaining access to camps and obtaining the cooperation of police and military in providing security.

Informing the refugee community about the Commission

47. The first aim of the programme was to share information with refugee communities about what the Commission was, and how it might be relevant to them.

48. The two primary methods used to inform refugees about the Commission's work were direct discussions with refugees and their leaders (see Table 2 below, following par. 49) and dissemination of information through the press, radio and videos. To build relationships and trust, the Coalition teams made private visits to refugee leaders and camp coordinators, before holding community meetings. National and Regional Commissioners and CAVR staff also visited camps and met former militia commanders and pro-autonomy political leaders.

49. Fifteen episodes of the Commission's radio programme, Dalan ba Dame (The Road to Peace), were broadcast by a Kupang radio station. West Timor radio also broadcast dialogues featuring Commissioners and various figures known to the refugees, such as members of the Coalition, a West Timorese priest and refugee leaders. Films made by the Commission, including an introduction to the Commission entitled Dalan Ba Dame (The Road to Peace)' video recordings of community-based reconciliation meetings and several of the Commission's National Public Hearings, provided an appealing way for refugees to learn about the Commission's work. For example, the films of local village reconciliation hearings gave the refugees the chance to see scenes of their home districts or even their villages. The videos showed how communities were working to achieve reconciliation. Film and radio were especially important in reaching the refugee audience, given the generally limited level of literacy.

50. Printed material distributed in the four targeted regions included Commission bulletins, posters, magazines, pamphlets about the community reconciliation process, Commission t-shirts and a special pamphlet produced jointly by the Commission and the West Timor NGO Coalition.

Taking statements

51. Taking statements on human rights violations proved difficult for all the West Timor teams. In the first months of their work, no teams took statements, but instead focused on developing relationships in the refugee communities, explaining the mandate of the Commission and the ways that people could participate in its work. In this way people could decide if they wanted to give a statement.

52. The team set a modest target of taking 272 statements, more or less consistent with the target in Timor-Leste where statements were also to be taken from about 1% of the community. In the end only 90 statements were taken. There were a number of reasons for this outcome but, above all, it reflected the caution displayed by people in refugee communities in dealing with the NGO Coalition and the Commission. This is discussed further in the next section, Refugee responses (par. 55-73).

53. Table 3 shows that the team in Soe, in South Central Timor District, took the most statements. Interestingly, 12 of these statements were taken in the Soe district military headquarters, from East Timorese refugees working with the military. The team in Atambua (Belu), which is close to the border with Timor-Leste and has the highest concentration of refugees, took the next highest number of statements.

54. While the number of statements taken was low, it was important that the Commission gave the refugees an opportunity to give statements. Moreover, the content of the statements was an important contribution to the Commission's truth-seeking work.

Refugee responses

55. Many of the refugees were eager to know about recent developments in Timor-Leste, particularly the Commission's community-based reconciliation work. However, the overwhelming response to the West Timor programme was one of caution. In a few cases, Coalition members were refused access to camps. In other cases refugees did not participate in discussion groups when given the opportunity.

56. The NGO Coalition found that in their responses to the Commission's work in West Timor the refugees fell into three broad groups: the majority who remained silent; those who gave enthusiastic or guarded support to the Commission; and those who rejected the NGO Coalition and the Commission. This section includes quotations from responses from East Timorese people in West Timor, as documented in the NGO Coalition Activity Report, 13 February to 23 July 2003.[3]

57. Most refugees were silent. Some had definite views about reconciliation, but because the issue had become politicised, they chose to remain silent. Others, "the floating mass", did not have a position of their own but took their lead from the small elite in control of the power structures within the camps. To protect the personal safety of refugees, the NGO Coalition was careful not to pressure people to ask questions or give their opinions. The primary objective of the outreach programme was to inform.

58. Some refugees were proud that Timor Leste had achieved independence. A man from Maubisse (Ainaro) commented:

> We greatly value what our brothers have shared and greatly respect the Commission. This can honestly be said to be seeking the truth. We also struggled for the people of Timor-Leste although our opinions are different. Now that Timor-Leste is independent, we hope that over there they feel they themselves have won, that they themselves possess Timor-Leste. Even we pro-autonomy people actually wanted independence, perhaps in 15 years, but our brothers there weren't patient – they wanted independence immediately…We also respect Fretilin. The gift that Fretilin's struggle has given us is that Timor-Leste has become known and has become independent. We must all be proud of their struggle.

59. Among those in the "rejectionist" group were refugees who may once have believed that reconciliation was possible. As a leader in the Naibonat Camp outside Kupang said:

> I am bored hearing about reconciliation. I myself attended such a process in Bali, but what were the results? There were none. We don't know what the final outcome of Commission's reconciliation process will be…but if reconciliation remains only on one's lips, revenge will continue.

60. Others were more hostile. One refugee described the Commission as nothing more than a project to use up money from donors with a hidden agenda, namely to make Timor-Leste their puppet state. He asked how the Commission, with a mandate of only two years, could possibly fully investigate cases of human rights abuses that had occurred over a span of more than 20 years. Others said that they felt that supporting the Commission's programme was tantamount to a betrayal of Indonesia. The Coalition teams noted that some camp coordinators and leaders, although seemingly supportive of the Commission during group discussions, would later say that all the Coalition said was a lie.

61. While Commissioners heard many negative or sceptical comments about the Commission on their visits to West Timor, they also heard some positive ones.

62. Discussions with refugee communities suggested that their preoccupation before independence with the political status of Timor-Leste had been replaced by economic concerns. There was deep scepticism about the country's ability to develop due to limited human resources, inadequate technology, poor infrastructure and heavy dependency on foreign aid. Concern was expressed about the obstacles to repatriation.

63. During their visits to West Timor the Commissioners and Commission staff observed that refugee communities had what amounted to a consistent set of reservations about returning to their homeland. They included:

Fear

64. Many refugees said that they were afraid to return to Timor-Leste because they had heard of visiting or returning refugees being the victims of terror and intimidation, even murder. Some said they would return to Timor-Leste only if their security was guaranteed. Others were afraid to return for fear of prosecution. Those who did not want to give statements also expressed this fear. These people often called for reconciliation based on forgetting the past, a sort of historical amnesia or kore metan massal[*].

Social ostracism

65. Some refugees doubted the sincerity of Timor-Leste's professed commitment to embracing former supporters of Indonesian rule. They had heard that pro-autonomy supporters in Timor-Leste were treated as second- and third-class citizens, suffering discrimination in employment and access to social services. Others felt that the new social hierarchy would greatly disadvantage them. They placed foreigners at the top of this hierarchy, followed by Timorese who had lived in Portugal, and then by the pro-independence elite and other pro-independence supporters, with pro-autonomy supporters at the bottom.

Economic considerations

66. A recurring complaint made during group discussions was the high cost of fees required to enter Timor-Leste, something perhaps more pertinent to refugees contemplating visits rather than repatriation. Those still working as Indonesian civil servants said that as long as they remained in West Timor they would earn enough to educate their children. One man asked: "Why return to Timor-Leste where I have no guarantees of work?" Another concern was the status of former assets. Many said that they were hesitant to return if they could not have their former land and property back. Others voiced concerns about Timor-Leste's dependence on donor countries.

* Kore metan massal is a phrase mixing Tetum and Indonesian languages which was used by some East Timorese in West Timor camps. Kore metan (Tetum) is the ceremony to denote the end of a 12-month mourning period (lifting of the black). Massal (Indonesian) refers to mistakes or wrong-doings. This was a phrase used by some East Timorese people when they talked with the Commission in West Timor.

One refugee from Lospalos (Lautém) in the Tuapukan camp close to Kupang told Commissioners and staff:

> Brothers, you should be giving information about the actual situation in Timor-Leste. Over there life is full of suffering, continual suffering…There, you brothers suffer far more than we do.

67. He continued by addressing the refugees present:

> Probably the white people feel sorry for them and give them money to carry out this [reconciliation] task…Do these brothers want to progress or fall back? For us, life together with the Republic of Indonesia is progress, [not with] these brothers who only come with false promises.

Race

68. Some refugees expressed total rejection of white foreigners, who were seen as the ones really in charge of Timor-Leste. Some said they would not return to Timor-Leste as long as there were whites still residing there.

Political issues

69. Although the sovereignty of Timor-Leste did not dominate group discussions, refugees did express political concerns. Some refugees felt that the use of Portuguese as the language of instruction in schools would put their children at a disadvantage if they returned. Others took the view that unless the three major parties of 1974-1975 – UDT, Fretilin and Apodeti – took responsibility for their actions during that period, reconciliation could not take place. Others insisted that reconciliation had to begin among political leaders before ordinary people could be expected to be reconciled. By focusing on leaders, some refugees sought to absolve themselves of their own responsibility for criminal acts, arguing that they were just "little people" who either knew nothing or had simply carried out orders. A refugee from Baucau in the Tuapukan camp summed it up when he said:

> If the pro-autonomy and pro-independence leaders are united we will definitely return because the things we did in the past were ordered and we little people just carried them out, and it is precisely us who have suffered the most as a result.

70. There was a tendency to see the Commission's truth-seeking mandate as limited to abuses committed in 1999. This was accompanied by demands that history could only be "made straight" if abuses committed in 1974-1975 were also thoroughly investigated.

Women refugees and reconciliation

71. Women were especially constrained in their freedom to engage with the NGO Coalition by the power structures that existed within the camps. The positions women took on reconciliation and repatriation were almost entirely determined by their husbands, fathers and uncles who had brought them to West Timor. They were economically and physically dependent on these male figures, who often both intimidated them and acted as their ultimate protection from other men.

72. Tables 2 and 3 above both indicate that outreach to women was less effective than to men. NGO Coalition teams noted that, even when women attended focus group discussions they seldom spoke or simply agreed with what was said by their husbands or leaders. The NGO Coalition thought that there were several factors explaining women's limited participation. One was Timorese patriarchal culture, in which the woman's role does not extend beyond the family. Reconciliation was seen as a political issue to be dealt with by men. Women also generally had lower levels of education and poorer health than men, as well as often being the victims of physical and psychological abuse.

73. Much work remains to be done in giving women access to information and the capacity to play an active role in the decision on whether to return to Timor-Leste.

Reflection on the programme

74. The six-month West Timor programme in partnership with Indonesian NGOs was an important part of the Commission's work. Within its limited mandate, time and resources the Commission sought to reach out in a practical and meaningful way to East Timorese living in West Timor. The partnerships formed with the West Timorese government and institutions and the goodwill they often demonstrated provide the basis for future work, which should remain a priority for the governments of Timor-Leste and Indonesia, civil society and communities in both countries.

75. The Commission recognises the complexities and sensitivities surrounding the implementation of an outreach programme in West Timor. The caution with which most refugees regarded the Commission's work meant that it was not able to reach its target number of statements. Nevertheless, in the circumstances it was an achievement that many refugees were given an opportunity to tell their story, and learn about the Commission's reconciliation programmes and life in the newly independent Timor-Leste.

76. The Commission's experience in this area shows that achieving reconciliation with refugees in West Timor will require commitment and creative thinking. The complexities of the issues mean that the commitment will have to be over the long term, involving the government of Timor-Leste and non-governmental institutions and organisations, as well as the support of the international community. The Lessons Learned section at the end of this part proposes some principles that should guide this work, and the Commission's recommendations will address these issues in more detail (see Vol. IV, Part 11: Recommendations).

Restoring the dignity of victims

Introduction

77. Violence has damaged individuals, families and communities profoundly. The Commission could not hope to heal the deep wounds wrought over 25 years either quickly or completely, or through any single programme. It therefore developed a multi-faceted programme as a modest, initial contribution to restoring the dignity of victims of human rights violations.

78. Several parts of the Commission's entire programme sought to address the national need for healing. On some levels, all Timorese people and the society as a whole were victims of the political conflicts of 1974-99. Therefore, the initial focus of the Commission's victim support work was to prepare district teams to take a victim-centred approach in their truth-seeking and community-reconciliation work. It was often said that statement-taking was the first step in the healing process the Commission was promoting. District statement-takers were trained to be sensitive to the needs of those giving statements, by, for example, being alert to their need for further support. They also referred vulnerable people to Victim Support team members, who in turn sought to link them to specialist assistance. District reconciliation teams worked closely with their Victim Support team members in preparing and supporting victims who participated in hearings.

79. The Commission also recognised that, without measuring individual suffering, some people's needs were greater than others due to the nature of the violations committed against them. The Commission felt compelled by its mandate and principles to develop specific programmes aimed at those in most urgent need of help.

Public hearings

80. Public hearings offered recognition and healing in a symbolic way. This work began with the taking of a statement from a survivor by a member of a district team. Listening with care and recording their story were the first steps towards help in healing. Some survivors went further by telling their stories at a public hearing. At the national, sub-district and village level, hearings placed victims at the centre of their communities. The community listened to and honoured their stories, acknowledged their suffering, and helped them to feel that they were cared for and that their burden was shared.

Healing workshops

81. Healing workshops engaged with survivors in a deeper way and offered emotional and psychological support. They provided a safe forum for survivors to meet others who had suffered terribly, to share experiences and to lessen the feeling of isolation experienced by so many victims. These workshops were also a way for the Commission to get to know survivors better, and to learn from them about the challenges of their daily lives and the areas in which they need support.

Urgent reparations

82. Urgent Reparations was a scheme developed to address at least some of the urgent needs of victims. The Commission recognised that many survivors continue to suffer today as a result of the disabling impact of the violations committed against them. It is a fundamental human right of victims of violations to receive reparations. As an organisation founded on human rights principles, making some small contribution to realising this right for victims was considered an important part of the Commission's work. Sometimes the disability that needed urgent attention was physical. Sometimes it was psychological and sometimes it was economic. Through the Urgent Reparations Scheme the Commission learned lessons which have informed the wider discussion on the kind of reparations programme that would be appropriate to the East Timorese context. Such a programme can be devised only by taking into account the real needs and expectations of those who are to benefit from it, as well as the capacities of those whose job it will be to deliver it. The outlines of such a programme are set out in Vol 4, Part 11: Recommendations.

Community profiles

83. Community Profiles were a record of the collective experience of a village or sub-village over the 25-year period of the political conflicts. District teams facilitated the workshops and helped create a permanent record of them by collaborating with the communities in writing up their accounts and drawing sketch maps showing the location of key events This process recognised both the depth of community experience of violence and the rich Timorese oral tradition. They were initially created as a research tool in the Commission's truth-seeking work, but were soon acknowledged as valuable occasions for developing community understanding and healing.

84. This variety of approaches ensured that the Commission conducted support programmes to support victims across the country and down to the local level, that it conducted high-profile national events and more intensive activities with smaller numbers of victims. This section will briefly explain each of these aspects of the Commission's programme.

Public Hearings

85. Public hearings, at the national, sub-district and village level, were an important part of the Commission's work. Different types of hearings had different purposes, but a fundamental objective of all hearings was to create a process which respected and helped restore the dignity of victims of human rights violations.

86. The Commission held eight national public hearings receiving direct testimony from survivors. The first was specifically called a Victims' Hearing, the next seven were thematic hearings focusing on specific forms of human rights violations.

87. District teams conducted a public hearing in each sub-district at the end of their three-month programme. Known as Victims' Hearings, they focused on giving selected community members who had given statements to the Commission the opportunity to tell their stories to Regional Commissioners, community leaders and the community.

88. Community Reconciliation Process (CRP) hearings sought to help heal relationships in a community, partly through restoring the dignity of victims. These hearings were not initiated by victims, but by those who had harmed their communities. They were not technically dependent on the consent or participation of a victim. Nevertheless, the Commission aimed to make these hearings a process that would heal victims as well as repairing relationships within the wider community.

89. In some CRP it was the community as a whole rather than individuals that the perpetrator identified as the victim. When there were individual victims, the Commission involved them in the process. They usually sat in front of the community, to the side of the panel presiding over the hearing. They had the right of reply and were entitled to put questions to the perpetrator, and the panel sometimes consulted victims in determining what an appropriate "act of reconciliation" for a deponent would be. In this way the hearing gave social recognition of the victim's loss, and also conveyed that the victim had displayed his or her generosity by helping to reintegrate a former perpetrator back into the village.

90. Part 9 on Community Reconciliation of this Report addresses the role of the victim in community reconciliation hearings in more detail. This section focuses on national and sub-district hearings.

Objectives of public hearings

91. National and sub-district public hearings were a major part of the Commission's work. They were aimed at fostering national understanding of the truth of past human rights violations and the deep impact that they had had on the lives of individuals, families, communities and the nation. Through their focus on personal testimony from survivors, the hearings educated the public about human rights and the power of their stories to reach out to all in Timor-Leste. From the small number of survivors who testified, people across the country could recognise their own and their families' experiences.

92. The use of the mass media was important to the success of national hearings. National television and radio broadcast hearings live almost in their entirety across the country, and then replayed them regularly. This ensured that national decision makers also heard the stories and perspective of victims of human rights violations. By honouring and recognising victims in this way, the Commission intended to contribute to healing and reconciliation.

93. Public hearings were not formal investigative or judicial processes and did not follow legal rules of procedure and evidence. They did not hear testimony from perpetrators, or bring perpetrators and victims face to face. They aimed to demonstrate the full human dimension of the human rights violations committed in Timor-Leste, to stimulate reflection about the factors and patterns underlying these violations, and to build a national commitment to the refrain "never again." Truth-telling was used to promote a personal and community commitment to reconciliation.

Victims selected to testify

94. Commission staff selected people to testify at hearings from among victims who had provided statements to district truth-seeking teams. The criteria included whether a victim would feel comfortable testifying in public, whether they would benefit from such an experience, whether their statement was credible, whether the telling of their story could contribute to reconciliation through acknowledgment of the truth, and whether they would represent others who had similar stories but would not have the opportunity to testify.

95. Commission district truth-seeking teams took 7,824 statements and about 90% of statement-givers said they would be prepared to testify at a public hearing. Most people considered it important to tell their story before the community and before the Commission. This was one reason why the national public hearing format was extended to the sub-district level.

96. The story of Iria Moniz demonstrates how important many felt it was to give their statement and tell their story at a Commission hearing.

From a remote village to a public hearing

For Iria Moniz the opportunity to share her experiences at a public hearing was a prize won by commitment and perseverance. She recounts:

At first I didn't hear about the Commission coming to our…village because the village chief didn't let us know. I live in a remote village that it is hard for cars and motorbikes to reach because there is no road. This is why the information didn't reach us.

So after the Commission left…I went looking for them myself at the Commission's Maliana office in order to give my statement…I felt that their programme was important because I had suffered a lot during the time of the war…

When I went to the Commission's Maliana office they made me feel welcome and did an interview with me. I was not afraid to give my statement to the Commission. The Commission also provided me the opportunity to talk about my pain and suffering in public. They did not pressure me to participate in the Bobonaro public hearing. I wanted to myself in order to share the burden that I had been carrying all these years. After I did that, I felt lighter inside.[5]

97. In both national and sub-district public hearings the Commission also selected survivors with a view to having geographical balance, and covering events that occurred in different time periods and in which the full range of perpetrator groups were involved. It also sought to have a balance of women and men victims. Meeting these criteria was important if the community was to understand that the Commission was a politically neutral body with a mandate to investigate human rights violations in the context of the political conflict regardless of who committed them.

98. Although hearings did not try to bring victims and perpetrators together, there was always the possibility that they might fuel local tension, especially at the community-based sub-district hearings. The Commission did not have the capacity to provide witness protection and relied on sub-district police to provide security. If a victim felt that his or her testimony might raise issues of personal security, the Commission discouraged him or her from testifying at a public hearing.

National public hearings

99. The first national public hearing of the Commission was held on 11-12 November 2002, at the auditorium in the compound in Balide, Dili where UNAMET and later the CNRT had had their headquarters. Three years earlier, thousands of people had sought refuge in this compound in the days of violence after the 1999 ballot. The date was chosen to coincide with the 11th anniversary of the Santa Cruz Massacre of 12 November 1991. Both the location and date signalled that the hearings were to honour the suffering of victims of human rights violations.

100. This hearing was called a Victims' Hearing, and was given the title "Hear Our Voices" (Rona Ami-nia Lian, in Tetum). Six women and eight men from all 13 districts of Timor-Leste gave testimony. They ranged in age from the early 20s to late 60s, and told of violations that occurred throughout the 25-year period of the Commission's mandate. They told of violence during the internal conflict of 1975 by Timorese political parties and of the years of violations at the hands the Indonesian military and its agents.

101. Radio Timor-Leste and Radio Rakambia broadcast the hearing live, and it was covered by a range of international media.

102. The hearing included traditional Timorese ceremonies, choral singing, poetry and speeches. It closed with a mass and a procession to the Santa Cruz cemetery where wreaths were laid in commemoration of the victims of the 1991 massacre. This cultural element of the hearing helped to create a supportive atmosphere for those testifying and to differentiate the hearing clearly from formal court proceedings. The inclusion of traditional and contemporary Timorese culture became an important feature of all Commission hearings.

103. After being sworn in by National Commissioners, survivors were given the opportunity to tell their stories uninterrupted. At the end of each testimony Commissioners could put a few short questions if they felt the victim's story needed clarification. This format created a dynamic where those testifying spoke not only to Commissioners but also directly to those attending the hearing and the wider audience following it through radio and television. This opportunity to speak directly to the Commission and to the wider public was an important part of respecting the dignity of survivors.

Hear Our Voices – Rona Ami-nia Lian

The first national public hearing of the Commission heard from six women and eight men, victims of serious human rights violations from all districts of Timor-Leste. It was held on 11-12 November 2002, to help commemorate the Santa Cruz massacre of 1991 and honour the victims of this atrocity.

Teresinha da Silva of Aileu, a small elderly lady, spoke of the forced concentration of the civilian population in camps by Fretilin in 1975, before the Indonesian invasion, and the subsequent death by starvation of more than 20 members of her family.

VN told how she had been held captive in a situation of sexual slavery at an Indonesian military base in Ermera from 1977 to 1978. She spoke of how she bore two children, one of whom died. She also told how she and her son continue to be ostracised in her community.

Atanasio da Costa spoke of a militia assault outside his house in Oecussi in April 1999. Slashed repeatedly with machetes, he collapsed to the ground, where he was stabbed in the rectum with the barrel of a rifle. He re-enacted parts of the incident to show how he was assaulted as he lay helpless on the ground, and removed his shirt to show the scars from this attack. He told Commissioners of medical treatment he had received to repair the damage, including ten operations, and the debilitating effects that the attack still has on his daily life.

A young woman from Suai (Covalima) brought the auditorium to tears in the final testimony of the hearing. A person of quiet dignity, she recounted her experiences after the massacre of civilians at the Suai church after the 1999 Popular Consultation. Taken to a nearby school with other women, she was repeatedly raped for a week in front of others. She was then taken to West Timor where the sexual violence continued. As a result of these attacks she bore a child. She asked the gathering if she could present her one-year-old baby. The audience cried out, "Yes, please!" and the one-year-old baby was brought on stage by her grandmother. The baby is named after a former UN High Commissioner for Human Rights who visited the baby's mother and other Suai women survivors in 2000. The baby is truly a symbol of healing and human rights in Timor-Leste.

Around the auditorium groups of people cried and leaned on each other. Listening to these stories brought back other traumatic experiences. One young woman, surrounded by a group of crying friends, recalled the murder of her husband only one day after her marriage in August 1999. A week after the Hearing, a Commission team visiting the hill-village of Nitibe in the enclave of Oecussi, one of the most remote parts of Timor-Leste, was told by people there how they had listened to the live radio coverage of the hearings and wept at the testimony.

Aniceto Guterres Lopes, the Commission's Chairperson, summed up the response of all who were present,

You have told us of your suffering during these two days of hearings, but I want to tell you that you are not alone. Through your stories you have shared your pain with us, and now we all feel this with you. You can see here today how the stories of your suffering have affected us all. We open our hearts to you.

National thematic hearings

104. The other seven national hearings had a slightly different character. Each had a thematic focus, based on areas of the Commission's truth-seeking work. These themes were:

- Political Imprisonment (February 2003)
- Women and Conflict (April 2003)
- Forced Displacement and Famine (July 2003)
- Massacres (November 2003)
- The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-1976 (December 2003)
- Self-Determination and the International Community (March 2004)
- Children and Conflict (March 2004).

105. Most hearings took place over two days, though the hearings on Massacres and Self-Determination and the International Community each took place over three days, and The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-1976 was a four-day hearing.

106. The format for national thematic hearings was primarily the presentation of direct testimony by people who had survived violations related to the theme of the hearing. Around ten survivors gave testimony at each hearing. The Commission also heard expert testimony and submissions from organisations and individuals with special knowledge of the theme gained either through their work in Timor-Leste or through their study of the topic. Expert testimonies helped the Commission and audience to put the victim testimonies into context and to understand better some of the causes and patterns of violations.

107. Two hearings had a somewhat different format. The hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-1976 received the testimonies of four victims of violations during that period, but it also heard from people who themselves or whose parties had played an important historical role in the events of 1974–1976. Among the speakers who had played a direct role in the events, referred to as “historical actors” (agentes do processo), were the President of Timor-Leste, Xanana Gusmão, the Prime Minister Mari Alkatiri, the Nobel Peace Laureate and Foreign Minister, José Ramos-Horta, and Francisco Xavier do Amaral, the former Fretilin President.

108. Victims did not testify in the hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community, which was held in March 2004. Instead the Commission heard submissions about the policies of foreign governments on Timor-Leste in the years 1974-1999, and about the activity of international civil society on behalf of Timor-Leste during this period. It also heard testimony about the role of Timorese in exile.

109. In the eyes of the public the national Victims' Hearing and the national thematic hearings were perhaps the high point of the Commission's work. They received full national media coverage, and were followed across the country and reported in the international media. Their high public profile made them an exceptionally effective vehicle for creating wider understanding and support of victims and of the Commission's work. The principal voice that the public heard in this national dialogue about past human rights violations was that of the victims.

Highlights of the national hearings

110. Highlights of the hearings included the inauguration of the Commission's national headquarters in the Comarca, the former prison in Balide. The headquarters were opened with a hearing on Political Imprisonment that featured testimony from ex-detainees, including several who had been held in the Comarca. The hearing on Women and Conflict provided an insight into the lives and the suffering of women during the years of conflict. In the hearing on Massacres, survivors testified about some of the most brutal acts of the mandate period. Eye witnesses described not just such notorious events such as Kraras Massacre of 1983, the Santa Cruz Massacre of 1991 and the Liquiçá Church Massacre of 1999, but also less well-known incidents that had occurred during the time of the internal political party conflict, after the Indonesian invasion of Dili, and during the late 1970s and the early 1980s.

111. The hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine focused on the experience of those who had survived the horrific events that caused the largest number of deaths during the 24-year mandate period. Victims' accounts of the relentless bombardment suffered by the population who had fled to the mountains after the invasion, the camps which held those who surrendered or were captured, and the prison island of Ataúro, had never before been given a public hearing.

112. For many the December 2003 hearing on The Internal Political Conflict of 1974-1976 will remain the indelible moment of the Commission's work. For the first time Timor-Leste's leaders came forward to speak publicly and in an official forum of the violence between Timorese in 1974-1976. Uncertainty as to how political leaders would react to this opportunity surrounded the hearing. In the end the former political foes expressed humility and sorrow at what had occurred, accepted responsibility and gave a public demonstration of the spirit of reconciliation, making the hearing a momentous event in the nation's history.

113. The hearing on Self-Determination and the International Community provided a rare opportunity for East Timorese to consider the wider international context and its influence on their long struggle for self-determination. The testimonies of old friends of Timor-Leste such as Pat Walsh, David Scott and James Dunn from Australia; Arnold Kohen from the USA; Monica Nakamura from Japan; Luisa Teotonia Pereira from Portugal, and the UN official Francesc Vendrell, reminded us that even in the darkest days of the occupation there were people around the world who defended Timor-Leste's right to self-determination. The testimony of Ian Martin, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General during UNAMET, reminded East Timorese that their pain did not end once the international community had recognised its responsibility to allow them to exercise their collective right to self-determination.

114. The testimonies of Indonesian human rights defenders, such as the great friends of Timorese political prisoners Ade Rostina Sitompul and Luhut Pangaribuan, the members and staff of the National Commission on Violence Against Women, the West Timor Humanitarian NGO Team, and the human rights activists Yeni Rosa Damayanti and Nugroho Katjasungkana, were compelling both in themselves and as powerful symbols of the hope of a new relationship with Indonesia based on the principles of human rights. They also reminded us that there were Indonesian citizens who took great risks to defend human rights in Timor-Leste.

115. Fittingly the theme of the final hearing was Children and Conflict, since it not only highlighted the tragic plight of child victims, but also conveyed the resilience and energy of the country's younger generation.

116. The impact that these public hearings had across Timor-Leste made them a keystone of the work of the Commission. The Commission has published booklets on each of the hearings. By making a permanent record available to the people of Timor-Leste and the international community, the Commission hopes that the lessons they offer will continue to resonate.

Bishop Basilio do Nascimento's opening address to the National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974–1976

Why are we here today? Because of a historical time, because of the wounds of the past, all Timorese people have waited, so that we can make reconciliation. Reconciliation for the past suffering, for our land. All Timorese have suffered. We Timorese people need to be reconciled within ourselves, with our land and with our history. We know this is a good idea, but it is very difficult to do. We hear words of justification and rationalisation: "Because of war I did this"…We need to examine this.

About morality – reconciliation within ourselves can only happen when we are able to let go of our remorse. Otherwise a voice will always be talking at us, always calling in our heads, in our minds. That is why I say that reconciliation can only be achieved when we are able to let go of our remorse. We can make up all sorts of intellectual reasons and arguments, but when we haven't got reconciliation within ourselves we are divided. Not just as a nation or as groups, but also within ourselves like a double personality: our mouths say one thing, our actions do another.

We know our dead will never return, but we need to know the circumstances of their deaths. What we Timorese mean by justice is particular. I observe that Timorese do not wait for those who have done wrong to be punished. This is up to the state when Aunt Maria's son is killed in the mountains justice for ordinary Timorese people includes clearing their names, and making sure that people have not forgotten (the victims).

[Excerpts from speech on 15 December 2003]

Sub-district victims' hearings

117. District teams worked in each sub-district within their district for about three months. During this time they took truth-seeking statements, facilitated community reconciliation hearings, conducted Community Profile workshops and provided support to victims of human rights violations.

118. At the end of the three-month period the team organised a public hearing in each sub-district. These were called Sub-district Victims' Hearings. Local civil administration officials, and traditional and community leaders from the sub-district and district were invited to attend the hearings, together with Commissioners and staff from the national office. At the hearings, the district team reported back to the community about its activities in the previous three months. The community then heard testimonies from selected community members who had given statements to the district team. Usually between four and six victims gave testimonies.

119. Sub-district Victims' Hearings were inspired by the powerful impact of the national hearings and the expressed wish of so many victims to testify. The hearings were a commemoration of people who did not survive, and a celebration of the survival of communities and their commitment to healing past divisions in a spirit of reconciliation. They were also an opportunity to share the results of the previous three months' work, to re-emphasise that the Commission's role included helping to restore the dignity of victims within their community, and to close the Commission's activities within the sub-district on a ceremonial note.

120. A total of 52 Sub-district Victims' Hearings were conducted. Sixty five women, and 149 men gave testimony, and an estimated 6,500 community members attended the hearings.

A Sub-district Hearing: Natarbora

Natarbora is a sub-district in the remote interior of the south-eastern Manatuto District. The Commission district team for Manatuto worked in this sub-district from February to May 2003. The Sub-district Hearing to mark the close of the community's participation in Commission activities was held on 12 May 2003, and was attended by a large number of community members.

At this hearing three victims of human rights violations testified before the Commission and their community. Their testimonies were about events that took place at key stages of the conflict, between 1975 and 1999.

Senhora Filomena (surname withheld) spoke of her experience as a member of the women's organisation, OPMT, between 1975 and 1979, supporting Falintil soldiers. She told of how she was captured in 1980 after a member of her family told the military of her activities. She said he now lived in Indonesia. Sra Filomena told how she was tortured during interrogation by Indonesian soldiers. She went on to say that in 1999 her kiosk was burned to the ground by the Indonesian military helped by East Timorese, including the Sub-district Administrator. She said that if they were to return to her community, she would be able to accept them back.

WN spoke of the tragic events that had befallen his family in 1977-78. He told of how after his father had surrendered to the Indonesian military, members of Falintil came and raped his aunt, who was a young, single woman at the time. He said that they threatened to kill him if he tried to prevent them raping his aunt. He said that soon after this violation, his mother and five younger siblings, together with his aunt, were all killed by the Indonesian military near the sea.

João Graciano told of his experience of imprisonment after surrendering to the military in 1982 in Soibada. He, his father, younger brother and seven other civilians were imprisoned for six weeks where, he said, they received barely any food. After they were released, he and his younger brother were taken to be TBOs (Tenaga Bantuan Operasi, Operations Assistants) by the Indonesian military. He said that they were forced to work as TBOs in the forest near Barique for four months. The military then ordered Timorese Hansip members to arrest them in Soibada. While detained, the two of them were beaten so badly by more than ten soldiers and Hansip members that his brother still suffers from the physical effects.

The hearing provided a process of honouring the experience of individuals who suffered during the mandate of the Commission, and also of telling and honouring the wider community of the Natarbora area during these years, and of remembering those who died. The hearing was recorded and broadcast by the Commission weekly radio programme, and through this medium the experiences of community members of this remote region were shared with communities across Timor-Leste.

Impact of participation on victims

121. The Commission conducted a survey of participants in Sub-district Victim's Hearings between January and March 2004. This section includes responses given by East Timorese people, as documented in this survey[4]. Given that their participation in a hearing was voluntary, it is not surprising that the victims found the hearings a positive experience.

122. Seventy-year old Carlos Vitorino expressed a sentiment shared by many participants:

> I feel happy because the people in Viqueque and the important people in Dili came to hear our words for themselves…I feel satisfied.

123. Domingas Piedade, who participated in the Quelicai Sub-district Victim Hearing, stressed how important the recognition of his and others' suffering was for their healing:

> I feel happy because I had the opportunity to speak out…Everything about the hearing was good because it healed our worries.

124. Teófilo da Costa Barros of Lolotoe (Bobonaro) talked of his burden being lifted by the hearing:

> After I testified at the public hearing, I felt light because I had rid myself of an emotional burden. This burden has been cast off and now I have stopped worrying. I have also rid myself of the hatred that I had for the people who hurt me in the past. Now I will always welcome them with open arms.

125. Tito Soares de Araújo from Cailaco Sub-district (Bobonaro) commented on how much he enjoyed the hearing:

> I feel that the hearing was fantastic, really good…now I feel light and happy because the burden that was in my heart has been lifted.

126. Lourença da Cunha Moniz of Maliana Sub-district (Bobonaro) expressed satisfaction that she had been able to put on record for posterity what had happened to her:

> I am not keeping the bad things that were done to me hidden in my heart. I will tell them so that they can be recorded in history for our children and grandchildren.

127. Many victims talked of the hearings' significance for their family and community relationships. Usually, families and friends gave victims the support they needed before, during and after the hearing. Florentina Gama, who testified in the Balibó hearing (Bobonaro), said many members of her family and community rallied round her. She said:

> When I participated in the hearing, a lot of my family supported me in my desire to speak in public. They didn't object. They were grateful that I could tell the story of the suffering that I experienced throughout my life and that the leaders could hear it and take care of us…After I testified in the public hearing, my neighbours and my family were not upset. They were happy because I represented the victims from my town and told of the suffering that every single household experienced.

128. The response of Lourença da Cunha Moniz's family was initially one of surprise, as they had not previously heard her story. At the hearing the family wept with Lourença:

> When I testified at the hearing, my family was surprised because until then I had kept my story a secret from them. Only when the Commission came, did I share my pain and suffering in public and in front of the local authorities…When I testified at the public hearing my family members and friends were also sad and wept because of the suffering I experienced

129. But others received more mixed reactions from family and community. The decision of Teofilo da Costa Barros of Lolotoe (Bobonaro) to take part in a hearing was met with silence and indifference, though not outright hostility, by his family and neighbours:

> When I was going to participate in the hearing no one from my family gave support. They said nothing. After I testified in public at the hearing, I came home and my family and neighbours didn't threaten me or express anger.

130. In Bobonaro Sub-district (Bobonaro), Iria Moniz, a former clandestine leader in her village, said that initially her family accused her of betraying Xanana Gusmão by testifying at the hearing. After the hearing, however:

> Many people felt sad and some came and hugged me and cried because my story had made their hearts ache.

131. Iria Moniz's experience highlights the fact that discussing violence committed by Timorese against Timorese in their communities remains a sensitive subject, even when the incidents discussed took place many years ago. Pressure to remain silent can be strong and can further isolate victims in their suffering. This reality needs to be borne in mind when considering future programmes to foster reconciliation at the community level.

The impact of public hearings

132. Victims' Hearings were a shared national experience of listening to the voices of victims and confronting the truth and impact of past human rights violations. They have built a basis for further national and community-level dialogue on dealing with past violence in a spirit of reconciliation. Sub-district Hearings were particularly important in taking this process out of Dili and into local communities.

133. National public hearings were a new experience for victims and the nation. Most victims came from rural communities and had never spoken at any kind of national public event. Shown on television in Dili and broadcast across the country by radio, victims' words reached into communities and homes throughout Timor-Leste. The hearings gave victims a unique opportunity to speak directly to national leaders when National Commissioners asked them if they would like to give a message to the nation. The hearings therefore placed ordinary people at the centre of the national debate on healing, reconciliation and justice.

134. The Commission raised sensitive issues at public hearings, especially national hearings. For the first time the community heard direct testimony about terrible violations committed by Timorese political parties in 1974-1976. Victims told of violence committed by Timorese in the Indonesian military and its auxiliaries. The family and community dimensions of this sort of violence are profound. Women spoke openly of the sexual violence committed against them, challenging the widely-held view that Timorese culture forbade discussion of this subject. Hearings brought home the personal dimension of the massive and prolonged violence of the Indonesian military over the period of the Commission's mandate. The way that this process of public truth-telling gained the respect of the wider population augurs well for future peace-building initiatives.

135. The Commission offers its profound gratitude to those victims who courageously contributed to this process of community dialogue and education. We hope that the people who participated in this process feel that it has helped them on their journey of healing.

Healing workshops

Background

136. Healing Workshops grew out of the Commission's experience in working with victims from the first three national public hearings. District teams working in villages came to understand how past violence continued to affect victims' lives. They saw that some victims needed more sustained support than that offered through statement-taking and brief follow-up visits. Before each national public hearing the Commission held a workshop with participants to help them prepare emotionally for the experience of telling their story in public. The NGO Fokupers supported these workshops.

137. Taking those experiences as its starting point, in May 2003 the Commission conducted an evaluation of its work with victims. It looked at the way it had been offering assistance to victims of human rights violations and decided to try to offer more intensive support to people trying to rebuild their lives. To meet this need the Victim Support Team developed the Healing Workshop programme.

138. Because the workshops were to involve intensive work with victims, it was clear that they would reach only a small number of people. Criteria for participation were therefore drawn up, which focused mostly on the vulnerability of the victim and the judgment of district Commission staff that he or she would benefit from such a process.

139. As the Commission did not have professionally qualified mental health workers on its staff, it formed its partnership with Fokupers. A number of other organisations and individuals also contributed to the workshops, including the Dili-based art group Arte Moris, the Canossian Sisters of Balide, who provided accommodation, Timorese musicians and the International Organisation for Migration (IOM), which assisted with transport. District and national Victim Support staff played a key role in facilitating the workshops and providing support to participants.

Objectives

140. The Healing Workshops had four main objectives, all related to developing a deeper relationship between the Commission and victims of human rights violations. They were to:

- provide more support to victims within the Commission's capabilities
- refer survivors to other services and organisations for further assistance
- help survivors plan the use of their Urgent Reparations grants, and
- listen to survivors' perspectives on what the Commission should recommend for further action in its Final Report.

141. Within these objectives, the Healing Workshops specifically aimed to:

- Create a safe place for survivors of serious human rights violations to come together and reflect on their past experiences and their current situations.
- Allow survivors to share their stories and hear the stories of others.
- Provide an opportunity for survivors to participate in group work and other creative activities to aid in healing.

- Create a process that allowed survivors to explore a range of emotional dimensions as diverse as fun and laughter and the celebration of the strengths of survivors as individuals and as community members.
- Assist survivors in planning the expenditure of funds provided through the Urgent Reparations Programme.
- Identify the needs of survivors and make referrals to other organisations capable of helping them.
- Elicit recommendations from survivors to assist the Commission in compiling a Final Report that reflects their experiences, preoccupations and needs.

Healing workshops: a deeper level of support

The objectives of the Healing Workshops were modest, and intended to be realistic. We tried to address the needs of the participants on a variety of levels. A three-day workshop could never pretend to offer a panacea, especially as each participant who came to a workshop was at a different stage of the healing process. Within a group process, encompassing a variety of activities, we tried to create a range of ways of reflecting and interacting that allowed different people to find the way that suited them.

It was important to create a space where survivors could feel cared for and respected, and where they could simultaneously offer that care and respect to their peers. Connecting with others who had suffered was an important part of the programme. It enabled survivors to feel less isolated and to understand they were not alone in carrying their heavy burden. It also helped show that healing is not just about specialist care, but also about reaching into ourselves and supporting each other.

It was, however, also important to address material obstacles to the well-being of survivors, and so the Commission endeavoured to link up victims with institutions offering appropriate medical and other care. For some who attended the workshops this entailed nothing more than a visit to the doctor. For some it meant more complex drastic medical interventions such as being fitted with a prosthetic limb in Indonesia.

Assistance with physical health problems and the provision of a safe environment that promoted trust and sharing formed the foundation for achieving the primary objective of the Healing Workshops, that of helping survivors to recognise that inner healing is a process that requires attention and energy, assess what stage they had reached in the process of healing, and take some further steps forward in that process.

Participants

142. Six workshops were held at the Commission's national headquarters in Dili. Five brought together mixed groups of men and women, and one was for women only. Participants came from all districts of Timor-Leste, and efforts were made to involve survivors from some of the most remote parts of the country.

143. All participants had initially given statements to District Truth-Seeking Teams. District Victim Support Teams had then identified them as meeting the criteria for the Urgent Reparations Scheme. While only a small number of Urgent Reparations Scheme recipients participated in Healing Workshops, the workshops were a part of this Scheme.

144. In total 156 people participated in the six workshops, 82 women (52%) and 74 men (47%).

The workshop programme

145. The first step in a workshop for most participants was getting to Dili. Many participants from remote rural communities had never been to the national capital, and simply to travel to Dili, away from family and community, was a big step. Providing participants with the support they needed from the time they left home until their return at the end of the workshop was therefore crucial to the success of the programme. Commission district teams were responsible for travel arrangements and for supporting participants during this process.

146. Participants in the first workshops from outside Dili stayed in the teacher training college in Balide, which had previously been the site of the UNAMET and CNRT headquarters. Participants in later workshops stayed in the residence of the Canossian Sisters, also in Balide, near the Commission's national office. The pastoral care given by the Sisters was an especially valuable contribution. Participants usually arrived in Dili the day before the workshop began. These practical arrangements were important in establishing a feeling among participants that they were cared for and valued.

147. Bringing participants to Dili was a deliberate decision. It allowed them to step out of their daily lives and dedicate some time just to themselves. For many, especially women participants, this was a rare opportunity to be free from the daily routine of hard domestic work. In addition, by bringing participants away from their villages, it was hoped that they would feel able to speak more freely of their experiences and feelings. It also allowed people from all over the country to meet each other, thereby breaking down the sense of isolation felt by many survivors.

148. The workshop took place over three days. The programme provided a combination of formal and unstructured activity. Each group of participants was different, and within each group individuals responded differently to the experience, so it was important for the workshops to be flexible in this way. The mixture of structured activities and informality allowed participants to mix with each other in different ways, to talk to each other informally and give each other support.

149. Most workshop activities took place at the Commission national office. This brought survivors into the centre of the Commission's daily work, creating a sense of involvement with and ownership of the Commission. Each time workshops were held, the former-prison-turned-national-office was transformed by the presence of survivors. They personalised the issue of human rights violations and inspired with their resilience and support for each other.

Day one

150. The workshop began with a welcome by a National Commissioner, usually Commissioner Isabel Guterres, who had special responsibility for victim support work. The first session focused on introductions, on gently creating a sense of ease amongst the group, and outlining the three-day programme.

151. Commission staff then explained what was called the journey of healing. This helped participants understand that healing is a process that they themselves could begin and move through. It gave participants a framework for the activities to come and a reference point for discussions over the following three days.

152. The main activity of the first day, called "group counselling", was the sharing of personal stories. Women counsellors from Fokupers facilitated these sessions with support from Commission staff. Fokupers has much experience of working with survivors of violence in this way, and their contribution was critical to the effectiveness of the workshop. Counsellors then worked with small groups, using creative techniques to help survivors find ways of talking about their experiences. There was no obligation to speak, and if participants chose to speak, they could say as much or as little as they wanted. Listening was an important part of these sessions, creating a sense of respect and care.

153. These sessions were emotionally taxing for both participants and workers. The impact on each participant was monitored and extra support provided when necessary.

The journey of healing

On the day before the first healing workshop, the Commission had the good fortune to be visited by the New Zealand Anglican priest, Father Michael Lapsley. Father Lapsley is a human rights activist, who has lived in South Africa for many years. In the dying days of the apartheid regime he survived a letter bomb posted to him, but lost both hands and an eye, and had to undergo extensive surgery and rehabilitation. He learned of the suffering of the Timorese people at first hand in 1999 when he visited Timor-Leste in 1999 as an observer of the Popular Consultation, after meeting Xanana Gusmão in Cipinang prison in Jakarta

From close observation of the work of the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) Father Lapsley concluded that survivors of human rights violations needed more than the short period of support that the TRC offered. He established the Institute for the Healing of Memory to continue the work of healing in South Africa. Father Lapsley told National Commissioners and Commission staff about his own experience as a victim, and how it had influenced his work with fellow victims. His message inspired the Commission's own approach to survivors.

Fr Lapsley's idea of a journey of healing was taken up by the Commission, and helped give shape to the Workshops. Fr Lapsley spoke of four stages in the survivor's experience:

- First was the time in a person's life before the violation, involving supportive family and other relationships.
- Then was the violation, often involving many acts over a long period, which caused a fundamental break in people's lives. Many people do not survive and these are truly victims.
- Those who live are survivors, but they often become stuck in their lives, constantly recalling the pain and suffering of the violation. Many survivors are unable to move beyond this pain for the rest of their lives.
- Finally, survivors embark on what can be the work of a lifetime, moving from being a victim to becoming a victor over the pain and violence.

These four stages were used in a practical way to develop a framework for activities and discussions in the Healing Workshops.

Many victims' artwork reflected the underlying theme of a journey. Marcelina Poto drew two pictures in her workshop. Of the first picture she said: "I painted this house because it is the house they killed my husband in front of." Of the second she said: "This flower represents my desire to move out of this suffering."

Regina Freitas, explained her three pictures:

The house represents the time when my family was complete. The tree represents my life. The tree with no leaves represents the time when they killed my husband, and the gun represents the weapons the Indonesian men used to kill him.

Marta Ximenes presented two of her pictures:

The house with the garden represents the time when they killed my husband in this house and shot me in the leg. The flower represents the happiness I feel because I have shared my suffering with the authorities.

A chance to develop understanding

Sharing stories of past violations was a difficult experience for participants. The respectful listening and support of fellow participants was an important part of the process. At times victims' stories concerned sensitive matters that made their fellow-participants deeply uneasy. In such circumstances other members of the group could provide the support needed to break the tension. In this way the workshop provided a supportive forum to discuss difficult issues.

At a workshop in March 2004 a small group were sharing their stories. A young woman from Suai (Covalima) was telling the painful story of being raped by members of the Indonesian military in 1999. The group listened attentively as the young woman told her story through tears. One young man interrupted, politely, to say that he felt that in Timorese culture it was not appropriate for women to talk about these sorts of experiences. He was himself the survivor of severe torture on a number of occasions throughout the 1990s.

The facilitator asked the young woman and rest of the group what they thought. An older lady sitting between the young man and the young woman put her hand on the young woman's shoulder, and said that women had been abused in the past and that if now they felt they wanted to talk about it, then there was nothing in Timorese culture to say that they should not do so. She said that now was the right time for women to talk. She said this gently, while also patting the young man on the shoulder in a comforting way. She herself was the survivor of rape. The group and the young man nodded assent, and the young woman continued her story.

Day two

154. The activities on the second and third days were designed to provide a balance to the narratives recounted on the first day by allowing participants both to express their stories and feelings in other ways and also to experience other emotions such as joy and celebration.

155. On the second day participants were encouraged to find creative ways of expressing feelings in a relaxed atmosphere. Singing, theatre games, and drawing and painting were the main activities. The focus shifted a little from past experience to how survivors experienced their lives today, and what they hoped for the future. The youth art group Arte Moris attended some workshops, as did the Timorese musicians Gil and Jimmy Madeira. Music is an especially rich part of Timorese culture, and even participants who came from different districts of Timor-Leste with their own distinct languages tended to know the same songs in Tetum. The songs were linked to personal experiences and emotions, and became the catalyst for discussions about how survivors felt the past in their present lives, about the good and difficult things in their lives, and about the support they did or did not receive from their families and communities.

156. Singing and theatre games also allowed participants to give gentle physical expression to their feelings. This was especially important because many survivors continue to suffer physical disability or feel constricted in their bodies after terrible physical and emotional suffering. These activities aimed to help participants to identify and celebrate their capacity to survive and their courage in rebuilding their lives. Recognition of participants' strengths and beauty, and learning from this as a group, was at the centre of this second day.

157. At the end of the second day, participants were taken on a tour of Dili. This excursion was the first opportunity many participants had had to see such national landmarks as the statue of Christ on the outskirts of Dili, the Santa Cruz cemetery, the national parliament, the national university and the Dili waterfront. This time was also used to refer people to medical and other services at the national hospital.

Day three

158. The third day began with participants sharing their artwork with the group, and talking about what their pictures meant to them. Discussion about what this meant for people's journey of healing followed, again with a focus on celebrating the achievements, small or great, of each participant. Participants were then informed about the financial aspect of the Urgent Reparations Scheme. It was decided not to inform participants about this earlier, to prevent the workshop becoming too heavily-focused on financial issues. Commission team members facilitated small group discussions with participants to share ideas about how they could use the grant to improve their lives in a sustainable way. Following this, participants joined a group discussion in which they identified recommendations that they thought the Commission should put forward in its Final Report.

159. The workshop concluded with a ceremony of reflection, sometimes a Mass, at which participants were awarded certificates for their participation and contribution.

Dance of the wounded

A Commission team member recalled a moving moment on the second day of the first healing workshop in June 2003:

This was the first time we had tried the singing activity, with Gil Madeira on the guitar. We were sitting in a circle, about 15 of us, and as we talked about different times in our lives, times of happiness and times of suffering, Gil would ask the members of the group if they knew any songs that they associated with feelings from this time. Slowly, we would sing together as people gave suggestions or just started to sing.

One older lady from Aileu had asked during the coffee break if we could find a time to dance together, to share the different tebe-tebe from different parts of Timor-Leste. While we were singing she stood up and gently started to dance her tebe. Participants were a little shy, and no one got up to join her. So I joined her, but told her she would need to teach me. We held hands, and slowly moved in a circle. One by one participants joined in. It was a very slow dance. Some of the participants had very damaged bodies from the violations against them, even long ago. We didn't talk, just looked at each other and with our eyes we encouraged participants who hadn't joined in. Finally we were a full circle, rocking gently and moving to the rhythm of the Aileu tebe of our older sister.

When we eventually finished we all sat down in happy silence. We knew we had shared something special.

160. Time off from organised activities was also valuable to participants' overall experience of the workshop. For many participants, a coffee or meal break was a time to reflect on what they had gained from a session. Commission staff members were ready to listen, and offer comfort or assistance during these times. These times also allowed participants to sit together and develop friendships. In the evenings, participants returned to their residence at the Canossian Sisters. Commission staff accompanied them and continued to offer care and support.

161. For some participants, the day's activities re-opened emotional and psychological scars, and they were monitored and supported as needed. National Victim Support staff played an important role in this work. Having travelled with participants from their home districts, District Victim Support staff members were able to give particularly valuable support throughout the workshop. They had already developed a relationship with participants that would continue upon return to the district.

Peer support

Creating an environment where survivors could meet other survivors, share stories and support each other was essential to the success of the healing workshops. Each group developed its own dynamic, but mutual care and support was always at the heart of the workshops.

The special role that some survivors played in creating this atmosphere suggests how peer support could be used in the future work in this area. Olga from the central mountain village of Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro) gave testimony at the Commission's National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict in April 2003. Her story of sexual violence and sexual slavery in 1982 was the first time the nation had heard of the suffering of the women of Mau Chiga after villagers joined an uprising against the Indonesian military. In January 2004 Olga and her young daughter accompanied an older lady from Mau Chiga to an all-women healing workshop. Throughout the workshop Olga supported the older lady and other participants, and also shared her experience. Her daughter joined in the singing and painting activities, and was a favourite of the other participants.

Olga's role as a support person helped her friend from Mau Chiga, and was a further step in her own healing. She showed others too how survivors could move, however slowly, along the journey. She also showed how networks of survivors could support each other.

Reflections on the healing workshops

162. Comments made throughout the workshops as well as an internal Commission evaluation on victim support work carried out with selected participants[*] indicate that the Healing Workshops had a significant and positive impact on the participants. While retelling their stories was often painful, participants nevertheless expressed gratitude for the opportunity to share their experiences. For example, Marcelina Poto from Oecussi spoke of watching the murder of her husband and the burning of her home by militia. She said:

> As I speak here, I feel deep pain, but I also feel a little happiness because I have the chance to speak with friends whose suffering is the same as mine.

163. A woman from Viqueque also found the experience difficult but valuable. She told of being raped daily over an extended period by a total of about 40 men. She said that from these rapes she conceived and bore four children. She said:

> When I remember and tell this story I feel embarrassed and my heart aches, but I must speak out so that I can lessen my suffering.

164. When asked more directly how they felt about the Healing Workshops, participants said they were satisfied with the programme and thanked the Commission for providing them with the opportunity to participate.

Programme highlights from participants' perspectives

For many participants the most important part of the programme was group counselling – the opportunity to share their story with others. When asked what they hoped to gain from the three days, the vast majority of participants responded like Rosa Kolobere from Suai:

I have come to share my experience with friends. When we share with each other we can alleviate our suffering and our daily lives can become easier.

Or as Angelina da Costa from Ainaro said simply: "I want to tell my story."

Reflecting on the programme, Veronica Moniz of Bobonaro said she enjoyed it because of its wide variety of activities.

The Healing Workshop made me happy and stopped me worrying because they got us to do lots of things like drawing flowers, singing, and other things.

"I liked it all" remarked Bernadino Loeleto of Maliana, "but my favourite part was the funny skit about inviting people to come to a wedding. I got to play the role of the godfather."

Luis Afonso from Lolotoe (Bobonaro) commented on how much he learnt from the workshop in general. For him and others an important part of the experience was the visit to Dili.

Quotes from CAVR Acolhimento and Victim Support programme evaluation, January to March 2004.

165. The three-day residential Healing Workshops were the most intensive interactions the Commission had with victims. From these and other interactions with victims the Commission learned some important practical lessons that can be used in future work in this area.

166. The Commission's expectations of the Healing Workshops were modest. From its work with survivors, it was aware that their needs were usually far too great to be addressed in three days. The Commission aimed to make a contribution to each victim's recovery by helping them to recognise their potential to grow beyond the pain of their suffering. At times in this work, the Commission felt overwhelmed by the terrible experiences endured by participants, as the support it was able to offer was clearly inadequate to their needs.

167. Victims of human rights violations need support of many kinds. These include economic assistance, educational and health services, symbolic recognition, and justice.

There are also more personal needs such as the need for personal recognition, to raise self-esteem, and to offer care and love. Health, both physical and mental, is a critical issue for many victims, and is so basic as to affect all other aspects of their lives. Though small, the Commission's contribution should be seen as the foundation on which future institutions and programmes can build. The Reparations Programme recommended by the Commission seeks to address the many needs of survivors of the 25 years of conflict.

Urgent reparations

Background

168. As district teams began working in villages across the country, it quickly became clear to them that many victims of human rights violations had pressing needs directly related to the violations they had suffered. Victims looked to the Commission as perhaps the only national institution that could help them. It did not seem enough to tell survivors to wait until the recommendations of the Commission's Final Report had been acted on for help to come. Therefore, the Commission developed an interim means of addressing some of the urgent needs of victims, the Urgent Reparations Scheme.

Reasons for a reparations scheme

169. The foundation of the scheme was the principle of international human rights law that the victims of wrongful acts have the right to reparations. The body of international law suggests that the core elements of reparation are:

- Restitution
- Compensation
- Rehabilitation
- Satisfaction, and
- Guarantees of non-repetition.

170. As an independent national institution with a mandate based on international human rights law, the Commission sought to respect the right of victims to reparation by establishing the Urgent Reparations Scheme. The Commission emphasises that the scheme was developed only as a temporary measure to be carried out during the life of the Commission. It does not prejudice in any way any right of victims to full reparations as part of a long-term settlement. The small size of the monetary grant component of the scheme clearly does not meet the requirements of a full reparations scheme under the principles listed above.

171. As the new nation of Timor-Leste seeks to establish a democracy founded on the equality of its citizens, it has a moral duty to ensure that those citizens who currently suffer disadvantage due to past violations are able to take up their position as fully participating citizens of Timor-Leste. The state should take whatever action it can to assist the achievement of this goal. The social imperative for the state to make reparations also derives from both its peace-building and development objectives. Helping the victims of violence repair their lives is an essential step towards healing the rifts that exist after years of conflict. Without such repair, disadvantage and isolation may create an underclass, whose disaffection could fuel social unrest. Equally, the national priorities of development and poverty reduction require that all citizens are able to play an active and constructive role in building the new nation. Victims of past violations are among those at greatest risk of being left behind in this process of development.

Funding

172. The Commission itself had no funds to develop a reparations scheme. It was assisted through a partnership with the Community Empowerment and Local Governance Project (CEP), a project managed by the Ministry of the Interior and funded through the Trust Fund for East Timor (TFET) administered by the World Bank. The CEP had a programme for helping "vulnerable groups" and its support of the Urgent Reparations Scheme was managed through that programme.

Programme objectives

173. The main objective of the Urgent Reparations Scheme was to provide reparations to survivors of human rights violations, whose needs were both urgent and could not be easily met by other means. Through the provision of health or other services or a small financial contribution, the scheme sought to meet the most pressing needs of some of these people. The reparation on offer was not regarded as full restitution. Nor was it considered to extinguish the duty of the state to provide reparations for victims of human rights violations.

174. The Commission was under no illusion that it was fixing the problem. It was offering short-term alleviation and helping victims move forward in the longer process of healing and restoration. In addition, the scheme developed a community-focused approach, working with national human rights NGOs and community organisations, in funding a number of pilot community development-oriented approaches to healing and restoration.

Who could receive assistance

175. District teams identified potential beneficiaries of the programme from among those whom the teams had come into contact with through their truth-seeking and reconciliation work. Primary beneficiaries were direct survivors of human rights violations such as rape, imprisonment and torture, as well as those who suffered indirectly through the abduction, disappearance or killing of family members. Potential beneficiaries had to meet the following eligibility criteria:

- The need had to be severe, immediate and related directly to a human rights violation that had occurred within the mandated period of 1974-1999. For example, a person still suffering from an injury sustained during torture or a widow with inadequate income due to the killing of her husband would meet this criterion.
- The person had to be clearly vulnerable – for example, a widow, orphan, person with a physical disability, or someone isolated within her or his community. Those who were vulnerable were considered to be persons whose daily life continued to be stunted by the physical, psychological or economic consequences of the human rights violations committed against them.

- Other resources to meet the need either did not exist or were not easily accessible.
- The assistance would help the recipient in a sustainable way. For example, it would facilitate the restoration of the person's dignity, prevent further abuse or would contribute to empowerment or healing that would improve the long-term quality of the person's life.

Forms of reparation

176. The types of reparation that the Commission could offer included:
- An emergency grant of US$200
- Urgent medical and/or psycho-social care
- Equipment and/or training for the disabled
- Setting up of survivors' self-help groups that might engage in any of a range of activities ranging from theatre work to small business that would help restore their dignity
- Commemoration of an event, with the aim of providing recognition and the restoration of dignity to victims
- The provision of tombstones or monuments to promote community recognition of victims who had disappeared, thereby helping to provide a sense of emotional closure for victims' families
- Contracts with local organisations such as churches or counselling groups that could provide sustained help to survivors.

Implementation of the scheme

177. In May 2003, the Commission established a Working Group for Victim Support to devise and oversee policies around victim support, including reparations. It consisted of two National Commissioners, the Commission Victim Support Division Coordinator, the CAVR Programme Manager, a representative from each of the Timorese human rights NGOs Fokupers and Assosiasi HAK (Rights Association), and a Sister from the Carmelite nuns.

178. District staff identified prospective individual or community recipients of the cash grant, and referred them to the Reparations Committee. Once the Committee approved a referral, the Commission distributed the funds.

179. The Commission also contracted other organisations to provide support to victims. In ten districts, the Commission contracted NGOs or religious groups involved in providing health services to offer support to identified victims over a six-month period. The ten organizations were SATILOS (Fundaçao Saude Timor-Leste, Timor-Leste Health Foundation) in Dili; the Canossian Sisters in Ainaro, Manatuto and Lautém; the Catholic Commission for Justice and Peace in Maliana; the Centro Feto Enclave Oecussi (Oecussi Enclave Women's Centre); the Congregation of Sisters of the Infant Jesus in Manufahi and Baucau; the Franciscan Sisters in Viqueque; and the PRR Sisters (Putri Renha Rosario, Daughters of the Queen of the Rosary) in Liquiçá.

180. As the Commission closed its district offices in March 2004, it decided to continue the Urgent Reparations Scheme but to limit it to specific communities or groups. It funded three Timorese NGOs to provide these support services: Assosiasi HAK, Fokupers and the women's NGO ET-Wave. A six-month programme was developed with each of the three organisations, using community development principles to offer support to victims. These programmes sought to work with victims and their communities, rather than singling out victims for individual support.

Results – the assistance provided

181. The cash grant component of the Urgent Reparations Scheme was distributed between September 2003 and March 2004. In this period, 516 men (73% of the recipients) and 196 women (27%) each received US$200 for a total of $142,400 to 712 survivors of human rights abuses.

182. All 156 participants in the healing workshops at the national headquarters of the Commission received the Urgent Reparations grant. Staff accompanied two of the recipients to Yogyakarta, Indonesia, where each was fitted with and trained in the use of a prosthetic limb.

183. In ten districts, 417 survivors – 322 men (77%) and 95 women (23%) – received the continuing support and assistance offered by local NGOs and church groups. This support included medicines, referral to district hospitals, and basic counselling and support, including home visits. The Commission hoped that once such links to local support mechanisms had been established, they would continue to provide assistance to the victim, although it recognised that the scarcity of resources at the local level might prevent that from happening.

184. The three NGOs, which the Commission contracted to provide support services after it left the districts, concentrated their efforts on particular groups or communities. Assosiasi HAK focused its work on the Kraras-Lalerik Mutin community of Viqueque. The Kraras community had suffered a series of massacres in 1983, and survivors were relocated to nearby Lalerik Mutin. Most of those who survived were women, and Lalerek Mutin is frequently called the "village of widows." In the six-month programme, Assosiasi HAK worked with the community to identify its particular needs, and established a community education centre.

185. Fokupers and ET-Wave offered follow-up support to the women who had given statements and participated in hearings or the Urgent Reparations Scheme. Fokupers worked in five districts: Dili, Liquiçá, Bobonaro, Ermera and Covalima. ET-Wave worked in Lautém. In addition to following-up with individual women, the organisations worked with communities to address the isolation that many victims, especially rural women, suffer.

David Rodriguez, recipient of a prosthetic limb

David Rodriguez was a young man at the time of the Indonesian invasion in 1975. He and his father were severely wounded during attacks from land and air by the Indonesian military. David's father's arm was injured so badly that he eventually died from infection. David had a leg wound that was treated with traditional remedies such as corn leaves and he survived. But, because he was trapped in the mountains without any access to medical services, infection set in and David's leg started to rot. For seven months his leg disintegrated, giving off such a powerful stench that he was forced to live in isolation. Each day his family brought him food and then left him. Eventually the rotten limb dropped away, and David treated the wounded stump with traditional medicine. He learned to walk again by using a stick. In 1979 he surrendered to the Indonesian military in Rotutu (Manufahi). The Indonesians treated other wounded Timorese; some were taken to Indonesia to be fitted with prosthetic limbs. However, because David was from the village of Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), which was known to be strongly pro-Fretilin, he did not receive any assistance.

After independence David gave his statement to the Commission. He participated in a Healing Workshop, where he was provided with a $200 Urgent Reparations grant. A Commission staff member accompanied him to Yogyakarta (Indonesia) where he spent two weeks being fitted with a prosthetic leg and trained in its use. On his return to Timor-Leste, he appeared at the Commission national office with a beaming smile. He proudly peeled off his shoe and sock to display his new leg to staff and friends. He commented to the Commission staff member who accompanied him to Yogyakarta:

Sometimes I think I'm dreaming. I am an illiterate, uneducated man, yet here I am riding airplanes, visiting other lands and getting this kind of assistance. I would like to thank Commission from the bottom of my heart for this.

Carminda dos Santos, a house of her own

When Indonesia invaded Timor-Leste in 1975 Carminda dos Santos, together with her husband and two young children, fled to the forest where her husband died.

On 14 July 1993 Carminda and her older brother were arrested by Indonesian soldiers and taken to the Koramil post in Bobonaro under suspicion of aiding their uncle, Martinho, who was a guerrilla in the forest. Carminda was also accused of involvement in the destruction of a statue of the Virgin Mary at the Malilait Grotto in Bobonaro Sub-district. Carminda and her brother were beaten severely. Their heads were smashed against a wall; they were kicked with army boots and their bodies trodden on. Since that time Carminda has suffered from convulsions.

After Carminda's home was looted and burned by militia in 1999, she and her daughter moved in with her older brother, but they were never completely comfortable because her brother constantly argued with her. Carminda felt that she and her child were neglected. They did not have their own house and neither the local government nor her own family helped her.

When the Commission district team began to take statements in Bobonaro, Carminda's daughter, Regina dos Santos, gave a statement that included the story of how in 1993 her mother and uncle had been tortured by soldiers at the Koramil in Bobonaro. She told about Carminda's nervous condition and loss of memory. Commission Victim Support staff visited Carminda to offer counselling. She was also given $200 as part of the Urgent Reparations Scheme. On a return visit several months later, Commission Victim Support staff observed improvements in Carminda's life. She had her own house, and her nerves and memory were returning to normal. Carminda was very happy and expressed profuse thanks to the Commission. Even if she and her daughter lived in only a small hut, it was their own.

How the grants were used

186. A grant US$200 was designed to be a large enough amount of money to allow the recipient to improve their quality of life in a practical way by undertaking some activity or buying goods or services that could help their recovery. Of course it was not sufficient to fund the costly, long-term interventions needed by many victims of serious human rights violations.

187. Grant recipients spent the money in a variety of ways. Commonly the money was used to pay for medical treatment, the education of children, and starting up income-generating pursuits, such as animal husbandry or gardening. Other uses included the purchase of food, clothing and shelter.

Use of the Urgent Reparations grant

While recipients of Urgent Reparations were free to spend the money however they wished, it was emphasised that the Commission hoped that the money would be used to make lasting improvements to their quality of life. For many, this was indeed the case.

"I used the money to buy medicine to treat my illness and now I feel a bit better. I feel well enough to do some light work. I used to cough severely and now I hardly cough," observed one survivor when visited several months after receiving her grant.

"When I received the money from Commission I used it to buy… traditional Timorese medicine and also medicine from the pharmacy to treat my illness. Ever since then I have been well," observed another survivor, adding that with the remaining money she also bought a pig for breeding and some groceries.

Manuel Laka Suri also used part of the money to improve his health. The rest he used "to pay people to tend my fields, buy groceries, and pay the children's school fees".

188. Most recipients were grateful to the Commission for the grant, although many also said that US$200 was not enough money to meet their needs. In the most serious cases of victims suffering from chronic health problems or deep poverty related to the abuse they had suffered, the grant could not make a real difference. Such victims need a sustainable reparations scheme. The Commission's recommendations on reparations address their plight (see Vol. IV, Part 11: Recommendations).

Responses from community members

Giving grants to selected individuals in Timor-Leste where poverty is the norm always carried risks. While many family and community members were sympathetic when they learned that a recipient had received a grant, some were jealous. Because of the possibility of an unfavourable community reaction, the Commission did not publicise the grants, and told recipients that as far as the Commission was concerned, they were confidential.

A man from Maliana (Bobonaro), concealed the receipt of the money from his community: "The money was a secret, so I didn't tell anyone and no one asked me about it."

A woman from Bobonaro also kept quiet about her grant:

I didn't tell anyone about the money because the Commission said it was confidential. I was afraid that if people heard, they would beat me up because there are many other victims who didn't receive money.

However, for some victims concealment was not possible. When community members heard that a neighbour had received money, their responses varied. Manuel Laka Suri's community, which fully appreciated his situation, praised the Commission for helping Manuel to treat his illness.

Members of Ponciano Maia's community were neither resentful nor actively supportive: "[The community] didn't create any problems for me because they know that I suffered greatly in the war, so they were silent."

Ponciano de Araújo had a very different experience. Some members of his community asked: "Why didn't we get any money? We are all victims."

Reflections on the scheme

189. The impact of Urgent Reparations assistance varied between recipients. It depended on, among other things, the person's physical and psychological state before receiving assistance, the type of need being addressed, and the person's family and social environment. Nevertheless, the commission believes that the scheme was successful in bringing about small, but meaningful, improvements in the quality of life of victims of human rights violations.

190. The scheme was also part of a broader strategy of giving official recognition to the suffering of victims and of seeking to develop a multi-faceted relationship with them. The first stage in this relationship began with victims giving a statement to the Commission. Some then went on to give testimony at public hearings; others participated in healing workshops, while others took part in community reconciliation hearings in their villages.

191. Many of the comments of people who participated in the Urgent Reparations Scheme emphasised the importance to them of this relationship with the Commission. A resident of the village of Ritabou-Tiimatan (Bobonaro) remarked: "I feel really happy because there are still some friends who take care of us." Expressing her feeling of vulnerability and lack of support as a victim, one resident of the village of Colegio (Bobonaro) commented:

I feel happy because the Commission is helping to keep an eye on the victims. Otherwise, we don't know who would. I feel happy because there is still a good Commission and NGOs like the Commission and CEP to help victims.

192. Ponciano de Araújo summed up the response of many victims when he said:

I want to thank all the friends working at Commission for recognising our struggle in the war and our great suffering and anxiety.

193. The number of victims who were direct beneficiaries of the Urgent Reparations Scheme was small compared with the 7,824 statements taken in the Commission's truth-seeking work. Nevertheless, the assistance made a practical difference to the lives of some of the most vulnerable victims. It also offered a degree of moral, emotional and spiritual support. As an interim measure that lasted only as long as the working life of the Commission, it demonstrated the commitment to ensuring that victims receive this kind of assistance. The Commission's Reparations Scheme, contained in Vol. IV, Part 11: Recommendations, outlines the Commission's recommendations on what needs to be done to continue and develop this work.

Community profiles

Background

194. Community Profile workshops added a group dimension to the District team victim support and truth-seeking work. Small groups from village communities discussed the impact of human rights abuses at the community level. The workshops were facilitated and recorded by the Victim Support members of the District team. Communities were thus able to examine the history of conflict from their own local perspective. The communal focus of the workshops also acknowledged the fact that communities, just as much as individuals, were victims in the years of conflict and needed support.

195. In most areas District teams used Community Profile workshops to introduce their programme to a community. As well as discussing the Commission's mandate and programmes, they engaged the community in a practical exercise, which was community-based and therefore accessible. By choosing the workshops as the entry point into the broader programme, the Commission wanted to show its respect for and gain an understanding of the distinctiveness of each community. Teams also had the opportunity to ask questions about particular groups in the community who might need extra support and whether community reconciliation activities might be appropriate.

196. Community Profile workshops were an important and enriching part of the Commission's work for a number of reasons:

- In rural Timor-Leste activities focused on the community rather than the individual were often a more culturally appropriate and effective way to discuss important issues. They were also a way of tapping into the rich oral traditions of rural communities.

- They were an opportunity to seek community views about what victims could do to help their recovery from past human rights abuses. Even in communities where there was not much discussion of community healing needs, the reflection on past experience could itself be a healing process.
- From a truth-seeking perspective, Community Profile workshops complemented the taking of statements from individuals. They were particularly useful in identifying broad social, economic and political patterns and the profound impact of human rights violations on communities over the 25 years of the mandate period.
- The accounts that emerged from the Community Profile workshops revealed how different communities and regions suffered in different ways and at different times throughout the conflicts. The national perspective does not offer such fine discriminations between areas, while individual statements do not give the broader community perspective.
- These stories bring us closer to an understanding of the situations of local communities today and in planning how to prevent conflict in the future.

Selection process

197. The Commission trained two district Victim Support staff, one woman and one man in each district, in participatory methods for facilitating the Community Profile workshops. Teams aimed to hold five community discussions in each sub-district. Participants in at least one of the five discussions were to be recent returnees, with priority given to those who were being ostracised by the communities to which they had returned. Another discussion group was to consist exclusively of women. The purpose of having women-only groups was to overcome women's reticence about taking an active part in group discussions, especially when what is under discussion is the traditional male preserve of recounting history,

198. Victim Support district staff together with the District Coordinator and Regional Commissioners were responsible for selecting which villages and special groups should hold a workshop. Selection was often based on local team members' prior knowledge of the area, or on information that emerged from the sub-district level meeting held at the start of the three-month sub-district programme. At these meetings sub-district officials, village heads, and community elders often identified villages with a high concentration of recently-returned refugees. They also selected women to participate in the women's discussion group, with priority given to women who had experienced violations or had been active in the Resistance.

199. In practice the number of Community Profile workshops held in each sub-district varied. Some teams did not meet the target of five community discussions, and others managed to hold workshops in every village in their district. Sometimes district staff held joint workshops in which two or more villages took part. In several sub-districts, as, for example in Natarbora Sub-district (Manatuto) and Bobonaro Sub-district (Bobonaro), communities with a history of conflict were intentionally brought together. Through truth-telling and the sharing of perspectives, communities were better able to understand the source of old enmities and so address them. In such cases, the workshops served as an instrument of reconciliation.

Community discussion eases historical tensions

Bobonaro is a large sub-district comprising 18 villages. The Commission District team decided it was important for all villages to take part in Community Profile workshops since all had suffered the impact of human rights violations between 1974 and1999 and all agreed to participate. Some villages held joint discussions.

The neighbouring villages of Oeleu, Tapo, and Leber were intentionally chosen for a joint discussion because they had a long history of conflict. For many decades the men of these villages had fought each other over community land and boundaries. During the civil conflict of 1974-1975 the tensions among the three villages exploded into violence. Although the Indonesian invasion and occupation put a stop to open conflict, communal and political differences were expressed through their different relations to the occupier. Feelings of distrust and the desire for revenge continued to fester below the surface, only to re-emerge following the Popular Consultation in August 1999.

In the Community Profile workshop, participants from the three villages openly made accusations against each other, revealing more clearly the nature of their historical conflict.

The people of Leber regarded the villages of Tapo and Oeleu as UDT strongholds, loyal to the Portuguese colonial administration. Villagers from Tapo had long been suspicious of Leber, first as an Apodeti village and then as a base for the Indonesian army Special Forces (Kopassus). The Tapo group accused Leber of killing civilians, while the people from Leber reminded those present that in the mid-1970s Fretilin supporters in Tapo and Oeleu had attacked Leber, burning hundreds of homes and causing the people of Leber to flee to the mountains. The participants from Oeleu, in turn, blamed Fretilin for the displacement in 1975 of hundreds of UDT supporters who sought refuge in the mountains of Covalima or fled to West Timor. Although later Tapo and Oeleu were both assumed to be bases of Fretilin support, before independence they were also known as fertile recruiting grounds for the pro-integration militia.

These initial suspicions and tensions began to fade, however, as each community related its own horrifying history of violations.

The participants from Oeleu noted that the Indonesian military killed hundreds of people from the village in 1975-1976. In 1978-1979 several hundred more died from illness and starvation. They recalled that about a hundred men from their village were captured and forcibly recruited by the Indonesian military. In 1986 the introduction of the Indonesian Family Planning Programme resulted in the death of four women in Oeleu. In the late 1990s around 80 people from the village joined clandestine organisations. Many of the youth of Oeleu came under suspicion, and were caught and tortured. The Indonesian military also responded to this development by forcing villagers to join Hansip (Pertahanan Sipil, Civil Defence). Those who refused were beaten and slashed with knives. In 1999 several youths were intimidated into joining the militia group, Dadurus Merah Putih. In the weeks leading up to the Popular Consultation they burned around 200 houses, looted others and killed six people. Many residents fled to the mountains before and after the ballot. About 200 families were evacuated to Atambua after the announcement of the result of the vote, where around 50 people died of disease and one was killed.

Participants from Tapo explained how their village was a UDT stronghold in 1974-75. It suddenly switched to join Fretilin in opposing Apodeti supporters from Leber, who, having sided with the Indonesian military, had murdered civilians and flown the Indonesian flag in a neighbouring village. In 1976-1977, the Indonesian military and Fretilin were continually engaged in armed conflict resulting in deaths on both sides, as well as the destruction of hundreds of houses around Tapo. Like the residents of Oeleu, Tapo villagers recalled how hundreds of their villagers suffered, first after evacuating to the forests and later when they were settled in camps in the neighbouring district of Ermera. Hundreds died due to hunger and illness. Tapo participants also knew of men who were forcibly recruited by the Indonesian military during the 1980s to take part in "Fence of Legs" operations.* They related how in 1999 youth from their village were captured and tortured at the Maliana military post, then forcibly recruited to become militia members. As in the case of Oeleu, Tapo's history of violation ended with villagers suffering from illness and hunger in refugee camps in West Timor.

Participants from Leber recalled how hundreds of their homes were looted and burned in August 1975 by a group of Fretilin fighters, including people from Tapo and Oeleu. Following the Indonesian invasion in December 1975, hundreds fled to the forests and neighbouring villages. In 1977-1978, about 100 Leber civilians died of starvation in the mountains and hundreds more died in ABRI attacks. In May 1982 all civilian males aged 17 and above were forced to take part in a "Fence of Legs" operation that lasted for up to one month. During the operation they were given no food but had to fend for themselves as they looked for Fretilin fighters on Mount Ramelau and in Manufahi, Ainaro and Atsabe. The people of Leber complained that they were always blamed for violence perpetrated by the Indonesian military. In the 1990s several village youth joined clandestine networks and collected money from their fellow villagers to help Falintil. In 1998 Special Forces captured six youth from Leber, killing one and torturing the others. When the Indonesian military formed the Dadurus Merah Putih militia in May 1999, more Leber youth were captured and beaten and many houses looted.

These historical overviews helped the participants to realise that none of the villages had had allegiance to a single political party, and that all of them had suffered at the hands of the Indonesian military. All had suffered displacement resulting in illness and starvation; all had experienced forced recruitment as well as forced evacuation from their homes; all reported instances of beatings and torture by Indonesian forces; and all had watched youth in their villages join forces with the Indonesian military to destroy their own communities. These common patterns of human rights violations gave villagers a new understanding of their past and a way to move on with less communal animosity towards each other.

This account is compiled from the CAVR Community Profiles of Oeleu, Tapo and Leber, Bobonaro Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 24 November 2003.

Participation

200. Although the range of people who took part in Community Profile workshops varied, regular participants included the village chief, political party representatives, members of youth and women's organisations, community elders, and local church leaders, individuals previously active in the clandestine movement, as well as victims and perpetrators of human rights violations. The Commission sought to achieve a balance of perspectives, though at times this was difficult.

201. Of the 297 Community Profile workshops compiled, three did not include a list of attendees. In the remaining 294 an average of 16 people were recorded as having attended each meeting, meaning that more than 4,700 people participated in the workshops across the country.

202. On average the proportion of men attending the workshops (76%) was far higher than the proportion of women. In 11.5% (31 out of 270) of the workshops open to both men and women, women did not participate at all. At the 24 meetings designated women-only meetings, an average of 15 women participated. In two of these women's meetings, a few men also attended and spoke.

203. All district teams noted that there was a lack of gender balance, both in attendance and in active participation in the discussion. Reasons given for the imbalance included the fact that women traditionally do not participate in public gatherings and that women's workload, particularly their responsibility for childcare, would keep many at home. It was thought that even when women did attend, many may have felt unable to speak in public about the violence they had experienced or did not feel comfortable speaking in the presence of their husbands.

204. It was easier for women to speak directly about violations, such as rape, when men were not present. If sexual violence was raised at all in the presence of men it was usually done obliquely, as when women spoke of having been damaged or broken. District teams addressed this formally through women-only meetings and sometimes informally by having a woman facilitator meet separately with the women attending a mixed workshop.

205. The women-only workshops were a valuable forum for understanding community experiences during the conflict. Their success in presenting a perspective that was often less blinkered by political allegiance suggests that more workshops of this type would be useful.

Community profile methodology

206. Workshops varied in duration from several hours to a whole day. During the workshop, Victim Support staff used historical timelines, sketch maps and focused group discussion to help community members trace their experiences of human rights violations chronologically and geographically.

207. Most sessions began with a recollection of violations between 1975 and1999. One facilitator explained how he would often begin discussions by asking participants questions such as: "Where were you in 1974-1975?" "Who introduced the different political parties into your village?" "How did you and your neighbours decide to join one party or another?" Such questions would stimulate further discussion, which generated historical overviews that, in general, were recorded as narrative text rather than drawn as an historical timeline.

208. The community experience was also elicited through the creation of sketch maps. In some cases, the sketch outline was drawn by a few individuals before the community discussion. For example, in Bobonaro District, team members and the village chief would survey the village before the workshop began to produce a sketch map showing areas of forest, gardens and rice paddies, markets, churches, health clinics and schools. This rough topographical/sociological map was then displayed during the workshop to help community members to recall human rights violations. As participants gave their accounts of violations in their community, more or less in chronological order, they were invited to show on the map where the violations occurred. This helped give a context for the discussion of specific issues. This approach tended to result in Community Profile reports that charted community histories better than an analysis of the social and economic impact of violations on the community.

209. By engaging in these discussions at the beginning of their work in communities, Regional Commissioners and staff developed trust and understanding. This helped with the implementation of other work, such as individual statement-taking, community reconciliation hearings and individual victim support work.

Sketch maps

210. An important feature of the workshops was the production of sketch maps. The maps, sometimes drawn by workshop participants, sometimes by Commission district staff, served to record violations as well as elicit memories of them. They were a particularly useful tool for stimulating discussion between community members who had low levels of literacy. They also revealed the prolonged terror in which many communities lived for 24 years.

211. Some maps used colour coding to distinguish events and their impact. For example, in some maps Falintil posts were marked by yellow and white flags so that they could be distinguished from Indonesian military posts that had red and white flags. Pink crosses were used to indicate places where people were murdered by the Indonesian military and blue crosses to mark sites of death due to starvation and illness, or death counts were highlighted by using pink or red markers (see Sketch Map 11 below). Some maps focused on events over a period of only a year or two; for others a longer timeframe was shown in different ways. For example Diagram 1 – Sketch Map Iliomar I (Iliomar, Lautém) used annotation to record period information, whereas Diagram 2 – Sketch Map Pairara Moro, (Lautém) added arrows to record abuses at the same location but at different points in history.

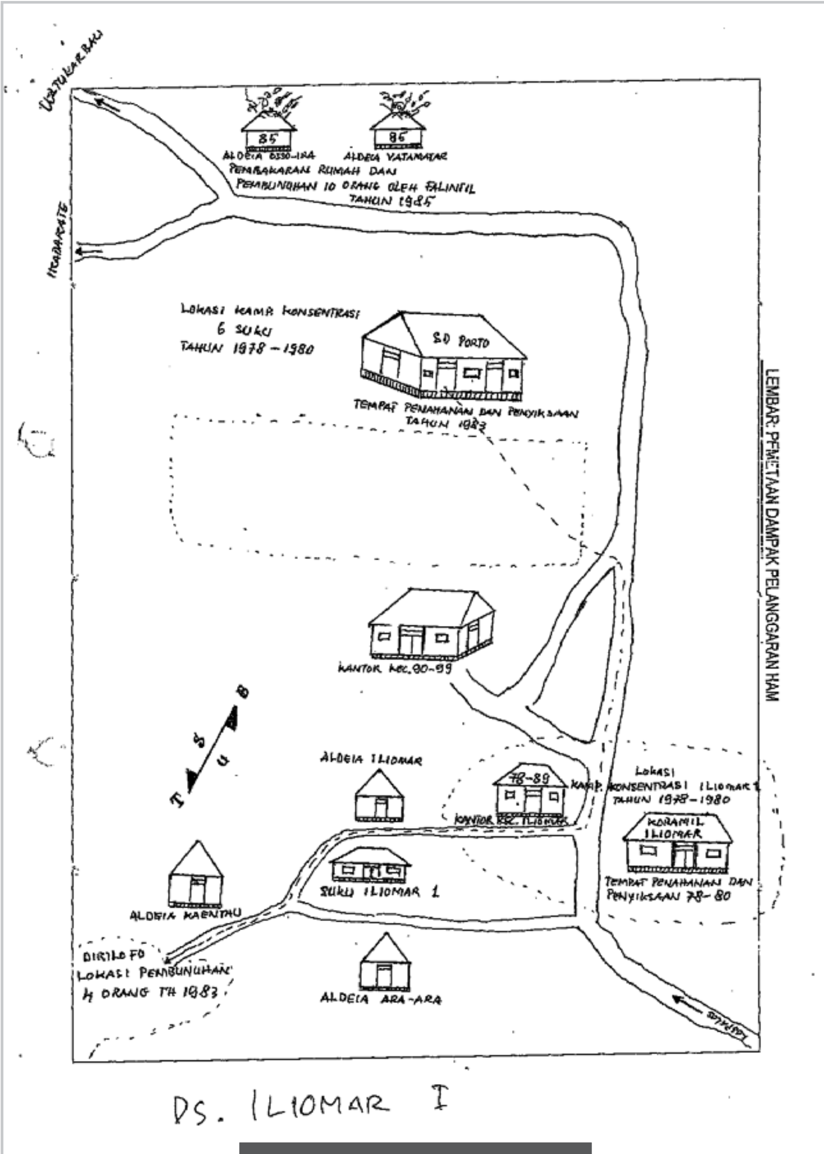

Diagram 1: Sketch Map Iliomar I

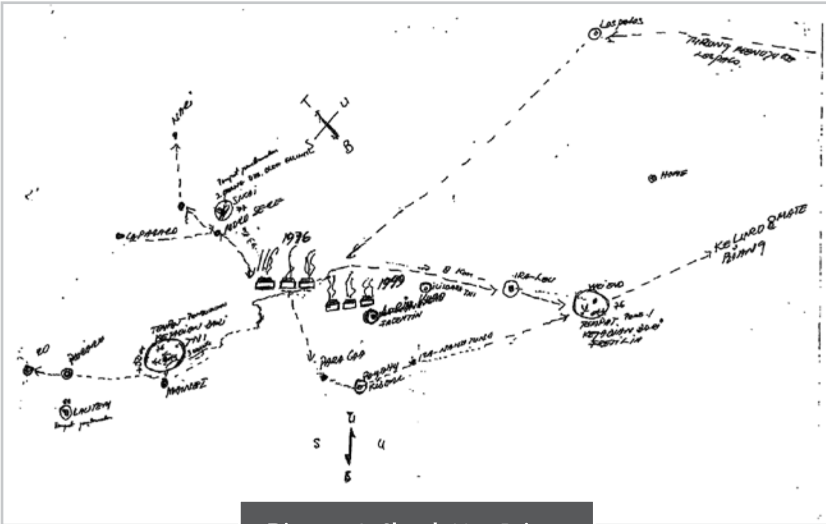

Diagram 2: Sketch Map Pairara

212. Other communities spanned the distance of time by producing more than one map. When placed side-by-side, sketch maps 3 and 4 from the community workshop in Beco 2/Tasilin (Zumalai, Covalima) graphically depict the upheaval this community experienced at the beginning and end of the Indonesian occupation, in 1975 and 1999. The 1977 map shows an army tank moving into the area, the 1999 map shows trucks of refugees being evacuated to Atambua. Both maps show armed soldiers, houses burning, and villagers fleeing to the mountains.

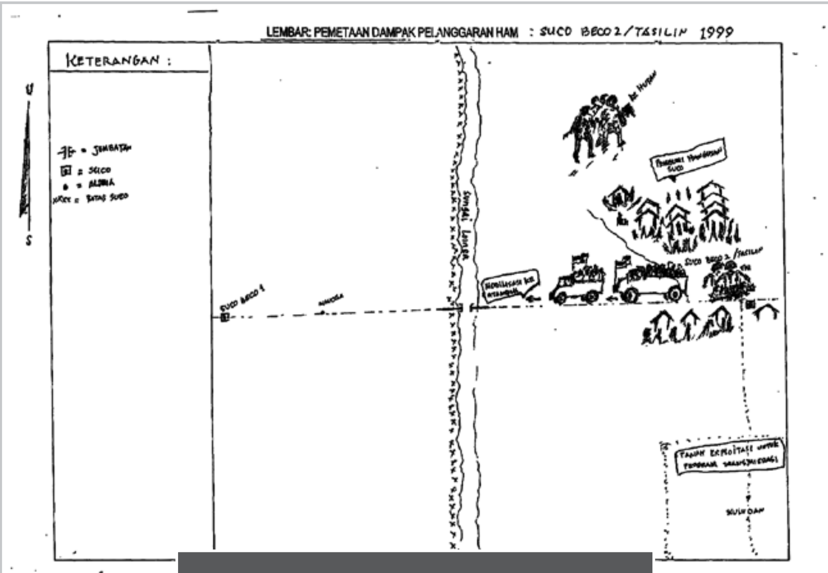

Diagram 4: Sketch Map Beco 2/Tasilin 1999

213. Sketch Map from Guda village (Lolotoe, Bobonaro) and Sketch Map from Osso-Huna (Baguia, Baucau) give two renderings of aerial bombardment of villages and of villagers hiding in the mountains.

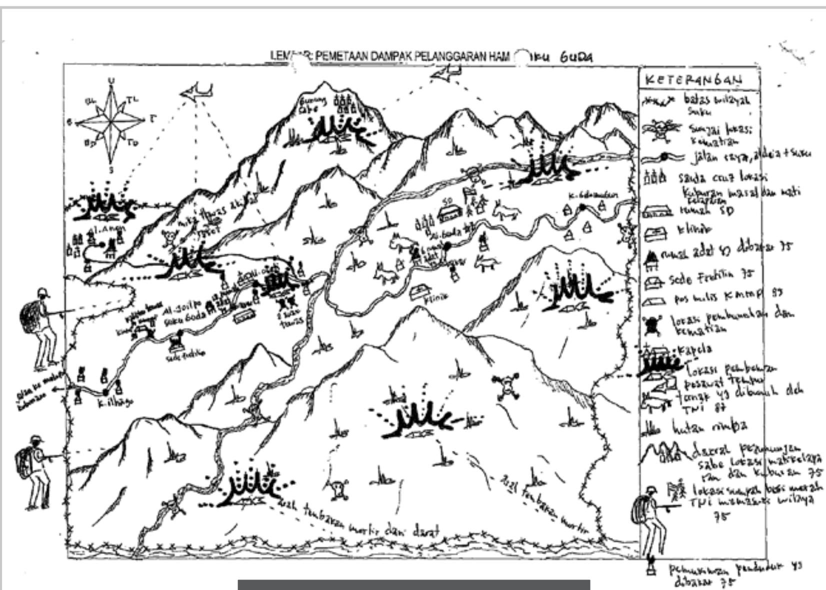

Diagram 5: Sketch Map Guda

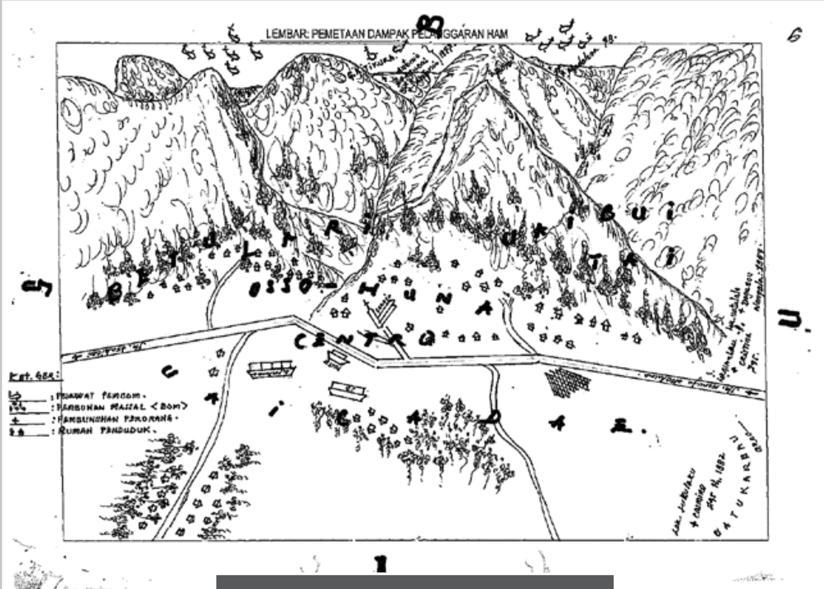

Diagram 6: Sketch Map Osso-Huna

214. A few maps indicate victim counts by means of annotation and the insertion of crosses as seen in the Sketch Map of Uaitame (Quelicai, Baucau). More common, however, is the insertion of skull and crossbones, a simple technique able to convey trauma by the sheer weight of repeated images as seen in the Sketch Map of Caimauk (Turiscai, Manufahi), the Sketch Map of Ura-Hoci (Hatolia, Ermera), and the Sketch Map of Mahaklusin (Alas, Manufahi).

215. Taken together, the sketch maps produced by Commission community meetings – from more rudimentary maps like the Sketch Map of Rasa (Lospalos, Lautém) to the more detailed Sketch Map of Miligu (Cailaco, Bobonaro), to maps like the Sketch Map of Taiboco (Pantai Makasar, Oecussi) that charts violations in motion – offer visual images that begin to capture the collective impact of human rights violations in Timor-Leste from 1974 to 1999.

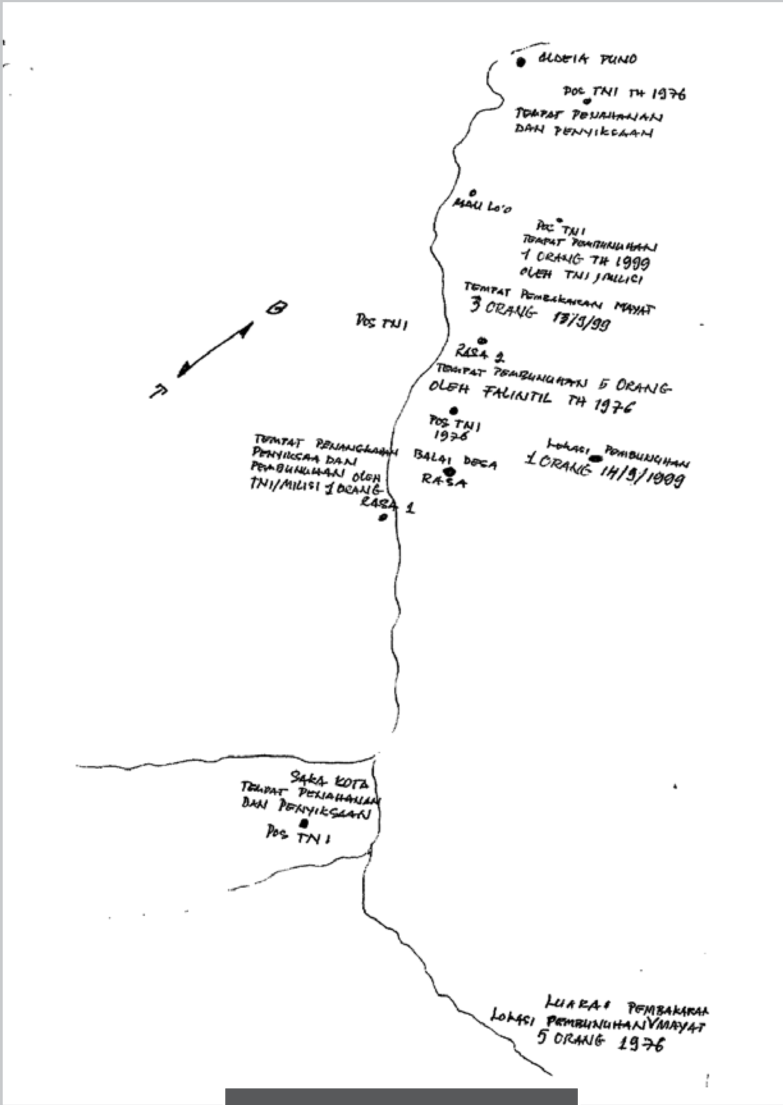

Diagram 11: Sketch Map Rasa

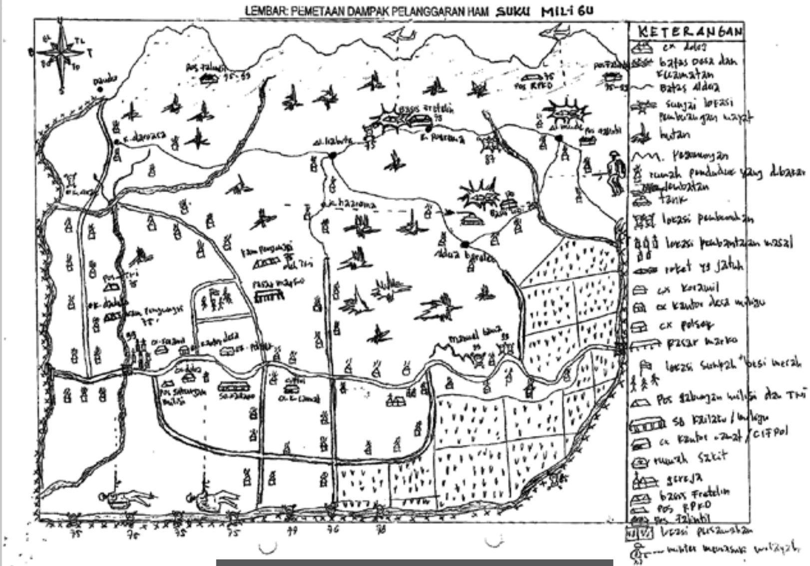

Diagram 12: Sketch Map Miligu

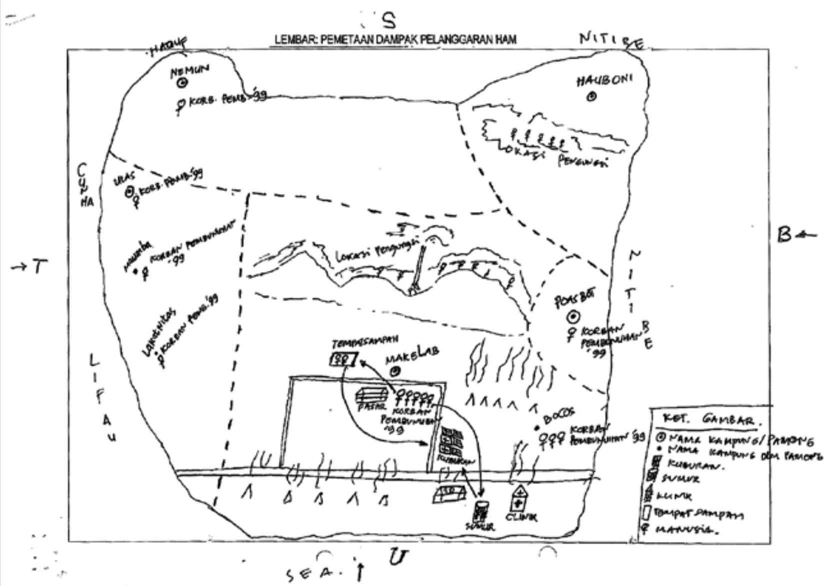

Diagram 13: Sketch Map Taiboco

216. Sketch Map 14: Beidasi (Fatululik, Covalima) is a reminder that, despite the scope and magnitude of the violence in Timor-Leste, in local communities its impact was never anonymous. The map's poignancy is captured in the names written by each house that give identity by ownership, residency, and community. It is the juxtaposition between this close-knit community, where everyone knows and is connected to each other, and just a few short annotations – "Veronica died here" next to a double black and pink cross to indicate that she was killed by the militia, "82 killed by TNI" written below a pink cross, and "30 children die" written above a black cross to indicate death by starvation – that is striking. It turns an otherwise ordinary neighbourhood map into a document that records a history of violence and suffering in a community: for years violations occurred in the neighbourhood of Alberto and Carlos, Martinho and Mausesu, and to so many other individuals and families.

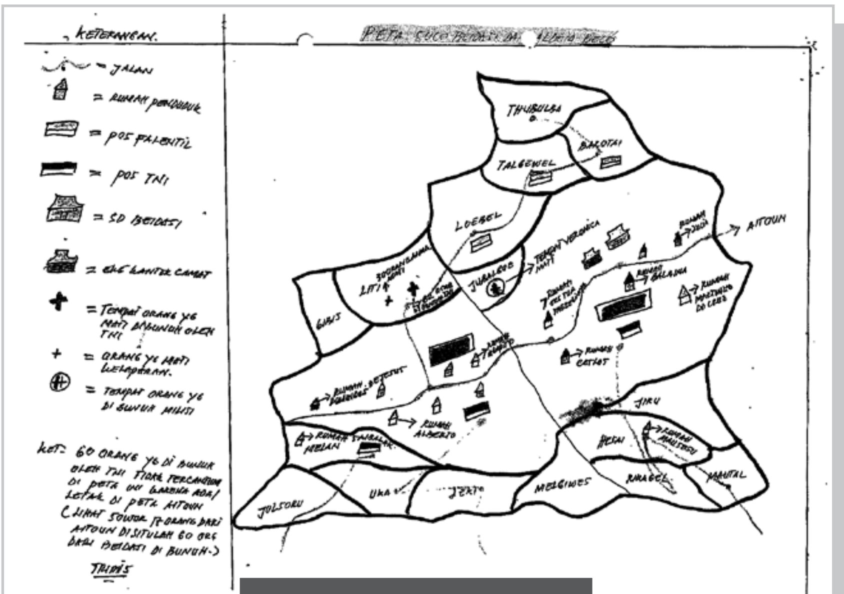

Diagram 14: Sketch Map Beidasi

Impact

217. Community Profile workshops gave many rural communities a sense of respect and acknowledgment by listening to and recording their experiences as part of an official national truth-telling process.

218. All district teams reported positive feedback from village communities, which were grateful for an opportunity to speak about their experiences during the conflicts. Because the discussions were communal rather than private, moments of catharsis or insight about the past became part of the community's experience, much as they did in Victims' Hearings.

219. The workshops did not provide empirical data to be tabled and analysed in a way that would allow regional comparisons to be made. The value of the material gathered in these workshops is in its detail and local focus. Weaknesses in the information include that it was usually not possible for communities to give statistically accurate figures of the number of people who died from starvation or in the large military campaigns that totally disrupted community life. Dates of events were not always specific or accurate, and figures in relation to property, such as livestock destroyed, were often generalised. Further, the stories told depended on the participants who attended – their age and therefore the reliability and extent of their memories, their literacy, their gender, and also their political affiliation. For example, if most participants were members of a particular party, this could be an obstacle to discussion of violations committed by that party.

220. Whatever their shortcomings as tools for seeking the truth, at the very least Community Profiles were able to present the broad sweep of a community's experience over the 25-year span of the political conflicts. But they often did far more than that by giving insight into the impact on communities of both general phenomena like mass displacement and forced recruitment, and specific events like the Mau Chiga uprising, and the Kraras and Santa Cruz massacres as well as many other incidents which had hitherto not been recognised outside the locality where they occurred.

Lessons learned

Reception (acolhimento), returnees and West Timor

221. State and non-state actors in Timor-Leste need to continue to work with East Timorese in West Timor. This work needs to focus on building trust and mutual understanding, sharing information, and helping those who decide to return to Timor-Leste. This work can be carried out only if there is cooperation between East Timorese and Indonesian state and non-state institutions. One essential element of building trust among East Timorese in West Timor is that the engagement between East Timorese on both sides of the border should not be fitful, but should display a continuing commitment to their needs.

222. The work of the Commission with East Timorese in West Timor represents a contribution to a process that began before the Commission came into existence, and will continue after its mandate has expired. While the support of the international community will be vital to achieving this continuity, that support will not be forthcoming without a clear, high-level commitment from the Government of Timor-Leste to this work.

223. Any future work in this area will have to address a number of difficult issues. They include:

- Finding ways to talk to refugees about reconciliation in a constructive manner. One obstacle to constructive discussion is the gap between those who see reconciliation as a political issue linked to amnesty for past crimes, and those who see it as a social issue of healing divisions between people and communities. The fact that the hierarchy of power in West Timor has solidified these differences of perspective makes them particularly difficult to remove.

- Continuing to seek ways to overcome obstacles to women participating fully in decision-making about their and their families' futures.
- Building on the partnerships, experience and good-will developed with individual Indonesians and Indonesian government and non-government institutions.

224. There needs to be continuing support to reintegrate those who return to their communities and to the communities that receive them. Reintegration is not an instant process, but one that requires constant attention and support over a period of time. Mutual trust and confidence will return only gradually. While much of the work of reintegration is essentially for individuals, families and communities to undertake, with help from locally-based institutions such as the Church and traditional leaders, the Commission's experience in this area is that the latter can benefit from the support of a legitimate and respected national institution.

Urgent reparations

225. The Commission's Urgent Reparations Programme helped a number of the most disadvantaged victims to meet their pressing needs. The scheme offered both financial and non-financial assistance, to individuals and communities. Through this work the Commission was able to develop a clearer understanding of the strengths and weaknesses of different types of reparations schemes in the Timorese context, and thereby develop recommendations for a more comprehensive approach.

226. The Commission understands that its Urgent Reparations Scheme was a stop-gap measure that could in no way be regarded as a substitute for a comprehensive, long-term programme.

227. The Commission is convinced that there is a pressing need for a comprehensive and multi-faceted reparations programme to be established beyond the Commission. This programme should address the needs of victims by offering formal recognition of victims by preserving and honouring their memory, and the provision of social services and economic assistance. It should be targeted at individual and community levels.

228. The Commission has learned that it is hard to attract financial support for a reparations scheme, from national and international sources. Politicians, policy makers and others in a position to provide funding too often subsume reparations programmes within the domain of general national development. Reparations should not be treated in this way: they play a complementary role to national development, but also quite distinct in that they are fundamental to delivering justice and human rights protection in our post conflict society. This issue is addressed more thoroughly in Vol 4, Part 11: Recommendations.

Victims

229. In its work with victims over the three years of its existence, the Commission learnt much. The quiet strength and resilience of many survivors, their dignity and generosity towards others, and their wish to participate in shaping their new nation are inspiring. Families, communities and the values of Timorese culture have sometimes been able to help sustain and heal victims. At other times they have been an obstacle to healing. We have also learned that many people's lives are difficult today because of the violence they have suffered. Once they have attained a certain level of security, whether physical, mental or economic, individuals, families and communities can do much to effect their own healing. But they also often need outside help, in the form of physical and mental health services, education and training, the means to restore economic sustainability, recognition and a sense that the State cares for their well-being.

230. Health, including mental health, is evidently an area for future victim support work. The experience of violence and loss can have profound consequences for victims' mental health and well-being. The Healing Workshops were an opportunity to learn more about victims' needs in this area, to provide support, and to refer people to specialised services when they were available. The Commission also worked with a combined community and mental health team from the University of New South Wales to develop a preliminary assessment of the needs of victims of human rights violations in light of the Commission's findings in this area.

231. The Commission found that many victims of serious human rights violations continue to suffer health problems as a result of their abuse. The Commission has encountered victims who have bullets lodged in their bodies, wounds that have not healed, bones that have not been properly set, gynaecological problems resulting from rape, and a variety of physical disabilities caused by prolonged or repeated torture. Without attention to their health needs, these victims will not be able to take up their rightful place as active citizens of Timor-Leste.

232. These findings highlight the need for a thorough assessment that can form the basis of a health support programme that would be part of the proposed reparations scheme.

233. The Commission has identified certain specific groups in the community that seem to be particularly vulnerable to mental health problems. These groups' problems are not confined to mental illnesses requiring clinical treatment, but cover the whole spectrum of mental well-being that allows a person to thrive and live a full life. Justice, compassion and the quest for a fair and inclusive society all demand measures to restore mental and physical well-being to victims who have lost them as a result of an act of abuse. The groups that the Commission identified as high-risk and which should therefore be the focus of any future programme are set out below.

Rape survivors

234. Through the healing workshops and other activities, it became clear that women who had been raped were more likely to suffer symptoms of trauma than other victims of violations. This may partly be because many women raped or forced into situations of sexual slavery by the Indonesian military reported that they were shunned by their family and community, and thereby lost the support necessary for healing and mental well-being. The plight of women who had children as a result of rape, or being in a situation of sexual slavery, was even worse. There are communities, such as Suai, where women were subjected to mass rape after the Popular Consultation in 1999, where large numbers of women are in need of support.

235. The Commission found that in general young women raped during the violence of 1998-99 suffered more severe and more persistent symptoms of trauma than their older counterparts who had suffered rape in earlier periods of the conflict. The explanation for this difference may be that the older women were more often able to rely on support deriving from their established roles as family and community members, whereas the violation seemed to have prevented many of the younger women from developing these roles. At the same time, the older group were generally less forthcoming about their experiences and so, if in need of support, less likely to obtain it.

Young men, especially in urban areas

236. In the political conflicts in Timor-Leste young men constituted a group that frequently suffered and perpetrated violence. The emergence of a clandestine movement in the 1980s resulted in many young people becoming engaged in resistance activities. Others were involved in groups formed by the Indonesian military to respond to the Resistance. The education of many of these young men was disrupted by their involvement in clandestine activities, periods of imprisonment and serious injuries suffered as a result of torture and ill treatment.

237. Many of these young people were teenagers in the 1990s, and are now in their twenties or early thirties. Lacking education and training, many today feel excluded from opportunity in the new Timor-Leste that they see themselves as having helped create. Unlike young women, who often have a social role maintaining household and family, many young men live on the margins of society. The Commission observed anger and frustration among many young male survivors. Their isolation is exacerbated by the cultural constraints that inhibit males from seeking assistance or speaking about emotionally difficult matters. Lack of work or educational opportunities intensify their problems.

238. These issues place many young men at risk of mental health problems. Coupled with their intense experience of violence in their younger years, this also raises issues of domestic and social stability. Such young men should be a high priority for future support.

Disabled middle-aged men

239. The Commission has observed that many middle-aged male victims had “broken bodies” as a result of torture or severe, often repeated, beatings. Especially for rural men, whose livelihood depends on being able to farm their land, these disabilities have serious economic consequences. Many expressed anxiety and showed signs of stress because they were not able to provide for their families, and the impact this would have on their children's education and future opportunities. Unable to fulfil their social role of family provider, many of these men are vulnerable to mental health problems.

Ex-political prisoners and torture survivors

240. The Commission heard repeatedly how the Indonesian security forces routinely tortured those they detained. It also heard of torture and ill-treatment perpetrated in the early years of the conflict by East Timorese political parties. The psycho-social consequences of torture are well documented. The Commission worked closely with many ex-political prisoners and survivors of torture. In some cases, political prisoners showed themselves able to cope well with post-traumatic stress. However, the Commission also heard from many ex-political prisoners that they hold their suffering deep inside themselves. While they appear to cope in their day-to-day lives, they continue to suffer. Some victims told the Commission that their deep-seated feelings sometimes erupt in violence within the family. Former detainees are a high-risk group that should be supported in future programmes.

Victims and families of victims of violence by Fretilin/Falintil 241. The Commission heard about the silence that has surrounded violence committed by East Timorese political parties, especially in the 1975 internal conflict and then between 1976 and 1979 when Fretilin still controlled and administered territory in the interior. Many victims or families of those killed or disappeared have expressed their desire to clear the names of family members and friends. The lack of recognition of both the violence, the losses suffered by families and the injustice of their treatment has caused the deep suppression of feelings and the isolation of people in this category. Without public recognition that these events occurred, it is difficult for those affected to come forward to seek the support they may need.

The future

242. The identification of groups most in need of support is not intended to minimise the needs of individual victims or of communities whose experience does not fit into these categories. It does underline the fact that there are specific groups in need of support within the East Timorese community, and that support programmes tailored to their needs should be developed. A comprehensive needs assessment must be carried out before an appropriate reparations programme can be designed. It is also vital that the Government, East Timorese NGOs and other civil society groups, and religious organisations, as well as international agencies and donors, continue to provide support and step up their efforts to alleviate the suffering of so many victims of human rights violations. Based on the lessons we have learned from working with victims of human rights violations, the Commission has developed a Reparations Scheme which is outlined in Vol 4, Part 11: Recommendations.

11 Recommendations

In an independent East Timor, the children and youth shall represent our hope in the future, and the protection and promotion of their rights shall always be a priority. Their education shall be based on cultivating love and respect for life, peace, justice and equality so that a new world can be built on the ruins of war.

Magna Carta concerning Freedoms, Rights, Duties and Guarantees for the People of East Timor adopted by the National Council of East Timorese Resistance (CNRT), Peniche, Portugal, 25 April 1998.

What's the point of continually collecting information from us if there's nothing to show for it?

Community of Lalerek Mutin, Viqueque

Introduction

The Commission is required to make "recommendations concerning reforms and other measures whether legal, political or administrative which could be taken to achieve the objectives of the Commission, to prevent the repetition of human rights violations and to respond to the needs of victims of human rights violations" (Regulation 10/2001, Section 21.2).

The thousands of first-hand testimonies of victims and witnesses that were given to the Commission have provided this nation and the international community with a clear picture of the intense suffering of the East Timorese people between 1974 and 1999. This suffering was primarily caused by violations against individual citizens committed by state agents particularly after 1975. It was made possible due to the climate of impunity that prevailed for most of this period due on the one hand to the absence of democratic checks and balances on the Indonesian military within the Indonesian system and, on the other hand, to the tolerance by the international community of the Indonesian government's excesses in the conduct of its affairs.

The Commission has been given the duty to make recommendations that, if implemented, will assist in preventing a recurrence of the violations of the past. As most of the human rights violations recorded in this report were committed by the state and the state has primary responsibility to uphold human rights, prevention must be focussed on ensuring that the actions of state agents do not once again become alienated from legal obligations and the will of the general population. Members of the military, police, intelligence services, judiciary and government agencies must at all times remain strictly accountable to the people, the law and internationally agreed standards. For its part the international community must not only enunciate standards but insist, through all the measures available to it, that these standards are complied with particularly at this stage when the architecture of the new state is still being developed.

History teaches us that nations recovering from long conflict face a difficult task to develop the democratic institutions and laws that can protect and guarantee human rights. Some nations fail to meet this challenge and revert to violence. It should not be taken for granted that human rights will automatically be protected in Timor-Leste. Vigilance against the kind of practices that lead to violations needs to be constant.

The need for vigilance is demonstrated by the fact that although the vast majority of serious violations examined by the Commission were committed by members of the Indonesian security forces, these perpetrators were both Indonesian and East Timorese members of the forces. Although the worst periods were during the military occupation, violations were also committed by East Timorese against their brothers and sisters during the struggle for power in the internal armed conflict of 1975 and within the Resistance especially in 1977. The proper safeguards of a democratic state need to be put in place, strengthened where they already exist, and applied and respected by all the institutions and citizens of Timor-Leste.

These recommendations have been made in the spirit of building a future for our children who must be guaranteed that the violence of the past shall not be repeated. We must learn from the past in order that every child in Timor-Leste can fulfill his and her potential.

The Commission commends the national leaders of Timor-Leste, the elected representatives who developed the Constitution, our members of Parliament and Church leaders and those in government, civil society and the business community who strive to build a nation based on the principles of the Constitution and international human rights. They are motivated by values and objectives born from our painful past which have also been given powerful expression in the Magna Carta of human rights formulated by the National Council of Timorese Resistance (CNRT) in 1998 and the policies of all East Timorese political parties. In recognition of these commitments and out of a deep conviction based on our inquiry, the Commission makes these recommendations acknowledging that this is a long-term process requiring sustained commitment and action.

The recommendations are organised as follows:

- Timor-Leste and the international community
- Timor-Leste and Portugal
- Human rights in Timor-Leste: protecting and promoting all rights for all
- Human rights in Timor-Leste: protecting and promoting the rights of the vulnerable
- Human rights in Timor-Leste: protecting and promoting rights through effective institutions
- Human rights in Timor-Leste: security services that protect and promote human rights
- Truth and justice
- Reconciliation in the general community
- Reconciliation in the political community
- Reconciliation with Indonesia
- Acolhimento (Reception)
- Reparations
- Follow-on institution.

Recommendations

1. Timor-Leste and the international community

The relationship of Timor-Leste to other nations was defined by the nature of the political conflicts between 1974 and 1999. The conflict in Timor-Leste was not primarily an internal conflict but one of foreign intervention, invasion and occupation that caused the people of Timor-Leste great suffering and loss and violated international law and human rights which the international community was duty bound to protect and uphold. While these relationships have evolved since the intervention of the United Nations in 1999, there are a number of steps to be taken which will assist the building of this new nation and its international relations and will ensure that Timor-Leste's experience is not repeated in other situations.

The Commission recommends that:

1.1. This Report is given the widest possible distribution at all levels in the international community through the media, internet and other networks and particularly within the United Nations and those individual nations and institutions that are highlighted in the Report, viz. Australia, China, Britain, France, Indonesia, Japan, Portugal, Russia, US, the Catholic Church, as well as the East Timorese diaspora and international civil society organisations.

1.2. This Report is disseminated at all levels in the Community of Portuguese Language Countries (Communidade dos Paises de Lingua Portuguesa - CPLP) with a view to it contributing to greater understanding of Timor-Leste as the newest member of the Community.

1.3. This Report is disseminated at all levels in each of the countries of the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) in order to deepen appreciation of Timor-Leste's recent history and its needs as a new candidate member of this important regional body.

1.4. The Vatican and the governments of China, Britain, France, Japan, and Russia make available to Timor-Leste their classified and other archival material on the period 1974-1999 so that this information can be added to that already provided by other countries to ensure that Timor-Leste, after so many years of isolation, can build a comprehensive depository of information on its history.

1.5. The UN Secretary-General refers the Report to the Security Council, the General Assembly, the Special Committee on Decolonisation and the UN Commission on Human Rights, and requests that each of these bodies devotes a special session to discussion and reflection on the Report and the lessons to be learned from its contents and findings.

1.6. The states that had military cooperation programmes with the Indonesian Government during the Commission's mandate period, whether or not this assistance was used directly in Timor-Leste, apologise to the people of Timor-Leste for failing to adequately uphold internationally agreed fundamental rights and freedoms in Timor-Leste during the Indonesian occupation.

1.7. The Permanent Members of the Security Council, particularly the US but also Britain and France, who gave military backing to the Indonesian Government between 1974 and 1999 and who are duty bound to uphold the highest principles of world order and peace and to protect the weak and vulnerable, assist the Government of Timor-Leste in the provision of reparations to victims of human rights violations suffered during the Indonesian occupation.

1.8. Business corporations which profited from the sale of weapons to Indonesia during the occupation of Timor-Leste and particularly those whose material was used in Timor-Leste contribute to the reparations programme for victims of human rights violations.

1.9. All UN member states refuse a visa to any Indonesian military officer who is named in this Report for either violations or command responsibility for troops accused of violations and take other measures such as freezing bank accounts until that individual's innocence has been independently and credibly established.

1.10. States regulate military sales and cooperation with Indonesia more effectively and make such support totally conditional on progress towards full democratisation, the subordination of the military to the rule of law and civilian government, and strict adherence with international human rights, including respect for the right of self-determination.

1.11. The governments of Australia, Britain and New Zealand undertake a joint initiative to establish the truth about the deaths of the six foreign journalists in Timor-Leste in 1975 so that the facts and accountability are finally established.

1.12. The international Church, led by the Vatican, honours Dom Martinho da Costa Lopes and the Catholic sisters, priests and laity who were killed in 1999 seeking to protect the people of Timor-Leste.

1.13. The Government of Timor-Leste, with the support of the United Nations, honours the contribution of international civil society to the promotion of human rights in Timor-Leste, particularly the right of self-determination, and invites civil society organisations to contribute their documentation on this struggle to the people of Timor-Leste as a tool for remembering and fostering ongoing relations and solidarity.

1.14. Support, both practical and financial, be given by business, philanthropic bodies, corporations and academic institutions to assist key East Timorese figures and others to document their histories and experiences in order to build up the limited stock of East Timorese-generated literature for future generations.

2. Timor-Leste and Portugal

The Commission recommends that the Portuguese Government:

2.1. Formally acknowledges receipt of this Report, refers it to the Parliament of Portugal and implements the recommendations relevant to Portugal that it contains.

2.2. Supports financially and logistically the dissemination of the Report and its related products through the relevant sectors of Portuguese society and within the Community of Portuguese Language Countries (CPLP).

2.3. Assists the Government of Timor-Leste in the provision of reparations to victims of human rights violations from the conflicts in Timor-Leste.

2.4. Provides copies of relevant official archival material on Timor-Leste from 1960 on to the people of Timor-Leste as an essential part of our national heritage and assists Portuguese civil society organisations, the media and the Portuguese Church to provide material in their possession to Timor-Leste.

2.5. Conducts an audit of artifacts and other cultural property of East Timorese origin currently in Portugal with a view to repatriation to Timor-Leste in order to assist in the conservation, development and diffusion of its culture in accordance with the right to cultural self-determination and the principles of the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights.

2.6. Promotes two-way relations with Indonesia, bearing in mind Portugal's long historical links with the region and the changed situation in Timor-Leste, in order to deepen mutual understanding and cooperation, particularly at the level of people-to-people relationships, and contribute jointly to Timor-Leste.

3. Human rights in Timor-Leste: promoting and protecting all rights for all

The violence of war in Timor-Leste was not restricted to combatants but also resulted in violations of the human rights of civilians. Civil and political rights and freedoms were violated during the conflict, including the right to life itself and the rights to security of person, participation and the basic human freedoms essential to human dignity and development. The long period of conflict also impacted on the economic, social and cultural rights of the people of Timor-Leste including on the standard of living, health, family welfare and education.

Through the creation of the CNRT Magna Carta and the nation's Constitution and the ratification of the International Covenants on Civil and Political Rights and Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, Timor-Leste has demonstrated its commitment to break with the past and to promote and protect all rights for all.

The Commission recommends that:

3.1.1. The Government of Timor-Leste adopts a human rights approach to governance, policy-making and development so that all decisions across the whole government system are informed by human rights principles.

3.1.2. The Government takes all measures necessary to ensure the implementation of the rights it has committed to uphold through its ratification of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and other treaties.

3.1.3. The Government uses its human rights treaty reporting to the United Nations as a tool to evaluate its progress in implementing all human rights for all and that these reports are made widely available for public discussion in Timor-Leste.

3.2. The right to life, to freedom from hunger and to an adequate standard of living

Large numbers of East Timorese people were killed or died during the CAVR mandate period from conflict related causes, including massacres. Most deaths resulted from preventable famine during the early years of the Indonesian military occupation in violation of the "fundamental right of everyone to be free from hunger" (International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights: Art. 11.2).

The Commission recommends that:

3.2.1. Families be assisted to locate and to re-bury the remains of relatives and loved ones who perished during the conflict and that, where resources permit, exhumation according to appropriate standards is carried out to allow for identification and establishment of the cause of death.

3.2.2. In consultation with families and the community, significant sites of killings or deaths be memorialised in honour of the victims.

3.2.3. A public register of the disappeared be established and, in collaboration with the Government of Indonesia, a systematic inquiry is undertaken to establish the whereabouts and fate of those on the list.

3.2.4. The Parliament determines an annual day of national remembrance of the famine of 1978-1979 in order to remember those who perished from hunger and related causes at that time and to encourage discussion, research and educational activities on contemporary food security issues in Timor-Leste, including effective disaster preparedness.

3.2.5. In case of a humanitarian disaster causing people to leave their homes, the Government acts according to the UN Guiding Principles on Internal Displacement (E/CN.4/1998/53/Add.2, 11 February 1998).

3.2.6. The Government develops and implements policies that ensure that the fruits of development are enjoyed equitably, reaching the most isolated communities, benefiting and involving men and women, children, the elderly and the disabled, and providing opportunities to those who are most disadvantaged.

3.3. Right to security of person

The right to security of person is upheld in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights but for most of the period 1974-1999 the people of Timor-Leste experienced constant personal insecurity in many forms. This included arbitrary detention, torture, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment, interrogation, invasion of privacy and unfair trials.

The Commission recommends that:

3.3.1. Buildings in all parts of Timor-Leste that were regular sites of detention be recorded in a national register, along with information about those detained and the conditions of detention in these places, and that selected sites are memorialised with a name plate or in other appropriate ways.

3.3.2. Individuals who continue to suffer physically or mentally from torture or other forms of inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment experienced during the conflict have their condition professionally diagnosed and be assisted with counselling and other forms of rehabilitation.

3.3.3. Law enforcement agencies adhere to the highest standards of due process in relation to the carrying out of arrests, investigations after arrest, access to counsel and detention in custody, as required by domestic law and human rights standards.

3.3.4. The Government applies at all times a policy of open access to outside monitoring of all prisons in Timor-Leste, by institutions of the state, East Timorese civil society and international organisations.

3.3.5. The Government ensures the establishment and maintenance of proper procedures to guarantee that prisoners are held in conditions which respect their human dignity, including:

- Access to full medical care for all people held in custody
- Adequate food and water for all people held in custody
- Proper procedures for holding of child and youth prisoners, including being held separately from adult prisoners
- Proper procedures for holding women and men prisoners in separate facilities
- Provision for the worship of religion
- Development of a programme of rehabilitation of prisoners, in order to help them prepare to return to daily social and economic life and be a full, participating member of the community. Such programmes should be adequately funded
- Strict rules and procedures preventing the use of any kind of torture or sexual abuse of those held in custody
- Strict procedures for the use of solitary confinement. Solitary confinement should only be allowed temporarily and exceptionally on the basis of a court order warranting it. Strict physical and mental health procedures should be developed and implemented for those held in solitary confinement
- Development and implementation of ongoing human rights training for all corrections services personnel, including high ranking personnel.

3.4. Right to security of person: a national commitment to non-violence

For the greater part of the conflict, the people of Timor-Leste were exposed to widespread violence. The conflict between the principal political parties in 1975 degenerated into short-term physical violence in many communities, and Indonesia used military firepower and strength of numbers to force its will on the people of Timor-Leste and maintain its presence at huge cost to many throughout the 24 years of the conflict. The effective use of power depends on cooperation. In a culture of violence and fear, however, force is the preferred way to resolve issues and maintain control and those in power can come to assume an attitude of arrogant superiority over others. Once embedded a culture of violence can become normal and corrupt relations at all levels and in many different ways including between officials and citizens, men and women, employers and staff, teachers and students, parents and their children.

On the other hand, the East Timorese Resistance, the Church and international civil society earned respect and support for their creative use of dialogue and non-violent strategies to achieve their goals of self-determination and independence.

The Commission recommends that:

3.4.1. The people of Timor-Leste explore ways of reflecting deeply on both their negative experience of violence – its origins, uses and impact – and on their positive experience of dialogue and non-violence to achieve their political goals, and how the important lessons from these experiences can be further creatively used to promote a culture of respect, justice and peaceful resolution of conflict in all areas of life in Timor-Leste.

3.4.2. Political parties continue their practice of solemnly renouncing the use of violence in the political process and take the strongest possible stand against any in their midst who advocate violence, compromise the professional impartiality of the police and military, or who support groups in any way associated with violence.

3.4.3. The Parliament institutes an inquiry into land disputes that have arisen as a result of the wide-scale resettlement programmes undertaken during the Indonesian occupation, with a view to promoting peaceful mediation of these disputes and avoiding violence.

3.4.4. The public campaign to raise awareness and support for the prevention of domestic violence be continued and intensified, particularly in the districts.

3.4.5. Timor-Leste uses its membership of regional and international forums to be a vigorous opponent of military aggression and a strong advocate of international principles, the UN system and dialogue and diplomacy in the resolution of conflict.

3.4.6. The education system in Timor-Leste, both governmental and private, promotes values in education and develops courses and teaching methods to impart skills and a culture of peace, respect, and non-violence to students, including exposure to East Timorese and other figures who achieved their goals, both big and small, peacefully.

3.4.7. The power of sport, music, drama and other arts in Timor-Leste are harnessed as tools to promote peace, non-violence and the building of positive values and community relations, especially among youth.

3.5. Right to participation – guaranteeing essential freedoms

The freedoms which are essential to exercise the right of participation were repressed under both the Portuguese colonial system and the Indonesian regime of occupation. Those who exercised their rights to freedom of information, opinion, movement, association and assembly during the conflict with Indonesia ran grave risks, were forced to operate clandestinely and often suffered grievously for exercising these rights. Secrecy and heavy-handed control were the hallmarks of the system. This resulted in the killing of foreign journalists and, inter alia, the massacre of demonstrators at the Santa Cruz cemetery on 12 November 1991. Only information, media, political parties and associations acceptable to the Indonesian military were tolerated and freedom of movement within Timor-Leste and abroad was monitored and restricted. East Timorese were treated as subjects not as citizens. As a result, government was not accountable, development failed and human rights violations were committed with impunity.

The Commission recommends that:

3.5.1. The Government of Timor-Leste continues its policy of open government in its dealings with the community and, in the interests of promoting participation and accountability, seeks to maximise open two-way communication with the community, including through their elected representatives in the Parliament, civil society organisations and the media.

3.5.2. The parliament enacts legislation on national archives to ensure that official records in all parts of Timor-Leste are appropriately preserved and organised based on a standard national system and that, to enhance public participation and the accountability of public servants, the rules of access place very few restrictions on the information that can be made public and include Freedom of Information provisions.

3.5.3. Publishers, journalists and all sections of the media recognise that their role is vital to effective citizenship in Timor-Leste and that their overriding professional responsibility is to provide independent and accurate news, information and alternative points of view on significant public issues to all sections of East Timorese society.

3.5.4. The media institute an annual award for investigative journalism carried out by an East Timorese journalist and that this award be given in honour of journalists who lost their lives in Timor-Leste in the service of the truth during the period 1974-1999.

3.5.5. The fundamental importance of the rights of freedom of movement, opinion, association and assembly to the vitality and creativity of political, cultural, social and economic life in Timor-Leste continue to be recognised and upheld and, in particular, that law enforcement agencies continue to receive training on these rights and on strict procedures for the peaceful handling of public demonstrations.

3.5.6. Defamation laws not be criminalised, allowing for the proper regulation of these matters by the civil courts.

3.6. Right to participation – citizenship

After generations of marginalisation, the individual citizen is now the centre of the new democratic nation of Timor-Leste - as beneficiary and as actor. This shift owes much to the spirit of inclusiveness that was developed by the Resistance and that contributed significantly to its success. The opportunity to contribute remains equally important for the future – both as a right and as a duty inspired by the same sense of initiative, creativity, self-reliance and self-sacrifice that served Timor-Leste well in the past. The Commission was repeatedly reminded that the “little people” want to be able to participate fully in the life of the new nation despite the distance felt, especially in the rural areas, from the mechanisms and processes of government and decision-making.

Citizenship symbolises our unity as a nation. It is based on a sense of belonging to this country, national pride and commitment to our people, values and common future. It is essential to nurture the sense of citizenship through on-going public education about its importance and what it means in practice.

The Commission recommends that:

3.6.1. A comprehensive civic education programme is implemented that is focussed on the structure, institutions and processes of democracy and the rights and obligations of citizens; this programme should also be taught in the schools.

3.6.2. All public servants, including police, military, teachers and staff in government departments, continue to receive training, periodic in-services and performance evaluation on their role as servants of the government and citizens of Timor-Leste to ensure that they carry out their duties in a politically impartial, ethical and professional manner.

3.6.3. A Citizenship Day is established in Timor-Leste in order to heighten awareness of the meaning and importance of citizenship and to promote and celebrate our democratic values and responsibilities.

3.6.4. Annual awards be established for East Timorese citizens who make a special contribution to their local community or to the nation and are recognised as models of initiative and good citizenship for the emulation of others, particularly youth.

3.7. Right to education and cultural self-determination

The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (Article 15) recognises the right of all to cultural life and the related need to conserve, develop and diffuse culture including through the formal education system. Though parts of Timor-Leste's unique way of life and culture survived, this right was denied to varying degrees under the colonial systems introduced by Portugal and Indonesia. The Portuguese system particularly neglected education for the people. Indonesia, though it addressed illiteracy and provided educational opportunities, used these as vehicles to promote integration not cultural self-determination.

The Commission commends the Government for its commitment to universal education and recommends that:

3.7.1. Ways of drawing on East Timorese culture and traditions be further developed as a source of national identity and nation-building, including through the education system, and that research for this purpose is undertaken by universities and relevant agencies.

3.7.2. The Government and Church education systems collaborate to develop curricula and teaching methodologies which are values-based and aimed at developing key values which are appropriate to Timor-Leste's traditions and current situation and that will promote a culture of peace, non-violence, and human rights.

3.7.3. The Government and Church education systems collaborate to develop a human rights curriculum and teaching methodologies for use at all levels of the education system and that makes use of this Report and related materials to ensure the course is grounded in Timor-Leste's lived experience.

3.7.4. The Government, bearing in mind creative initiatives undertaken in 1974-75, develops special programmes aimed at eradicating illiteracy in Timor-Leste, including for adults, especially women in remote communities;

3.7.5. The Department of Education, teachers and academics make use of the multi-media resources created and collected by CAVR - during its work on reconciliation and its inquiry into the period 1974-1999 - as a way of enriching East Timorese content in the education curriculum and to assist in the teaching of history, political science, conflict-resolution, international relations and law.

3.7.6. The Government establishes a programme of repatriation for East Timorese artefacts, documents and culturally-related material currently outside the country and invites governments, institutions and individuals who have these items in their possession to return them to Timor-Leste to assist in the conservation, development and diffusion of East Timorese culture in keeping with Article 15 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

3.7.7. The Government establishes a programme to restore and preserve sites and materials of particular cultural importance damaged or destroyed during the conflict such as the Palácio das Cinzas site in Dili to serve as a reminder to future generations of the destruction of 1999 and the challenges that had to be faced by the East Timorese leadership in establishing the new state.

3.8. Right to health and a sustainable environment

The enjoyment of basic rights to health, adequate food, housing and livelihood depend on a healthy environment. Harm to the environment is not only a crime against nature it is also a violation of human rights. Timor-Leste suffers from obvious depletion of its flora, fauna and soil. This is due to many factors but includes colonial exploitation of natural resources, war damage, the disruption of land care due to the long conflict, the consuming of native plants and animals during periods of displacement, and the removal of flora and fauna as war trophies to Indonesia.

The Commission recommends that:

3.8.1. The United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP), which has considerable experience in post-conflict environmental regeneration, is invited to undertake a study of the environmental situation in Timor-Leste and, taking into account excellent projects already underway, to make recommendations for remedial activities to help Timor-Leste realise the UN Millenium Development Goal of environmental sustainability.

3.8.2. Regions where defoliants are believed to have been used for military purposes are researched to ensure that they are safe for local communities and that, if necessary, rehabilitation is undertaken in cooperation with the affected communities and with the support of governments and companies who were involved in the supply of military equipment to the Indonesian armed forces.

3.8.3. The herbal and other alternative medicines and remedies used in the interior during the war of resistance be documented and evaluated for their effectiveness with a view to continued use.

3.8.4. A long-term public education programme be undertaken, including through the education system, to deepen community understanding of the relationship between a clean physical environment and health, especially for children.

3.8.5. World Health Day, held on 7 April each year, be successively devoted to each of the above themes.

4. Human rights at home: promoting and protecting the rights of the vulnerable

4.1. Women

During the conflict women played a crucial role in East Timorese society – both in Timor-Leste and in the diaspora – as the bedrock of families and communities, often left without husbands, brothers or fathers for support, and as advocates for human rights. In Timor-Leste, the conflict created conditions which limited the freedoms of women and girls who were also especially vulnerable to violations of human rights. These included rape, sexual slavery and other forms of sexual violence which, though mainly perpetrated by the Indonesian security apparatus also involved East Timorese men. Women who were victims of sexual violence were often ostracised by their community, increasing their vulnerability to new violations. Some continue to be victimised today because of their experience.

Through its interaction with victims and their families, the Commission observed that domestic violence was a common occurrence in the current lives of many victims. For example, some male survivors of detention and torture told the Commission that they had fallen into a pattern of violent behaviour.

The incidence of domestic violence and sexual assault in Timor-Leste remains high. A national commitment to the elimination of violence against women, in both the public and private domains, is essential to break the cycle of violence and fear that characterises the lives of many women and girls. This programme of action must also promote the development of a culture of equality because discrimination against women is a key contributing factor to violence against women.

The Commission recommends that:

4.1.1. The diverse contributions of women involved in the Resistance – internally and in the diaspora - be more fully recognised and that additional ways of documenting and disseminating their contribution be developed, including for teaching in the schools.

4.1.2. The call by Komisi Penyelidik Pelanggaran HAM Tim-Tim (Commission for the Investigation of Human Rights Violations in East Timor, KKP-HAM) to the Government of Indonesia to provide rehabilitation, compensation and support to the victims of the 1999 upheaval in Timor-Leste, including women and families, be implemented.

4.1.3. Crimes against humanity and war crimes committed in Timor-Leste which involved sexual violence against women and girls are excluded from any amnesty provisions, in accordance with UN Security Council Resolution 1325 on Women, Peace and Security (par. 11, S/Res/1325 2000).

4.1.4. Continuing prejudice against women who have been victims of sexual violation be urgently addressed by the Government, religious institutions, local communities and civil society organisations in order to uphold the dignity of those who have suffered in this way.

4.1.5. The Government, together with religious organisations and civil society, continues efforts to eliminate all forms of violence against women and that measures to be taken include (a) the urgent introduction of legislation on domestic violence, including emergency measures to protect victims at times of crisis; (b) the provision of more resources and training to law enforcement agencies, the judiciary and legal aid groups, in order to enable an effective response to cases of domestic violence; (c) continued support for agencies and civil society organisations providing quality services and support to victims, and to those who work with men to transform patterns of violent behaviour.

4.1.6. The National 16 Days of Activism against Violence against Women be continued each year and be intensified particularly in the districts.

4.1.7. The Armed Forces and Police Services develop strong enforcable policies which promote gender equality, outlaw sexual exploitation and violence against women and impose the strongest possible sanctions on security personnel guilty of breaches of these policies so that never again should East Timorese women have cause to fear those entrusted to protect and uphold their rights.

4.1.8. The harmonisation of Timor-Leste laws with the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) is continued, that adequate capacity is provided to institutions responsible for the implementation of CEDAW and reporting to the UN on Timor-Leste compliance with CEDAW, and that understanding of CEDAW is promoted in the community, particularly through the education system, the media and the Church.

4.1.9. Access to information and services on reproductive health care, family planning and parenting are widely available to both men and women, including through the schools, in order that decisions about reproduction are informed and the responsibilities of reproduction and parenthood are equally shared and free of coercion or violence.

4.1.10. Measures are taken to recognise and support the role of women in the prevention and resolution of conflicts and in peace-building, including at the local level.

4.1.11 The Government upgrades the Office for the Promotion of Equality to a Ministry of Women's Affairs as a way of further promoting and mainstreaming gender equality and the full participation of women in the economic, social, cultural and political life of Timor-Leste, including through the promotion of literacy for rural women and the greater participation of girls and women in secondary and tertiary education.

4.2. Children and youth

The rights of children were violated during the years of conflict. Children saw or experienced traumatic violence, died from starvation, were displaced from their homes, orphaned, separated from their parents, and were disadvantaged through lack of access to health, educational and other services. Children were also conscripted into the fighting, both during the internal armed conflict in 1975 and during the Indonesian occupation when they were used by the Indonesian military to provide logistic and other support. Some children were taken away from their families by the Indonesian military and officials, often to distant places in Indonesia, and remain separated from their families. With profound sadness, the Commission heard from East Timorese children in West Timor that they felt a dual sense of belonging to and alienation from Timor-Leste.

To ensure a better future for children in Timor-Leste, the Government has ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child. In so doing, it has committed itself to protect and ensure children's rights and agreed to be accountable for this commitment before the international community. Ensuring a future for our growing youth population is one of Timor-Leste's main challenges.

The Commission recommends that:

4.2.1. The process of harmonising Timor-Leste laws with the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC) is continued, that adequate capacity is provided to institutions responsible for the implementation of the CRC and reporting to the UN on Timor-Leste compliance with CRC, and that understanding of CRC is promoted in the community, particularly through the education system, the media and the Church.

4.2.2. A public education campaign similar to that already underway on domestic violence be undertaken to educate parents, teachers and the community about the effects of physical and emotional violence on children and to provide alternative forms of behavioural control and character development.

4.2.3. Positive role models for girls and young women, and for boys and young men, be identified and promoted.

4.2.4. Adequate resources be allocated to the development of sporting infrastructure and management so that the potential of sport to contribute to community relations and the holistic development of youth, including equal access for girls and young women, is realised.

4.2.5. Reproductive health education programmes that are accurate, balanced and comprehensive and that promote responsibility are provided to the youth of Timor-Leste in keeping with Article 17 of the CRC which upholds the right to know especially where information promotes social, spiritual and moral well-being and physical and mental health.

4.2.6. Measures are undertaken to ensure that the Government policy of universal education is extended in practice to all children, especially orphans, the disabled and those in remote rural communities including to guarantee that all girl children have full and equal access to education, and that more opportunities for vocational training are provided.

4.2.7. East Timorese children who were taken to Indonesia and remain separated from their parents and families are given the opportunity for family contact and reunion, including the option of freely returning to Timor-Leste, in keeping with Articles 9 and 10 of the CRC.

4.2.8. Special consideration is given to the situation of East Timorese children who have been disadvantaged educationally and in other ways because of their clandestine work and sacrifices as youth for the liberation of Timor-Leste.

5. Human rights at home: promoting and protecting human rights through effective institutions

5.1. An effective civil society

The freedoms required for the flowering of civil society were denied for most of Timor-Leste's colonial history and harshly repressed during the Indonesian occupation. Nevertheless, civil society emerged as a positive force for change both in Timor-Leste itself and in Indonesia and, together with international civil society, played an important role in the struggle for self-determination and independence. This role, the independence of civil society and the values of initiative and commitment to human rights that inspired it, are equally critical today. Outside government and political parties, civil society is the principal vehicle for the participation and contribution of citizens to nation-building. It is important that this sector enjoys an enabling environment as Timor-Leste continues to make the transition from opposition to constructive interaction between government and civil society.

The Commission recommends that:

5.1.1. Support and encouragement continue to be provided to civil society in Timor-Leste so that it can adequately fulfill its role in amplifying the voices of the poorest, contributing to development and holding government and business accountable, and that the fundamental civil and political freedoms that are necessary for this sector continue to be respected and upheld.

5.1.2. Civil society organisations, while valuing their independence and diversity, continue to find ways of working cooperatively with other NGOs, nationally and internationally, both to ensure the best use of scarce resources and the impact of their advocacy and contribution, and to exemplify in their organisation strong community links and the highest possible standards of democracy, professionalism and accountability.

5.1.3. Government and civil society organisations, while respecting each other's respective roles and independence, continue to build direct channels of communication in order to foster interaction through policy dialogue, consultation, shared training, and operational collaboration.

5.1.4. Government and donors continue to provide financial assistance, training and other forms of support for civil society in Timor-Leste to ensure it has the capacity to take its seat at the table and fulfill its role constructively and effectively.

5.1.5. International organisations provide specialist training to national NGOs to enable them to contribute to the process of external scrutiny when the Government makes its treaty-based reports on human rights to the United Nations.

5.1.6. The Catholic Church and other faith communities continue to contribute to the building of a culture of peace and human rights in the community, to providing assistance to victims of human rights violations and to fostering reconciliation and social cohesion.

5.2. An effective Parliament

Under Portugal and Indonesia, Timor-Leste had legislative institutions but these bodies were not representative of the people or accountable to them and served the interests of those in power rather than the people. This system has been replaced with a democracy in which a parliament freely elected by the people is sovereign. This new system is characterised above all by responsiveness and accountability to the people, through both its legislative function and, on behalf of the people, its scrutiny and monitoring of the executive government and public service, including the expenditure of public money.

The Commission recommends that:

5.2.1. Members of Parliament have sufficient facilities and resources to carry out their responsibilities effectively on behalf of the people.

5.2.2. The National Parliament and individual Parliamentarians continue to strengthen their representative role and demonstrate accountability to the people through mechanisms such as regular reporting, visits to the districts and interaction with the community, public hearings, and communication through the media.

5.2.3. The National Parliament and its members have an on-going programme to inform and educate the community about the role of the Parliament, particularly among young people and in schools; this will help overcome the sense of alienation inherited from the past by increasing understanding about the role of Parliament on behalf of the people and will encourage participation both through voting in elections and through a more active role in politics and use of the system.

5.2.4. The executive government and public service acknowledge the sovereign role of the Parliament and, in a spirit of accountability and partnership, make themselves regularly available for policy dialogue, consultations and questions from members of Parliament on behalf of the people.

5.2.5. The National Parliament enacts legislation to meet the reporting obligations of Timor-Leste under human rights treaties that have been ratified.

5.3. An effective judiciary

An independent, functioning judicial system is essential to secure the rule of law in Timor-Leste. During the Indonesian occupation, the judicial system was seriously flawed. The independence of the judiciary from government policy was compromised, and the judicial system failed to protect the basic human rights of those accused through due process. In so doing it contributed substantially to the culture of impunity, the breakdown of the rule of law and itself was the cause of human rights violations.

A result of this experience is that many East Timorese people do not trust the judicial system. They know the system during the Commission mandate period was corrupt, inaccessible and politically influenced. This is a major challenge in developing a new judicial system.

A fair, professional, accessible and effective judicial system is a cornerstone of establishing the rule of law in Timor-Leste. Experience shows that the rights of people can only be protected when there is an effective way to hold power accountable before the law. Without this accountability, protection of human rights is virtually impossible. The development of a strong, independent judicial system in Timor-Leste is a fundamental pillar of our new democracy. It should be given appropriate priority in terms of funding and policy.

The Commission recommends that:

5.3.1. The Government finalises formulation of the Penal Code and the Code of Criminal Procedures, incorporating adequate formulation of crimes against humanity and war crimes.

5.3.2. All the measures necessary to ensure the independence of the judiciary are put in place, including:

- Administrative autonomy of the Prosecutor General's office and the courts, as well as the development of a mechanism of judicial appointments and tenure that is insulated from political pressures
- Priority being given to a sustainable programme of education and training for East Timorese judges
- Development of career paths for judges, including a system of proper remuneration and tenure in order to reduce the risk of corruption or political pressure on judges
- Development of an independent supervisory system, established by legislation.

5.3.3. Access to the judicial system for East Timorese citizens is guaranteed by:

- Ensuring that there is an adequate number of East Timorese judges and that university law schools and other resources of a suitable standard are available
- Ensuring that there is an adequate number of well-trained judicial administrative officials to support the work of the courts
- Ensuring that courts can regularly sit in the districts
- Ensuring that East Timorese citizens coming before the courts have access to support in their mother tongue

- Guaranteeing the independence of public prosecutors
- Allocating adequate resources to defence lawyers and to para-legal support services to ensure that East Timorese citizens, accused and victims, can understand the judicial and legal system
- Ensuring that people arrested are brought before a court within the statutory time period, and that the court can convene at short notice to guarantee this.

5.3.4. The appellate system is strengthened in order to provide internal enforcement of the highest international legal standards.

5.3.5. The Government ensures that the judicial system is fully resourced to fulfill its vital functions by making it a high priority in the national budget.

5.3.6. The United Nations and international community continue to support the development and strengthening of the legal and judicial system in Timor-Leste to ensure accountability before the law.

5.4. An effective public service

The public service in Timor-Leste during the Indonesian occupation had many of the negative features of the Indonesian bureaucracy of which it was a part: the system was politicised, centralised, top-down, corrupt, over-staffed, inefficient, wasteful of government resources and did not enjoy the confidence of the community. Families with connections to local elites and civil servants got faster and cheaper access to basic services. Corruption, high costs and bribes, and personal connections in public service delivery worked most heavily against the poor.

Today, the system in Timor-Leste, like its Indonesian counterpart, is still weak and is caught in an "institutional limbo" between the old structures and the emergence of a new institution and culture. To deliver the economic, social and cultural services to which the citizens of Timor-Leste are entitled as human rights, public servants must be politically impartial, appointed and promoted on merit, and be people of integrity and professional competence characterised by a strong ethos of duty and service.

5.4.1. Recruitment to the public service is based on equal opportunity and merit, not political affiliation, and that women are given every encouragement to apply and occupy positions of leadership in the government bureaucracy.

5.4.2. The training provided to public servants includes a strong emphasis on the equal rights of all citizens in Timor-Leste to services which protect and uphold their economic, social and cultural rights without discrimination and that this training is reinforced in practice through regular evaluation of staff performance, encouragement of feedback from citizens, including allegations of bribery, and the rewarding of best practice.

5.4.3. Government Ministers and senior public servants, including in the districts, practice accountability by informing citizens of policies and services, consulting with interest groups and being available to the media, and through regular attendance at the National Parliament to answer questions and hear the concerns of Members.

5.4.4. Allegations or evidence of patronage, favouritism, bribery or abuse of government property and equipment, even in small ways, are investigated and dealt with promptly, impartially and in a transparent manner, and those found guilty are appropriately sanctioned.

5.4.5. Budgets, expenditure and audits of government departments and agencies are published and the subject of public scrutiny.

5.4.6. Civil society organisations and the media inform citizens of their rights in relation to service delivery and government accountability and develop ways of acknowledging and rewarding best practice in the public service.

5.5. An effective Provedor

Timor-Leste's recent history shows how state institutions that are not respectful of the rule of law have a disproportionate capacity to contribute to human rights violations. For most of the period reviewed by the Commission, the East Timorese people lived without the protections of effective rule of law or the functioning of a financially accountable administration. Establishing these as the norm is a significant challenge for the government, civil society and the community.

The Commission applauds the establishment of the Office of the Provedor for Human Rights and Justice, and acknowledges the key role this independent institution has in protecting human rights in Timor-Leste including those rights at risk from corruption in the public sector.

The Commission recommends that:

5.5.1. The Office of the Provedor, in order to carry out its mandate to protect human rights and to prevent corruption effectively, be guaranteed full independence and appropriate levels of funding and human resources; the Provedor conducts a review of all laws, public policies and procedures relevant to the prevention of corruption, and reports to the National Parliament on reforms required to establish a strong legal framework and mechanisms to promote government integrity and to prevent corruption at all levels of public administration.

5.5.2. The National Parliament adopts the legislation recommended by the Provedor, that all sections of government and the public administration implement the recommendations and that a strict monitoring regime be put in place.

5.5.3. The State of Timor-Leste ratifies the UN Convention Against Corruption (UNCAC) which it signed in December 2003.

5.5.4. The Office of the Provedor holds regular consultations with business and civil society on the issue of corruption, uses International Anti-corruption Day on 9 December to heighten public awareness of the damage corruption does to the poor, development and foreign investment, and cooperates with organisations such as Transparency International to undertake a thorough and objective report on Timor-Leste as part of its Global Corruption Report.

5.5.5. The Office of the Provedor works with the private sector and the Chamber of Commerce to develop an anti-corruption code of conduct for business and that resources and training are provided to all members of the Chamber.

5.5.6. The Office of the Provedor develops as a state institution which the people regard as close to their communities and problems and which can assist in finding quick and effective responses to potential or actual human rights abuse, including by developing early warning mechanisms in areas where violence might develop.

5.6. An effective Church community

The Catholic Church has a significant place in East Timorese history and society. Though largely compromised during the Portuguese period, the Church was a strong advocate for human rights in Timor-Leste during the Indonesian occupation consistent with Catholic social doctrine based on the dignity and value of each human person. In partnership with other faith communities, it has a responsibility and resources to continue as a major force for human rights in the new democratic era.

The Commission recommends that:

5.6.1. The Church continues its mission to protect and promote human rights in Timor-Leste both through its services to the community in health, education and other areas and, where necessary, through public advocacy in defence of human rights.

5.6.2. The Church, through its organs for justice and peace, provides human rights training to all its personnel, including seminarians, teacher trainees, members of religious orders and catechists.

5.6.3. The Church reviews past practices of excluding women who were victims of sexual violence from the full life of the Church, thereby significantly increasing their experience of social stigmatisation, and addresses its responsibilities to these women.

5.6.4. The Church develops a programme of human rights education, which includes due emphasis on the rights and duties of citizens, for dissemination to the community through its network of parishes and schools.

6. Human rights at home: security services that protect and promote human rights

Building a new paradigm for the security services is one of the biggest challenges for Timor-Leste. It involves breaking with past models in which, particularly during the Indonesian period, the security apparatus was an instrument of force rather than community service, was a major perpetrator of human rights violations, was not accountable to the rule of law or subject to civilian control and did not enjoy the trust of the people. The demarcation of roles between the armed forces and police was ill-defined and the security apparatus proliferated into an unmanageable plethora of militia, groups and networks with differing loyalties and roles. The military had a dual role (dwi-fungsi) which, in addition to regular defence and security, also legitimated its intervention in socio-political affairs. The East Timorese Resistance developed a similar policy in 1975 when it broke with the Portuguese practice of non-involvement in politics (apartidarismo) and aligned mainly with the Fretilin party until the policy was discarded in favour of political impartiality in the 1980s.

The Commission fully supports current government policies which are focussed on the development of a politically neutral professional security apparatus. The following recommendations are intended to reinforce this new paradigm for the sake of the protection of human rights in Timor-Leste.

6.1. An accountable security policy

The Commission recommends that:

6.1.1. A public education programme be undertaken to deepen community understanding of Timor-Leste security policy and the role, limits and accountability of the police and armed forces.

6.1.2. This education programme highlights and explains the following:

- The democratic control of the security policy and apparatus by the civilian authorities (President, Cabinet and Parliament), as provided for in the Constitution
- The duty of the security apparatus to uphold human rights in compliance with the rule of law as laid down in the Constitution and legislation
- The duty of the security apparatus and their members to stand apart from political life and under no circumstances to use their resources for political purposes, as occurred in the past
- The duty of the security apparatus to comply with national security policy as articulated by the National Parliament in order to ensure (a) that there is a clear demarcation of roles; (b) that there is no proliferation of agencies as occurred in the past (c) that there is no breakdown of coordination leading to inter-agency rivalry and abuses as in the past; (d) that there is no politicisation of the security apparatus as occurred in the past; (e) that the security budget and weapons procurement and distribution are overseen and approved by the National Parliament; and (f) that the human rights of civilians are not violated at a time of national crisis (such as a state of siege or state of emergency when extra powers are given to the security apparatus) as happened in the past
- The rules governing arrest by the police and the rights of the public in these situations so that there is no recurrence of past practices of

- arbitrary arrest and detention and the potential abuses which can occur in such circumstances
- The rules governing police behaviour during public demonstrations to ensure that there is no recurrence of the serious human rights violations that occurred in the past in these situations.

6.2. Police Service

The Commission recommends that:

6.2.1. The National Parliament plays an active role as the final civilian oversight mechanism of the Police Service and receives regular reports from the Minister of the Interior who is responsible for the police and answerable to Parliament.

6.2.2. Members of the Police Service are accountable for their actions outside the law and police involved in cases of human rights abuse should be brought before a normal court of law and not shielded by police or internal procedures.

6.2.3. Procedures and mechanisms for reporting complaints about police behaviour are established in collaboration with the Office of the Provedor in order to reverse the practices of the past when the security enjoyed impunity and the public had little recourse to justice.

6.2.4. A paradigm shift in police culture is fostered aimed at replacing a past "police force" mentality with a stronger emphasis on a community service approach to policing.

6.2.5. In addition to technical training all police personnel, including senior officers, receive on-going training in both the theory and practice of human rights as part of their professional development as protectors of human rights.

6.2.6. All police personnel, including senior officers, receive ongoing training in relation to gender-related crimes and the rights of victims of such crimes.

6.2.7. Specialised and ongoing training is provided on the gathering of evidence, forensic practice and appropriate methods of interrogation in order to lessen the risk that members of the police will seek to gather evidence from confessions obtained under duress.

6.2.8. The police respect the right of civil society organisations to monitor their work in order to ensure protection of human rights and, in collaboration with such organisations, develop procedures to ensure access.

6.2.9. Members of the Timor-Leste police be encouraged to join international peacekeeping operations under the mandate of the United Nations in order to increase experience of international best practice.

6.3. Defence Forces

The Commission recommends that:

6.3.1. The National Parliament establishes monitoring mechanisms to ensure that it effectively oversees the military.

6.3.2. Members of the Defence Forces are treated as citizens of Timor-Leste, not a separate caste above the rule of law and norms of society as happened in the past, and accordingly will be brought before a normal court of law if involved in cases of human rights abuse.
6.3.3. The role of the Defence Forces is limited to external defence and assistance in the event of a non-military disaster as determined by National Parliament; the use of the military to control perceived internal threats, as happened in the past, is prohibited in Timor-Leste.
6.3.4. Members of the Defence Forces at all levels should play no role in political life or in business and should only take direction from the legally authorised state institutions.
6.3.5. The development of civilian extensions of the military through the quasi-militarised or intelligence groups be prohibited, because in the past such practices contributed to human rights violations and were a cause of major divisions in the community.
6.3.6. On-going training in international human rights, humanitarian law and civic education is provided to the members of the Defence Forces, including senior leadership.
6.3.7. Ongoing dialogue is encouraged between national human rights organisations and the Defence Forces in relation to human rights and the respective roles of civil society and a professional military in a democracy.
6.3.8. Members of the Defence Forces are encouraged to join international peacekeeping operations under the mandate of the United Nations in order to increase experience of international best practice.
6.3.9. The Defence Forces not conduct joint training exercises with armed forces that have a known and proven poor human rights record and that, if this is in question, the National Parliament decide on the appropriateness of such training.

6.4. Other security agencies

In addition to the armed forces and the police, a plethora of community-based security groups and networks emerged on both sides during the conflict period. Those on the Indonesian side in particular were part of the doctrine of "total people's defence" and as such were sanctioned and armed by the state and were responsible for an array of human rights violations committed with impunity.

To ensure these developments do not recur in Timor-Leste to the detriment of human rights, the National Parliament must take responsibility for the ultimate oversight of security issues and policy.

The Commission recommends that:

6.4.1. State security bodies such as intelligence gathering agencies are strictly regulated by law, monitored and held accountable for their actions when these exceed their legal mandate.

6.4.2. Officers in such security agencies participate in training about the role of these agencies in a democratic country and also receive human rights training.

6.4.3. State intelligence and security agencies are coordinated and subject to parliamentary oversight.

6.4.4. Legislation is enacted by National Parliament regarding non-state security agencies which, inter alia, requires that private security companies receive compulsory training by the Police Service and in human rights and that all such agencies are registered.

7. Justice and truth

> Because of what took place on 20 August 1982 many of our people died, women were raped, became widows, children became orphans, many became impoverished, many are still traumatised…Do you think by taking statements from the people we can resolve [our problems] and heal our wounded hearts? Do you think by bringing people who committed crimes to the courts we can heal our wounded hearts?
> Letter from the people of Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 31 May 2003

The Commission has listened to the voices of victims of serious violations of human rights from all districts of Timor-Leste. In recording nearly 8,000 individual statements, and listening to testimony in hearings at national, sub-district and village level, the Commission has sought to understand better the demands of the people for justice for past crimes. The Commission understands that the demands and needs of any two victims may not be the same, and that any single solution is unlikely to meet all the needs of all victims. From its relationship with victims of serious violations across the country, the Commission concludes that the demand for justice and accountability remains a fundamental issue in the lives of many East Timorese people and a potential obstacle to building a democratic society based upon respect for the rule of law and authentic reconciliation between individuals, families, communities and nations.

The Commission has completed its mandate to establish the truth of past human rights violations. The ability of the Commission to do this was based on its good faith with victims of human rights violations and by respecting their dignity and their right to demand justice for the crimes committed against them. The Commission considers that truth is a fundamental basis for pursuing justice and building new relationships founded on honesty and mutual respect. In addition to justice measures, the Commission believes it is important that the truth established in its Final Report be widely available to the people of Timor-Leste for generations to come, and for the governments and general public of nations who have an involvement in the story of Timor-Leste. Preservation, dissemination and development of educational materials are all important aspects to be followed up to secure the legacy of the CAVR and to honour the trust that the people of Timor-Leste placed in the Commission.

7.1. Justice for past atrocities

The findings of this Report show that the human rights violations which occurred in Timor-Leste were spread across most of the 25-year period from 1974-1999. The international community demonstrated its horror at the crimes committed in 1999, when the world witnessed systematic atrocities compounded by the failure of the Indonesian authorities to honour their agreements to guarantee security. An additional factor in the international outrage was the killing of UN personnel during the violence surrounding the Popular Consultation.

Egregious as they were, however, the crimes committed in 1999 were far outweighed by those committed during the previous 24 years of occupation and cannot be properly understood or addressed without acknowledging the truth of the long conflict. The Commission was established during the same period as the Serious Crimes Unit and the Special Panels for Serious Crimes, as part of the fight against impunity and the struggle to achieve genuine reconciliation.

The Commission acknowledges the difficulties faced by the international community and the governments involved as they continue to seek resolution to the issue of serious crimes of 1999. The Commission notes that, in this process, the international community has paid little or no attention to the issue of justice for the grave crimes committed in Timor-Leste throughout the 23 years prior to the 1999 atrocities. Now that the Commission has reported on the truth of these atrocities, it is its mandated duty to draw the appropriate conclusions based on concerns of international law and not on political considerations. The findings of the Commission indicate that there have been no adequate justice measures for the crimes against humanity committed in Timor-Leste throughout the 25-year mandate period. Based on its mandate founded on respect for international law, the Commission concludes that justice for past crimes must encompass the violations committed throughout the 25-year period of its mandate.

The legacy of this lack of justice for years of human rights violations is manifold. For both Timor-Leste and Indonesia the result is that impunity has become entrenched. Those who planned, ordered, committed and are responsible for the most serious human rights violations have not been brought to account, and in many cases have seen their military and civil careers flourish as a result of their activities. Respect for the rule of law and the organs of the state responsible for its administration, a fundamental pillar of the democratic transition in Indonesia and nation building in Timor-Leste, will always be extremely fragile in this context.

The conflicts in Timor-Leste were of an internal nature during the confrontation of August-September 1975, while Timor was still a non-self governing territory under Portuguese authority. When Indonesian forces invaded Timor-Leste, from October 1975, the conflict was internationalised. Independently of the nature of the conflict, however, the crimes committed over this long period reached on many occasions the threshold of extreme conduct that invokes the responsibility of the international community.

In addition to the nature of the crimes, serious immediate circumstances invoke the responsibility of the international community. The Commission is persuaded that our nascent and still fragile State cannot be expected to bear the brunt of pursuing the daunting task of justice on its own. It is further concerned that the State of Indonesia has never shown a genuine will to bring to book the perpetrators, not just for the crimes committed for 1999, but for any of the crimes committed during the long occupation. Therefore the Commission believes that the definitive approach to achieve justice for the crimes committed in Timor-Leste should hinge critically on the commitment of the international community, in particular the United Nations. They should provide unqualified support for strong institutions of justice, able to act independently of the political situation within and outside Timor-Leste.

The Commission is aware that any formula for the solution to impunity for the crimes committed in 24 years of conflict and occupation will be complex and difficult to achieve. However, a few elements should be identified. Any formula to seek justice for the victims should be based on respect for international law and guarantees of due process. Equally, any design for justice should have the practical support not just of the United Nations as such but of individual countries, ready to help the process in different ways. Finally, any response to impunity should face the challenge of how to ensure that the major perpetrators are accountable in spite of the current protection they enjoy.

The Commission is aware that by the time this report is published, the international Commission of Experts appointed by the Secretary-General of the United Nations to review the process of justice for 1999 will have issued its recommendations. Therefore, while we will express ideas for the cases of 1999 we will include recommendations on the crimes committed before 1999 that have received, regrettably, far less attention.

The Commission recommends that:

7.1.1. The Serious Crimes Unit and Special Panels in Timor-Leste have their respective mandates renewed by the United Nations and their resources increased in order to be able to continue to investigate and try cases from throughout the period 1975-1999.

7.1.2. The renewal of the mandate should be based on the conditions on which these institutions were originally established – that is, directly depending on the UN and not on the nascent national judicial system in Timor-Leste which is not prepared to deal with the technical and political challenges of the cases.

7.1.3. In relation to the crimes committed before 1999, the work of the Serious Crimes Unit includes investigation and preparation for prosecution of the following historical cases and periods, which the Commission concludes are exemplary and of critical importance in terms of the scale and nature of the human rights violations which occurred:

- The execution of Fretilin-linked youth in Manufahi on or around 28 August 1975 by UDT-linked perpetrators
- The executions of UDT and Apodeti-linked prisoners by Fretilin-linked perpetrators in Aileu, Maubisse and Same in December and January 1976

- The reported massacre of civilians in Kooleu Village in Lautém District by Fretilin-linked perpetrators in January 1976
- The executions of Fretilin members and associates by Fretilin members and associates during party divisions in 1976, and especially 1977
- The massacres of civilians in Dili on the day of the full-scale Indonesian military invasion, 7 December 1975, and killings on following days
- The Indonesian military encirclement and annihilation campaigns of 1977-79
- The massacres of civilians by Indonesian security forces which occurred in and around Kraras Village, Viqueque District, from 1983
- The policy and practice of removing civilians to be held in captivity on the island of Ataúro from the early 1980s
- The Santa Cruz Massacre of 12 November 1991, and subsequent detention, torture and reported killings.

7.1.4. The renewed Serious Crimes Unit prepares indictments for these cases and that the Special Panels, after appropriate review, issue warrants for the arrest of those responsible, seeking transfer to their authority.

7.1.5. Those institutions of the Indonesian Armed Forces and those in positions of command responsibility named in the Part 8: Responsibility and Accountability of this Report (Vol. IV), for crimes other than those in the above list, should be the subject of focused investigation and prosecution by Indonesian authorities.

7.1.6. The list of alleged perpetrators submitted to the President of Timor-Leste by the Commission be referred to the Office of the General Prosecutor for further investigation and action.

7.1.7. A regime of preservation and management be established by the United Nations for all evidence gathered by the Serious Crimes Unit to enable this material to be used for prosecutions as required and that ongoing technical and financial support be provided for this purpose by the United Nations.

7.1.8. All evidence gathered by the CAVR, Indonesia's Komnas HAM and Ad Hoc Human Rights Court on East Timor and others be preserved in a proper manner to enable this material to be used for prosecutions as required.

7.1.9. The international community urges and supports Indonesia to declassify information held by the Indonesian security forces so that it is available for judicial processes.

7.1.10. A proper system of protection for victims and witnesses be put in place as part of the justice process both for crimes committed in 1999 and crimes committed in the preceding years.

7.1.11. Indonesia, in an authentic spirit of reconciliation and with the aim of strengthening its own nascent democracy, be encouraged to contribute to the achievement of justice by (a) transferring those indicted who reside in Indonesia to the renewed Panels, and (b) strengthening the independence and efficiency of its judicial system in order to be able to genuinely pursue justice and reverse the record of impunity that regrettably has been the norm regarding the crimes committed in Timor-Leste.

7.1.12. The international community demonstrates its commitment to justice and the Serious Crimes process by, inter alia:

- Ensuring that their law enforcement authorities are enabled to transfer those indicted to the Serious Crimes regime established by the UN, to try those indicted themselves or to extradite them to a jurisdiction genuinely interested in trying them
- Ensuring that persons responsible for the crimes described in this report are not allowed to continue profitable careers regardless of their crimes
- Establishing a special board of investigation under the auspices of the United Nations to establish the extent, nature and location of assets held by those indicted for crimes against humanity in Timor-Leste
- Freezing the assets of all those indicted for crimes against humanity in Timor-Leste, subject to national and international laws and pending hearing of cases before the relevant tribunal
- Placing travel bans on those indicted for crimes against humanity in Timor-Leste
- Linking international aid and cooperation to specific steps by Indonesia towards accountability, such as cooperation with the Serious Crimes process, the vetting of perpetrators who continue their careers in the public sector, and the scrutinising of Indonesian members of peacekeeping missions and training courses to ensure that alleged perpetrators of violations are not included.

7.2. International tribunal

The Commission recommends that:

7.2.1. The United Nations and its relevant organs, in particular the Security Council, remains seized of the matter of justice for crimes against humanity in Timor-Leste for as long as necessary, and be prepared to institute an International Tribunal pursuant to Chapter VII of the UN Charter should other measures be deemed to have failed to deliver a sufficient measure of justice and Indonesia persists in the obstruction of justice.

7.3. Commission of Truth and Friendship

As this Report neared completion, the Governments of Timor-Leste and Indonesia announced the establishment of a Commission of T and F (CTF), a bilateral truth-seeking mechanism to review the crimes of 1999.

The CAVR believes that nothing should compromise the rights of victims to justice and redress. Accordingly it considers that anh additional truth-seeking measure related to the crimes committed in 1999 should be undertaken in good faith and with a view to strengthening, not weakening, the chances of criminal justice. Similarly, although the CAVR recognises that its investigation still leaves aspects for further research, it believes that its work and the work of the Serious Crimes Unit should be respected and protected from denial. Any additional truth-seeking should be complementary, not opposite to the work that has been conducted.

The Commission recommends that the Governments and Parliaments of Indonesia and Timor-Leste:

- 7.3.1. Guarantee that the Commission of T and F is permitted to act independently, impartially and objectively and to make recommendations as it sees fit, including the possibility of further criminal trials and a policy of reparations to victims.
- 7.3.2. Require that the names of alleged perpetrators be cleared by the Commission of T and F only if this is based on judicial due process consistent with international standards.
- 7.3.3. Require that the Commission of T and F fully respects the rules governing access to information which has been given under promise of confidentiality to previous institutions, such as the CAVR or the Serious Crimes bodies, in order to safeguard the well-being of victims and witnesses.

7.4. Dissemination of the Final Report in Timor-Leste

The Final Report of the Commission is a document of national importance for Timor-Leste and of international significance. Recommendations for its international dissemination can be found in Part 1, Timor-Leste and the International Community (par. 1.1 -1.5 above). Though it has been produced to meet the statutory obligations of the Commission, the Report will have lasting significance for future generations of East Timorese and should therefore be widely accessible.

The Commission recommends that:

- 7.4.1. The Final Report be translated into the Tetum language and widely distributed in Timor-Leste so that current and future generations have access to its contents.
- 7.4.2. The Ministry of Education in the Government of Timor-Leste works with the post-CAVR institution to utilise the Final Report and other Commission materials in the development of curricula and other educational resources related to human rights, reconciliation, history, law, gender studies and other relevant disciplines.

7.4.3. The Government of Timor-Leste and international donor partners support the reproduction of the Final Report and related materials to enable this continuing education programme.

7.5. Archives of the CAVR

The Commission has preserved and organised its archives in accordance with its statutory obligations pursuant to Regulation 10/2001. The archives are a unique part of Timor-Leste's national heritage and comprise thousands of multi-media records that have been entrusted to the Commission by individuals, families and communities across the country as well as national and international organisations and governments. In many instances the opportunity to gather this information and material will never come again. This archive forms the basis of what should be a continuing effort to gather, restore, and make available important historical materials for further reference, research and use. Continued national and international support will be needed to ensure the preservation of the collection and its development into a first class depository.

The Commission recommends that:

7.5.1. The National Parliament of Timor-Leste adopts legislation regulating the preservation, organisation and use of national archives.

7.5.2. The archives of the Commission be maintained at the site of the former Balide Comarca and be administered as part of the official national archives in accordance with the access policy decided by the CAVR Commissioners until national legislative provisions are determined.

7.5.3. The archives form an integrated part of an active human rights centre to be developed in the former Balide Comarca whose overall purpose will be to remember, honour and learn from Timor-Leste's recent human rights history.

7.5.4. Financial support is provided by the Government for the maintenance and development of this centre and an ongoing programme of research and education.

7.5.5. The Government of Indonesia be asked to return to the former Balide Comarca any documents it has in its possession relating to the administration of the prison between 1975 and 1999 so that these can be added to the existing archives.

7.5.6. The Government of Portugal be asked to return to the former Balide Comarca any documents it has in its possession relating to the building and administration of the prison prior to 1975.

8. Reconciliation

*Cry of a child of the nation

At that moment a whisper, melodious
Seconds to the announcement of the Timor Lorosae's independence
But why are the children still scattered in all directions?

Lorosae
20 May is your first day of independence
A day when you feel happiness incomparable
A day when you hear your children clapping, laughing, embracing

But why, among them, are there faces of sadness
You can hear their lament and suffering

Do you not feel that there is something missing, something lost, Lorosae?

Throughout its mandate, the Commission was painfully aware of the divisions among our people. At the time of writing these recommendations, it is estimated that many thousands of East Timorese are still living in Indonesia, mostly in West Timor, and that most of these have opted for Indonesian citizenship. Some are living in refugee camps, others have built a new life in self-exile. These divisions are not only between East Timorese living in Timor-Leste and Indonesia, but also exist within our own communities in the newly independent Timor-Leste. Although some of these differences are caused by new tensions and new problems, often the roots of conflict can be traced back to old divisions of the past.

The Commission addressed these splits through a multi-leveled approach. At the national leadership level, party leaders were asked to publicly explain what took place during the civil war of 1975. The 4-day CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76 in December 2003 was a landmark in the history of East Timorese political life, and an important time for all East Timorese people to better understand the events of this tragic period and listen to leaders taking responsibility.

At grassroots-level, the Commission facilitated a mediation process where perpetrators who committed lesser crimes and did harm to their communities voluntarily and publicly admitted their wrong-doing so that they could be reconciled with their communities. More than 1,400 perpetrators took part in this process and successfully completed the community reconciliation process.

* Poem written and read by Edy M Parada, a child from Viqueque living in Naibonat refugee camp in West Timor, Indonesia, played by video recording during the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, 29-30 March 2004 (Translated from Indonesian).

The Commission believes that to be effective a process of reconciliation in Timor-Leste must engage individuals, families and community groups from all sides of the political conflicts, reach to the highest levels of the national leadership, and continue for many years to come.

Reconciliation in the general community

Violence occurred at the community level throughout the period 1974-1999. The violence of the civil war which started in Dili in 1975 quickly spread to other communities, pitting neighbours and even family members against each other. The Indonesian military created extensive intelligence and paramilitary organisations whose members were involved in violations of human rights against people in their communities. In late 1998 and 1999, the activities of militia groups formed by the TNI further terrorised and divided communities.

From our Community Reconciliation Process (CRP) programme, it is clear that there is a continuing need to assist communities to come to terms with the divisions caused through the long years of political conflict. The Commission commends village communities for the way in which they adapted the Community Reconciliation Process to their local situations. The Commission also commends the courage of those who spoke honestly and openly abut the harm they had done to individuals and communities and sought to become accepted as full members of their communities once again. And the Commission extends its highest respect to those who had been wronged and yet found it in their hearts to accept back into the full life of the community those who had done the harm. The Commission also pays special respect to the traditional leaders who gave their unique support and authority to these processes.

From these experiences with communities, the Commission knows that reconciliation is not a simple or immediate matter. It cannot be achieved in just one step, or a single procedure, and people cannot be obliged to reconcile according to the wishes of an institution or a state. But it is also clear that communities, victims and those who have harmed their communities are often open to assistance to help them come together to resolve past problems for the sake of a peaceful future. The Commission also believes that there is more work to do to secure the peace achieved by communities across the country since the end of the conflict.

8.1. The Government of Timor-Leste establishes a community-focussed mechanism for conflict prevention and resolution, based on the lessons learned from the CAVR community reconciliation process, that this mechanism be mandated by legislation, and be conducted by an independent national institution that works in cooperation with the judiciary, police and local authorities.

8.2. The basic principle of this mechanism will be to assist communities to resolve local conflicts or problems within a framework which is consistent with the rule of law and respect for human rights, including equality between women and men, but also respectful of traditional processes and the diversity of cultures in Timor-Leste.

8.3. This mechanism has a clear focus on the capacity building of local community facilitators of conflict prevention and resolution and on helping young people build a culture and capacity to resolve conflict peacefully.

8.4. This mechanism be mandated to address both past political conflicts in Timor-Leste and contemporary challenges to the peace and stability of communities.

8.5. The post-CAVR institution recommended elsewhere in this Report be requested to convene consultations with the Government and community on this proposal and to submit draft terms of reference to the National Parliament.

8.6. The Prosecutor General decides within three months of the release of this Report what action he will take in relation to the 85 cases of pending Community Reconciliation Processes held by his Office, recognising that these deponents sought the assistance of the Commission in good faith, and that he communicates his decision on each case to each deponent and his community individually.

9. Reconciliation in the East Timorese political community

The Commission worked to understand the underlying causes of the political conflict in Timor-Leste and the violence committed by East Timorese and the Indonesian armed forces. It listened to victims of violence from all sides, and interviewed political leaders from all points of view, including conducting interviews in Indonesia. The Commission believes that the deep divisions in our society from 25 years of conflict, and the violence which entered East Timorese political life in 1975, remain a potential stumbling block to the development of a sustainable culture of democracy and peace in Timor-Leste.

Violence and intimidation have no place in political life in Timor-Leste – the cost is too great. The Commission was encouraged by the humility of political leaders who testified at the National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict of 1974-76, and the positive community response to their openness. However more needs to be done to heal the deep hurt from this period and to consolidate the development of pluralistic and peaceful political life in Timor-Leste.

The Commission recommends that:

9.1.1. All political parties ensure that the universal principles of human rights enshrined in the Constitution of Timor-Leste are fully respected in their policies and practices.

9.1.2. All political parties respect the neutral role of the Police Service, Defence Forces and other state security bodies and include a commitment to respect this principle of neutrality in their party policies.

9.1.3. All political parties make a public commitment to conduct their political activities in a peaceful and non-threatening manner and to take strong disciplinary measures against any party member who advocates or uses the media to ferment aggression or fear in the community.

9.1.4. All political parties make a public commitment that they will never mobilise youth groups for political purposes other than in peaceful and lawful ways.

9.1.5. The five historical political parties – Apodeti, ASDT/Fretilin, KOTA, Trabalhista, and UDT – institute processes, where necessary, to address human rights violations committed in the past by their members or those linked to them, and undertake to work for the implementation of the recommendations in this Report, in particular those directed at permanently removing the threat of violence from political life in Timor-Leste.

9.1.6. The former pro-autonomy political groups still in existence in Indonesia undertake to work for the implementation of the recommendations in this Report, in particular those directed at permanently removing the threat of violence from political life in Timor-Leste.

9.1.7. Civic education programmes make use of the material in this Report to impress on the community the importance of non-violence and the appalling cost of political violence.

9.1.8. The Office of the President undertakes new initiatives to foster political, social and cultural dialogue between East Timorese in Indonesia and Timor-Leste, and that this initiative seeks the involvement of political leaders from all backgrounds and the support of the Government of Indonesia.

10. Reconciliation with Indonesia

Timor-Leste and Indonesia have demonstrated since 1999 that they want to build a new relationship. The Commission commends this forward-looking and generous attitude. The Commission believes that for this new friendship to flourish the principles of acknowledging the truth of the past, accountability for violence, and a spirit of generosity in assisting those who have been harmed by that violence, are vital. During its extensive work in the community, especially with victims of serious violations perpetrated by Indonesian soldiers, the Commission was struck by the generosity of those victims toward Indonesia. Communities in all parts of the country have made clear to the Commission their need to see justice done for the serious crimes committed during the conflict. However this call for justice has rarely been made in a vengeful or hateful way, nor generalised against Indonesia or the Indonesian people. Accountability on the part of those responsible and the competent authorities will open the way for a deeper new relationship based on genuine reconciliation.

The Commission recommends:

Truth as the basis for the relationship

10.1.1. That the Government of Indonesia formally acknowledges receipt of this Report and tables it in the Indonesian Parliament.

10.1.2. That, in order to foster a spirit of reconciliation, the Government of Indonesia sends a senior delegation to Timor-Leste to acknowledge the violations committed by its representatives during the occupation and to apologise to the victims and families of victims for these violations.

10.1.3. That the Government of Indonesia undertakes a revision of official accounts and education materials relating to Indonesia's presence in Timor-Leste to ensure that these give the Indonesian people an accurate and comprehensive account of the period 1974 to 1999, including the UN conduct of the 1999 Popular Consultation, and contribute to reconciliation.

10.1.4. That Indonesia and Timor-Leste continue to develop ways of deepening people-to-people relations and cooperation in social, cultural, economic and political life.

Recognising Indonesian military casualties and assisting Indonesian families

10.1.5. That the Governments of Indonesia and Timor-Leste continue to cooperate in the maintainence of Indonesian war cemeteries in Timor-Leste.

10.1.6. That the Governments of Indonesia and Timor-Leste cooperate to provide information to Indonesian and East Timorese families who do not know the full circumstances of the death and/or whereabouts of the remains of family members who were members of the Indonesian armed forces in Timor-Leste.

10.1.7. That the Governments of Indonesia and Timor-Leste cooperate to assist Indonesian families to visit Timor-Leste to pay their respects to their dead and/or to repatriate the remains of loved ones to Indonesia.

Making available full documentation of military operations resulting in human rights violations of civilians

10.1.8. That the Government of Indonesia makes available to the Government of Timor-Leste and the international community records of military operations that resulted in civilian deaths and injuries and damage to property, including:

- Operation Seroja and the massacres of civilians in Dili on 7 December 1975 and killings on following days
- The military encirclement and annihilation campaigns of 1977-1979
- The Mau Chiga offensive of 1982 in the district of Ainaro; the massacres of civilians in Kraras in 1983 in the district of Viqueque
- The removal of civilians to the island of Ataúro from the early 1980s
- The Santa Cruz Massacre in Dili of 12 November 1991 and subsequent reported killings and disappearances.

10.1. 9. That the Government of Indonesia makes the following information available to the Government of Timor-Leste and the international community:

- The names and details of all ABRI/TNI personnel of East Timorese origin killed in Timor-Leste between 1975 and 1999
- The names and details of all East Timorese children removed from Timor-Leste by the Government of Indonesia, military or related personnel or institutions between 1975 and 1999
- The names and details of all political prisoners who died in custody between 1975 and 1999
- All Indonesian military units which served in Timor-Leste between 1975 and1999, including names of commanding officers
- The formation and funding of East Timorese para-military groups by the Indonesian military and/or other state agencies between 1974 and1999
- All military and civilian intelligence records on Timor-Leste from 1974-1999
- All weapons, military equipment and material purchases or donations from governments and companies between 1975 and 1999 that were used in Timor-Leste during this period.

10.1.10. That the Government of Indonesia makes available to the Government of Timor-Leste and the international community records relating to the involvement of the Indonesian administration and military in the operations of 1999 which resulted in killings and the displacement of more than half the population of Timor-Leste, including:

- Liquiçá Church Massacre, Liquiçá District (6 April 1999)
- Cailaco killings, Bobonaro District (12 April 1999)
- Massacre at Manuel Carrascalão's Dili residence in Dili (17 April 1999)
- Killing of two students at Hera, Dili District (20 May 1999)
- Suai Church Massacre, Covalima District (6 September 1999)
- Maliana Police Station Massacre, Bobonaro District (8 September 1999)
- Murder of church personnel and the journalist accompanying them in Lospalos, Lautém District (25 September 1999)
- Massacres in Passabe and Maquelab, Oecussi District (September-October 1999)
- Massacres in Nitibe, Oecussi District (October 1999).

10.1.11. That the Government of Indonesia cooperates fully with any future international or East Timorese initiatives established to address justice for violations of human rights committed in Timor-Leste between 1974 and 1999.

Peace and stability

10.1.12. That the Government of Indonesia continues to make clear its respect for the independence and sovereignty of Timor-Leste and takes action against any individuals or organisations in Indonesia who undertake illegal activities aimed at destabilising Timor-Leste.

Clearing the names of those wrongly accused

10.1.13. The Government of Indonesia expunges the criminal record of all East Timorese political prisoners tried and found guilty of crimes associated with the peaceful expression of their political beliefs during the period of the conflict.

10.1.14. The Government of Indonesia destroys all intelligence files maintained on East Timorese people relating to the period 1974-1999.

10.1.15. The Government of Indonesia expunges from Department of Immigration "black lists" the names of East Timorese and non-East Timorese human rights activists and instructs all relevant intelligence agencies and government offices to remove these names from lists and files.

Reparations

10.1.16. The Government of Indonesia makes financial contributions to the reparations trust fund recommended elsewhere in this Report.

10.1.17. Indonesian business companies which profited from war and related activities in Timor-Leste between 1974 and 1999 make financial contributions to the reparations trust fund recommended elsewhere in this Report.

11. Acolhimento (Reception)

The 25 year period covered by the Commission mandate saw East Timorese people flee the country for reasons of personal security, political beliefs, or because they were forced to leave. Many thousands who fled in 1999 remain in Indonesian West Timor and other parts of Indonesia. Thousands more who fled Timor-Leste in 1975 and later, live in Portugal and Australia, and smaller numbers are spread across the world. East Timorese children taken to Indonesia during the war continue to be separated from their families.

The creation of a climate of welcome or acolhimento for East Timorese who wish to visit or return to Timor-Leste should be a national priority. This will strengthen the inclusive, democratic nature of our society and add to its capacity and security in important ways. Where East Timorese people have been involved in human rights violations, due process should apply consistent with official commitments to build a society based on accountability, rule of law and human rights.

11.1.1. There are ongoing initiatives to promote contact and goodwill between East Timorese in Timor-Leste and East Timorese in Indonesia, particularly West Timor, with an emphasis on social, cultural and educational exchanges for children and youth, and that community leaders, the Catholic Church and other faith communities, Indonesian NGOs and the Government of Indonesia be requested to assist this process.

11.1.2. Ways of nurturing Timor-Leste's relationship with East Timorese who are living abroad or who have taken citizenship in other countries are developed so that overseas East Timorese people are encouraged to retain their family, cultural and other links with the country of their origin and to contribute to the interests of Timor-Leste through their activities and connections abroad.

11.2. Separated children

Many East Timorese children were separated from their families during the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste, including some 4,500 in 1999. Many in the pre-1999 category are now adults and include some who are looking for their families but may not know where they come from. Most of those who became separated from their families during the violence of 1999 have either been reunited with their families or have continued to stay with caretakers. Responsibility for this category rests with the Governments of Indonesia and Timor-Leste following the signing in December 2004 of a "Memorandum of Understanding Concerning Cooperation to Protect the Rights of Separated and Refugee Children", facilitated by UNHCR.

The Commission recommends that:

11.2.1. The implementation of the 2004 MOU between the Governments of Timor-Leste and the Indonesia be monitored by NGOs in both countries to ensure that the rights of separated children, particularly any whose cases have not been resolved and those in the custody of caregivers, are protected – including their right to unhindered access to identity and nationality procedures.

11.2.2. The Governments of Timor-Leste and Indonesia ensure that regular and free communication is maintained between the child and parents while the child remains with the caretaker or with an institution and that separated children are able to make informed decisions about their future free of intimidation or fear.

11.2.3 Assistance be provided, particularly for those in remote, poor areas, so that parents and adult separated children can trace each other, communicate and meet.

12. Reparations

> Because of the war I was used like a horse by the Indonesian soldiers who took me in turns and made me bear so many children. But now I no longer have the strength to push my children towards a better future.[1]

12.1. Introduction

The Commission urges the Government of Timor-Leste to implement a programme of reparations for the most vulnerable victims of human rights violations.

All East Timorese people have been touched and victimised by the conflict in one way or another. However, in the course of its contact with many communities the Commission became acutely aware of those among us who still suffer daily from the consequences of the conflict and whose children will inherit the disadvantages their parents face as a consequence of their victimisation. They include those who live in extreme poverty, are disabled, or, who - due to misunderstandings - are shunned or discriminated against by their communities. We are all victims but not all victims are equal. We must acknowledge this reality and lend a hand to those who are most vulnerable.

The Commission believes that this recommendation is consistent with:

- The Constitution of Timor-Leste which states that "the State shall ensure special protection to the war-disabled, orphans, and other dependents of those who dedicated their lives to the struggle for independence and national sovereignty, and shall protect all those who participated in the resistance against the foreign occupation" (Section 11);
- The mandate of the Commission which requires it to assist in restoring the human dignity of victims, to promote reconciliation [Regulation 10/2001, Section 3.1(f) and (g)] and also to make "recommendations concerning reforms and other measures whether legal, political or administrative which could be taken to achieve the objectives of the Commission, to prevent the repetition of human rights violations and to respond to the needs of victims of human rights violations" [Regulation 10/2001, Section 21.2];
- East Timorese tradition, according to which a person who experienced a wrong-doing has the right to receive some measures to correct the offence;
- International human rights law,*according to which victims of human rights violations have the right to seek redress.

A reparations programme will ensure that:

- The most vulnerable victims, who are often on the margins of their communities, will gain access to basic services and opportunities provided to the general community;

* Basic principles and guidelines on the right to a remedy and reparation for victims of gross violations of international human rights law and serious violations of international humanitarian law, approved by the Human Rights Commission of the UN on 20 April 2005 [UN Doc. E/CN.4/RES/2005/35, Annexe].

- A form of justice is delivered which directly benefits the victim and will contribute to healing, national reconciliation and a further reduction in the possibility of violence;
- The most vulnerable victims of past atrocities will be afforded recognition and the means to enjoy their fundamental rights and fulfil their potential on an equal footing with other citizens of Timor-Leste.

12.2. What are reparations?

During the course of its work, the Commission defined reparations as measures to repair damages suffered by victims of human rights abuses, including rehabilitation, restitution, compensation, recognition of a truthful account of what happened, and guarantee of non-repetition of these violations. Reparations can take shape as measures directed to individuals or, collectively, to groups of victims.

The Commission places reparations in a human rights framework which includes three essential components which cannot be substituted for each other: truth, justice and reparations.

Some forms of reparations

Compensation which includes fair and adequate compensation through litigation or mediation.

Restitution which is the re-establishment, as far as possible, of the situation that existed for the beneficiary prior to the violation.

Rehabilitation which is the provision of medical and psychological care and the fulfillment of significant personal and community needs.

Restoration of dignity, which includes symbolic forms of reparation.

Establishment of the truth which may include public confession and apology from perpetrators, and testimonies on violations and their impact from victims and their families.

Reassurance of non-repetition which is the creation of legislative and administrative measures that contribute to the maintenance of a stable society and the prevention of the re-occurrence of human rights violations.

12.3. Legal and moral foundations for reparations

In its inquiry into past human rights violations the Commission listened to victims of violations from all districts of the country, who suffered at the hands of all sides to the conflicts. Life has been terribly altered for many victims who survived violations. The thousands of dead due to human rights violations left behind families. Many families continue to look for loved ones who have disappeared. There are thousands of survivors of rape, torture and other gross human rights violations who still suffer consequences of these violations in their everyday lives.

As it listened to survivors, in hearings and workshops or giving statements and interviews, the Commission was struck by the humble nature of what most survivors seek. Overwhelmingly they have expressed to the Commission that they seek some kind of accountability on the part of the perpetrators, and simple assistance to enable them and their children to participate on an even footing in the new democratic Timor-Leste. For many this participation is difficult due to the severe hardships they still suffer due to the violations inflicted upon them

As Timor-Leste seeks to establish itself as a new democratic nation based on the rule of law and respect for human rights, there is a deep moral obligation to reach out to and assist our brothers and sisters who are struggling to participate in this new life. The values of our nation will be measured by our actions in this regard, not merely by the words of our new laws and leaders.

Furthermore, as a member of the United Nations, Timor-Leste has committed to uphold, respect and enforce human rights and humanitarian law standards. This includes the principle of ensuring appropriate remedies and reparations to victims of human rights violations, as stipulated in the UN Principles and Guidelines on the Right to Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Violations of International Human Rights and Humanitarian Law.

Timor-Leste context

From its inquiry, the Commission has found that all sides of the conflict were responsible for committing human rights violations. During the Commission's National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict, leaders of political parties bravely and honestly testified about the violence during the period of the internal armed conflict, claiming institutional responsibility for some of the crimes of the past and their commitment to repair the harms inflicted upon victims and their families.[] This commitment is reflected in the Constitution of Timor-Leste which obliges the state to provide "special protection to the war-disabled, orphans, and other dependents".[2] Following this, the State of Timor-Leste has the moral and constitutional obligation to ensure that victims of past human rights violations receive measures of reparations.

However, the highest proportion of institutional responsibility for human rights violations falls on the shoulders of State of Indonesia, the occupying force whose agents committed most of the gross violations. Indonesia has the moral and legal responsibility to repair the damage caused by its policies and state agents.

* Testimonies of key historical actors and representatives and members of the five political historical parties, at the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76 held between 15 and 18 December 2003, are recorded in the CAVR Archive on video recording. The Commission also published a book on this hearing titled: The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, CAVR National Public Hearing 15-18 December 2003.

Learning from the experience of repairing past violations in other nations, the struggle to gain reparations from an invading nation is one that may take time. In the meantime, many of the victims can no longer wait. Timor-Leste must step into the void. The international community, who looked the other way when atrocities were committed, also bears a portion of this responsibility.

12.4. The Commission's contribution

> Not one person cared about what happened to me. I was alone.[3]

As a transitional justice mechanism, the Commission had as its core focus the experience and rights of victims of past human rights violations. The Commission, in implementing its mandate, placed victims at the centre of its long-term goal of social rebuilding and reconciliation.

The Commission listened to thousands of victims and asked them what they needed to assist in this transformation. This was done during hearings at national, sub-district and village levels and at healing workshops conducted with survivors of human rights violations from all districts.

A special section in the executive body of the Commission was established to support victims who participated in Commission activities. This unit helped implement an urgent reparations programme to assist vulnerable victims with urgent medical and other matters. This programme identified 712 victims with urgent needs who were then helped to access services, were provided with US$200 each, and in some cases, were supported to participate in healing workshops and public hearings organised by the Commission. The Commission, in partnership with NGOs, also developed a number of pilot projects on collective measures for urgent reparations in severely affected communities (see Chega! Vol 4, Part 10: Acolhimento and Victim Support).

In all aspects of its work, the Commission sought to have a reparative effect but the need for targeted reparations exceeded the Commission's capacity in the time available. Individual victims and communities told the Commission clearly and repeatedly of the need for ongoing healing and work to repair damage caused by human rights violations.

12.5. Reconciliation

The Commission believes that lasting reconciliation cannot be achieved without establishing the truth, striving for justice, and providing reparations to victims. Reparations are necessary to restore the dignity of victims and to repair damaged relationships within our society. In East Timorese culture, the institution of kasu sala – a traditional mediation process which establishes who has been wronged by whom and what compensation should be given to the wronged party - sets the foundation for community reconciliation and peace-building. In the same way, acknowledging the suffering of victims through reparations is a cornerstone to lasting reconciliation in a nation that has experienced more than two decades of violence.

12.6. Guiding principles for a reparations programme in Timor-Leste

The following principles will assist in the development of an effective reparations programme for the most vulnerable victims of human rights violations in Timor-Leste:

Feasibility

As a new nation in the early stages of development, Timor-Leste is faced with many competing needs. In order to be feasible in this context, the reparations programme should be selective and focus on the most urgent needs of the most vulnerable and, where possible, provide collective responses that are cost-effective and inventive.

Accessibility

Care should be taken to ensure the programme is accessible to victims who are disadvantaged not only as a consequence of their experience but also by their isolation, lack of information and means of transport, particularly those in remote rural areas.

Empowerment

The programme should empower those who have suffered gross human rights violations to take control over their own lives and to free themselves of both the practical constraints and the psychological and emotional feelings of victimhood. The delivery of rehabilitation services and other reparation measures should use a victim-centred and community-based empowerment approach.

Gender

The programme should take gender differences into account because the conflict in Timor-Leste affected men and women differently. Men and women experienced not only different types of human rights violations during the conflict, but also different barriers to mitigating the impact of these violations. More men were targeted as victims of detention, torture, killings and disappearances than women. However, when women became victims of detention, torture and other violations, they suffered disproportionately from sexual violence and faced on-going discrimination as victims. Women also suffered when their husbands, sons, fathers, and other members of their families experienced human rights violations. They became the primary carer in their family, taking responsibility for the sick and wounded, and working to feed their children and other dependents when other providers in the family were detained, disappeared, killed or maimed. They also became increasingly vulnerable to sexual violence when the traditional "protector" of the family was absent. At least 50% of programme resources should be directed to female beneficiaries.

Prioritisation based on need

The programme should address those most in need of support due to past violations. It is not possible for a single reparations programme to answer all the needs of all those who suffered during the conflict in Timor-Leste and the programme is not intended to take the place of long term national development, itself the major objective of the Timorese state.

12.7. Reparations programme

The main aim of this reparations scheme is to assist vulnerable victims of gross human rights violations, within the scope of the mandate of the Commission, by repairing, as far as possible, the damage to their lives caused by the violations through the delivery of social services and symbolic and collective measures.

Rehabilitation

The rehabilitation of victims should include medical and psycho-social care. Where this is already being provided to the general community by the Government and civil society, the programme should support victims to access these services, give service providers additional resources to reach beneficiaries and ensure quality service delivery by monitoring and providing feedback to service providers.

Collective measures

The programme should also ensure that rehabilitation takes place in a community context. This means that collective measures be developed to ensure that rehabilitation of victims of human rights violations takes place in context and together with their communities. A special window should be developed through which communities or groups of victims can apply for such assistance. These measures should be determined in consultation with the victims and can take the form of symbolic recognition, as described below, and/or material support for activities or items identified by victims together.

Symbolic measures

Symbolic measures, developed in consultation with victims, might include memorialisation, commemoration ceremonies, exhumations and reburials or marking and honouring of mass graves. Symbolic measures honour victims of past atrocities, strengthen the social commitment to oppose repetition of such acts, are educative and promote reconciliation.

12.8. Objectives

- To identify the most vulnerable victims of human rights violations committed during the Commission's mandate period and support their rehabilitation.

- To facilitate rehabilitation of communities or groups of victims most severely affected by human rights violations during the mandate period.
- To promote recognition and respect for victims of human rights violations and to preserve the memory of past atrocities and suffering in order to ensure the non-repetition of such acts.

12.9. Target beneficiaries

According to the Commission's mandate "a victim means a person who, individually or as part of a collective, has suffered harm, including physical or mental injury, emotional suffering, economic loss or substantial impairment of his or her rights as a result of acts or omissions over which the Commission has jurisdiction to consider and includes the relatives or dependents of persons who have individually suffered harm." (Regulation 10/2001, Section 1)

Taking into account the principles of feasibility and needs-based prioritisation, the Commission recommends that the programme focus on benefiting the most vulnerable among those who continue to suffer the consequences of gross human rights violations which took place between 24 April 1974 and 25 October 1999, namely:

- Victims of torture
- People with mental and physical disabilities
- Victims of sexual violence
- Widows and single-mothers
- Children affected by the conflict
- Communities who suffered large-scale and gross human rights violations, with a relatively high concentration of victims identified above.

Working definitions for beneficiaries

Victims of torture are those who were detained, tortured, and continue to gravely suffer the consequences of the torture they experienced.

People with disabilities due to gross human rights violations are those who have become permanently physically or mentally disabled, either totally or partially, as a consequence of the conflict. Examples are victims who suffered amputations, lacerations, loss of body parts, gunshot wounds; victims with bullets or shell fragments in their bodies, or who have permanent problems due to severe beatings and torture which have left them totally or partially disabled; or victims with disabling mental health problems due to past violations.

Victims of sexual violence are those women and girls who were subjected to acts such as rape, sexual slavery, forced marriage or other forms of sexual violence; and boys and men who suffered sexual violence.

Widows and single mothers are women whose husbands were killed or disappeared and who, as a result, are the primary breadwinners for their families. Also included here are women whose children were born out of rape or sexual slavery and consequently became single mothers.

Children affected by the conflict are defined as:

- children who suffer from disabilities due to gross human rights violations
- children whose parents were killed or disappeared
- children born out of an act of sexual violence whose mother is single
- children who suffer psychological damage.
- Children will be eligible for reparations if they were 18 years of age or younger on 25 October 1999.

The Commission recommends that the reparations programme begins with a list of victims who came before the CAVR, selected and prioritised according to the criteria set out in this reparations policy. A two-year window period for further identification of beneficiaries eligible for reparations to complement those identified by the Commission, shall be provided, in order to ensure inclusiveness to those most vulnerable who did not come before the CAVR.

12.10. Financing

Indonesia should bear a significant proportion of the costs. As the occupying power which committed most of the violations, Indonesia has the greatest moral and legal responsibility to repair the damage caused by its policies and agents in Timor-Leste.

Member states of the international community, and business corporations who supported the illegal occupation of Timor-Leste and thus indirectly allowed violations to take place, are obliged to provide reparations to victims based on the principle of international responsibility recognised in the international customary law of torts.

Contributions will also be welcome from international agencies and NGOs, based on the principle of social justice.

Timor-Leste is obliged by the Constitution to ”ensure special protection to the war-disabled, orphans, and other dependents who dedicated their lives to the struggle for independence and national sovereignty, and shall protect all those who participated in the resistance against the foreign occupation.” [Section 11, Constitution of RDTL]. In the spirit of reconciliation, the Commission recommends that this undertaking to take care of members of the Resistance is extended to include victims of human rights violations committed by all sides.

If Indonesia is slow to respond, Timor-Leste and the international community should make their contributions while pressing Indonesia to fulfil its responsibilities. Many of the victims cannot afford to wait.

The Commission therefore recommends that the reparations scheme be jointly funded by:

- Fixed allocation (guaranteed by legislation) from the Timor-Leste national budget
- Reparations by the State of Indonesia
- Reparations by Indonesian business companies, including State Owned Enterprises, and other international and multinational corporations and businesses who profited from war and benefited from the occupation
- Reparations from the Permanent Members of the Security Council – China, France, Russia, United Kingdom, United States of America
- Contributions from governments who provided military assistance, including weapons sales and training, to the Indonesian Government during the occupation and business corporations who benefited from the sale of weapons to Indonesia.

Contributions from governments, international agencies, foundations and other civil society organisations, including special funds for victims of human rights violations, such as the United Nations Fund for Victims of Torture.

The Commission recommends that a trust fund be established to receive and manage the contributions and that this fund be regularly audited.

12.11. Duration

The Commission recommends that the programme functions for an initial period of 5 years, with the possibility of extension. It is recommended that the scholarship programme for children continues until the last eligible child turns 18 years old in 2017.

12.12. Methods

Methods for delivery of the reparations programme shall be developed in consultation with victims and victims groups and will include the following:

Support for single mothers and scholarships for their children

The programme will provide single mothers, including victims of sexual violence and war widows, with a scholarship for their school-aged children until they turn 18 years old. The package will include funds for school fees and other costs and will be administered by government agencies and/or NGOs at district level. Single mothers will be expected to travel to a service delivery organisation once a month to receive the funds, and at the same time have access to other services, such as counselling, peer support, livelihood skills training, and access to micro-credit for livelihood activities. The monthly activity will also serve as a focal-point for accessing other essential services, such as healthcare.

Support for the disabled, widows, and survivors of sexual violence and torture

The programme will provide widows, survivors of sexual violence (without school-aged children), the disabled, and torture survivors with social services, including rehabilitation, skills training and access to micro-credit for livelihood activities. The delivery of these services will be conducted by government agencies, specialised NGOs and community-based NGOs.

Support for severely affected communities

The programme will provide support to severely affected communities who make a collective application for reparations. Applications will be required to include an account of how the community was affected by the conflict and, in general terms, the violations experienced, a concrete project to alleviate the harm suffered, and a list of beneficiaries who will be involved in the activities. This programme can also be used by government agencies and/or NGOs for activities such as healing workshops and other restorative work, including creative therapy and activities such as theatre, graphic arts, music and prayer. A gender-balance of beneficiaries is a criteria for eligibility.

Memorialisation

The programme will promote national memorialisation in consultation with victims and other stakeholders including the government. The programme of memorialisation should be guided by, but not limited to, atrocities described in this Report and include commemoration ceremonies, dates, monuments, and other initiatives to honour and remember victims of human rights violations in local communities and at the national level. Memorialisation will also include the development of educational materials on Timor-Leste's historic struggle to uphold human rights, the development of popular literature, music and art for remembrance, and – as recommended elsewhere in this Report – an education programme to promote a culture of non-violent resolution of conflict.

Commitment to non-recurrence of violence

As part of a national commitment to non-repetition of violence, a special education programme to mitigate the impact of 25 years of violence will be conducted together with relevant government agencies and civil society. Acknowledging the cycle of violence which continues to permeate East Timorese society, at the workplace and in our homes, the national reparations programme shall develop an education campaign to increase public awareness of the link between past abuses and current violent behaviour. The aim of this education programme is to facilitate a change in the practice of using violence a means to mediate conflict, at all levels of life. In order to honour victims of mass violence, we must make a clear commitment to transform this legacy from the past.

12.13. Implementing body

The Commission recommends that an implementing body for the national reparations programme be established that will function for the duration of the programme. Its task will be to implement and coordinate the National Reparations Programme in cooperation with a range of relevant partners. These will include service delivery government agencies, such as the Ministry of Labour and Solidarity, Ministry of Health, Ministry of Education, and service delivery NGOs and church-based organisations working at national and district levels.

The implementing body will engage grassroots "social workers" or facilitators at the district level, who will receive some training and transportation support. These district workers will help connect victims to services needed.

The implementing body will develop and support innovative programmes, together with NGOs, to assist victims, victims groups, and communities, to address needs and issues in a sustainable and empowering way.

The implementing body shall establish an advisory board which includes representatives of victims and victims groups, and organisations and individuals with high-standing in the community for protecting the rights of victims, as a permanent consultative body in the development and delivery of its programme.

13. Follow-on institution to the CAVR

The Commission has made a certain contribution to the nation building process of Timor-Leste in the early years of transition in our new democracy. This transition will be an ongoing and long process. It is the Commission's view, based on three years of dialogue with local communities, that many aspects of its work should be followed up as part of the national effort to build a society based on acknowledging the truth of the past, non-violence, reconciliation and reparations. The work of recording, preserving and sharing the truth of our history, of continuing the promotion of lasting reconciliation, and of creating a society based on human rights and the rule of law can all be enhanced by the establishment of an institution to carry on aspects of the Commission's work.

The Commission recommends that:

13.1.1. The National Parliament supports the recommendations in this Report, takes primary responsibility for overseeing and monitoring their implementation and delegates this task to an appropriate Parliamentary Committee.

13.1.2. The National Parliament mandates an appropriate organisation to conduct a national consultation under the auspices of the Presidency on the role, terms of reference and feasibility of a follow-on institution and, based on these findings, to make a recommendation for consideration by the National Parliament. Issues to be considered should include:

- The implementation of the Recommendations in this Report

- The need for further reconciliation in Timor-Leste
- The preservation of the ex-Balide Comarca as a heritage site and its use as a national memorial centre for victims and human rights
- The preservation and use of the CAVR archives
- The legal status of the institution.

After looking at forty truth commissions world-round, I concluded that the truth commission of East Timor was among the five strongest. It was an impressive, passionate and scrupulous exercise. And its report, Chega!, stands in testament to this careful and rigorous exercise, honestly re ecting the victims' stories as well as the far-reaching conclusions that emerged from this work. It is wonderful that this will now be available, in full, in English; it will be an important reference for others embarking on a similar path.

Priscilla Hayner,
Author, Unspeakable Truths: Transitional Justice and the Challenge of Truth Commissions (2nd ed., 2011)

"The extensive CAVR Report is an encyclopedia of our history, rich in both teachings and suffering. We must utilise its great teachings to better understand today's crisis and to help prevent future crises."

Jose Ramos-Horta,
Nobel Peace Laureate, former President and Prime Minister of Timor-Leste (July 2006)

"Chega! is troubling testimony. This report will jolt Indonesian readers who think that under the Soeharto regime everything was peaceful in Indonesia's then 27th province. Page after page recounts the stories of victims of massacres, rape, forced disappearances, torture and other unimaginable crimes ... Indonesia can learn from Chega! This report is an important contribution to democratisation and security sector reform in Indonesia."

Ifdhal Kasim,
Chair, Indonesian Commission on Human Rights (August 2010)

"The CAVR Report constitutes an important milestone in the search for justice, truth and reconciliation in Timor-Leste. It is my sincere hope that (it) will be an enduring contribution to building the Timorese nation and will help to prevent the recurrence of such tragic events in Timor-Leste and elsewhere."

East Timor 1999: Crimes against humanity

Report commissioned by the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR)

Preface

In the aftermath of East Timor's historic vote for independence in August 1999, the supporters of Indonesian rule reduced the country to a shattered, smouldering ruin. By late October, some 1,500 people had been killed, scores of women had been raped, 70% of all the buildings in the country had been destroyed, and more than half the population had been forced to flee their homes.

This report provides a detailed account of that violence, and an analysis of its principal causes, patterns and variations. Drawing upon previously unpublished documents and eyewitness testimonies, it also offers a new assessment of political and legal responsibility for the crimes committed, and recommendations aimed at ensuring that those responsible will be brought to justice.

The violence of 1999 provoked outrage not only in Timor-Leste but around the world. State leaders and UN bodies, including the Security Council, vowed that the culprits would be punished. Two UN-authorised investigations, both conducted in late 1999, concluded that crimes against humanity had been committed, and that Indonesian authorities bore primary responsibility. A report by Indonesia's own Human Rights Commission drew similar conclusions, and all three investigations recommended that an international criminal tribunal should be established to ensure that the perpetrators would be brought to justice in accordance with international law. The UN Secretary General welcomed these findings, and said that he would follow closely the efforts to secure justice for the victims.

In an effort to defuse pressure for an international tribunal, in 2001 Indonesia established a special judicial mechanism to try some of those responsible. That process has now been widely dismissed as a sham and a travesty of justice, even by Indonesia's most loyal allies. Of the 18 people charged and tried before the Ad Hoc Human Rights Court in Jakarta, all but one have now been acquitted; and that one suspect, the notorious militia leader Eurico Guterres, remains free pending appeal of his sentence. Not a single Indonesian officer or official has been jailed as a result of those trials; indeed, most of those accused have been promoted, and some now occupy highly sensitive positions within the country's security apparatus.

Timor-Leste's judiciary, with UN and international assistance, has done better. As of late 2004 more than 370 people had been indicted for crimes against humanity committed in 1999, including General Wiranto and several other high ranking Indonesian officers and officials. Of that number, some 50 had been convicted and sentenced to prison terms by Timor-Leste's Special Panels for Serious Crimes. Unfortunately, virtually all of those convicted have been local militiamen or low ranking East Timorese soldiers. Indonesian officers and officials have remained effectively beyond the reach of Timor-Leste's courts. In late 2004, for example, around 280 of the 370 indictees remained at large in Indonesia.

This disappointing lack of progress is partly due to the weakness of Indonesia's judiciary, and to the refusal by Indonesian authorities to cooperate with the East Timorese process. It is also related to the reluctance of Timor-Leste's own political leadership to antagonise so powerful and potentially dangerous a neighbour as Indonesia. That concern has led the President, Xanana Gusmão, and some government ministers to publicly disavow the idea of an international tribunal, and to focus instead on the goal of reconciliation. The real problem, however, has been the utter failure of key states and of the United Nations itself to assume and accept responsibility in the matter. Notwithstanding early expressions of outrage, and some significant support for the judicial process within in Timor-Leste, there has been no serious international effort to ensure that those most responsible for the 1999 atrocities will be brought to justice.

The idea of an international criminal tribunal for Timor-Leste, endorsed by all three serious investigations, has effectively been abandoned. In its place, interested parties have proposed a variety of half-measures, including the establishment of a UN Commission of Experts, to assess the Indonesian and East Timorese trials, and a joint Indonesia-East Timor Truth and Friendship Commission, with a mandate to discuss what happened in 1999, but not to do anything about it. While some good might eventually come from such initiatives, there is a real danger that they will simply delay further, and more likely derail altogether, proper judicial proceedings.

This report offers a more straightforward recommendation: that the UN Secretary General and the Security Council establish, without further delay, an international criminal tribunal to try those responsible for the crimes against humanity committed in Timor-Leste in 1999. Given the severity of the crimes in question, the fact that they were committed more than five years ago, and that all available remedies have been tried and found wanting, this is not an unreasonable proposal. Indeed, to do any less would arguably be an expression of contempt for the rule of law. And it would send a clear message to past and future perpetrators - whether in Indonesia, in the Sudan, in Iraq, in the United States, or elsewhere - that they need not fear any sanction for grave breaches of international human rights and humanitarian law.

The idea for this report originated within the Human Rights Unit (HRU) of the United Nations Mission of Support in East Timor (UNMISET), and I was commissioned to write it in mid-2002 by the UN's Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR). The idea was to draw upon the considerable body of evidence that had been gathered by UN Political Affairs and Human Rights Officers since 1999, with a view to writing a more fully textured account than had been possible in the immediate aftermath of the violence. Among other things, it was envisioned that the report would be submitted to Timor-Leste's new Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation (CAVR) which was then just starting its important work, and to other official bodies entrusted with investigating and prosecuting the crimes of 1999. There was also general agreement that the report would be published and widely disseminated, if possible in Indonesian and Tetum as well as in English.

As expected, the information gathered by UN Political Affairs and Human Rights Officers based in Timor-Leste was extraordinarily rich and harrowing. But it soon became clear that other offices in Timor-Leste held additional information that would usefully complement the evidence gathered by the HRU, including a large volume of documents that had been retrieved from the ruins of Indonesian military, police, and militia offices in late 1999. The most important collections were those held by the local human rights organisation, Yayasan HAK, and the Serious Crimes Unit (SCU), an office established in 2000 by the United Nations Transitional Authority in East Timor (UNTAET).

Despite some early concerns about confidentiality, both Yayasan HAK and the SCU eventually granted access to their archival collections for the purpose of preparing this report. Both also offered invaluable assistance with fact checking and legal interpretation, as the report was being written. Other individuals and organisations - notably staff at the International Center for Transitional Justice in New York and at Amnesty International headquarters in London - provided valuable comments and advice on various drafts. Without the help of these people and organisations, without their genuine commitment to the cause of justice, this report could scarcely have been written.

The report was completed in July 2003, and in early 2004 the UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights formally submitted a copy to the CAVR. Copies were also furnished to Yayasan HAK and the SCU, in accordance with earlier agreements and in appreciation of their assistance. The version published here by Yayasan HAK has been lightly edited, but its substance and its principal arguments and conclusions remain unchanged from the original.

More than five years have now passed since the crimes described in this report were committed, and since the international community vowed that those crimes would be punished. As one of those who witnessed the terrible events of 1999, and who had faith that the promises of justice were sincere, I am saddened that so little has been done to give them effect. I hope that the publication of this report will go some way toward remedying that situation.

Executive Summary

*The past cannot remain shrouded in mystery. In such situations the victims continue to seek justice and are unable to come to terms with their sorrow and distress.

In the course of 1999, Timor-Leste was the scene of terrible violence. Between early January and late October, at least 1,200 civilians, and perhaps as many as 1,500, were killed. Some were shot dead, while others were decapitated, disembowelled or hacked to death with machetes. Many were subjected to torture and ill-treatment. Women and girls suffered rape and other crimes of sexual violence. The systematic violence fuelled the forcible displacement of the population on a massive scale.

The violence took place in the context of a referendum, or Popular Consultation, on Timor-Leste's political status supervised and carried out by the United Nations (UN) on 30 August 1999. In the period before the ballot, suspected supporters of independence were subjected to persistent threats and acts of violence by pro-Indonesian militia groups. In spite of the evident dangers, East Timorese welcomed the opportunity to vote on their political future and voted resoundingly for independence.

The worst of the violence followed the announcement of that vote on 4 September. Over the next few weeks, Indonesian soldiers and police joined armed pro-Indonesian militiamen in a campaign of violence so sustained and so brutal that it shocked even those who had predicted a backlash. Before a UN-sanctioned military force arrived to restore order in late September, hundreds of people had been killed and an estimated 400,000 people - more than half the population - had been forced to flee their homes.

Indonesian authorities have offered a variety of explanations for these events. They have claimed that the pro-Indonesian militia groups formed spontaneously in response to provocation by pro-independence activists, and that the violence was the result of 'clashes' between the two sides. The post-ballot violence, according to the official view, was an understandable expression of anger on the part of pro-Indonesian East Timorese at a perceived UN bias toward independence. In response to evidence that Indonesian soldiers had themselves committed acts of violence, the authorities have acknowledged that some 'rogue elements' might have done so, but they have insisted that the armed forces as an institution had been disciplined and had worked hard to contain the violence.

Outside observers, as well as many East Timorese, have offered a different interpretation. They have questioned the claim that the violence was the result of 'clashes' among East Timorese, arguing instead that it was instigated by Indonesian military authorities and in particular by its Special Forces Command (Komando Pasukan Khusus - Kopassus). They have asserted that the pro-Indonesian militia groups were essentially proxy forces, created, supplied, and organised by Indonesian military and civilian authorities, and that they acted under orders from Indonesian military officers. In response to official claims that military involvement had been limited to a handful of 'rogue elements,' they have pointed to evidence that high-ranking officers were involved, and that much of the violence appeared to have been planned.

While bearing these divergent views in mind, this report seeks to provide an independent assessment of the nature and causes of the violence in Timor-Leste. More specifically, this report has three aims. First, it sets out to describe and to characterise the violence as fully and accurately as possible, focussing on the period between 1 January and late October 1999. Second, it attempts to explain how and why the violence happened and took the forms that it did. Third, and most importantly, it seeks to establish who was responsible for the violence, and what the appropriate remedy might be.

Method and mandate

The findings and conclusions of this report are not based on unsubstantiated claims made by Indonesian government officials or by their critics. Nor do they rest on the discovery of a 'smoking gun,' either documentary or testimonial. Rather, they are based on a careful examination and analysis of the now substantial documentary and testimonial record. The principal sources consulted include:

- Secret internal reports, memoranda, and orders originating with Indonesian military, police, and civilian authorities, and with various militia groups and other pro-Indonesian organisations;
- Testimony of eyewitnesses to and victims of the violence, as recorded and compiled by respected international and domestic human rights organisations, by jurists, and by United Nations officials;
- Internal reports and memoranda on the events of 1999 prepared by the UN Mission in East Timor (UNAMET), the UN Transitional Administration for East Timor (UNTAET) and the UN Mission of Support in East Timor (UNMISET);
- Findings of other credible investigations into the violence, including those issued by three UN Special Rapporteurs (December 1999), by the International Commission of Inquiry on East Timor (January 2000), and by Indonesia's Commission on Human Rights Violations in East Timor (January 2000);
- Criminal indictments filed against the suspected perpetrators of the violence, by prosecutors in Indonesia and in Timor-Leste, and information emerging from criminal proceedings in both places;
- Scholarly analyses, media reports, and other secondary sources.

This report was commissioned by the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) in July 2002. It was researched and written by Dr. Geoffrey Robinson, Associate Professor of History at UCLA. An expert on human rights in Indonesia and Timor-Leste, Dr. Robinson served as a Political Affairs Officer with the United Nations Mission in East Timor (UNAMET) in Dili from June to November 1999. He conducted research for this report in Dili between August and October 2002, and completed it in July 2003. He was assisted in the preparation of this report by the Human Rights Unit of the United Nations Mission of Support in East Timor (UNMISET), and by the Serious Crimes Unit (SCU) in the Office of the Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes in Dili.

Outline and conclusions

The report is divided into five parts, each containing two or more chapters. The first part (Chapters 1 and 2) places the events of 1999 in historical and political context, and outlines the essential elements of Indonesian strategy in Timor-Leste in 1999. The second (Chapters 3-5) examines and analyses the main patterns of human rights violations in Timor-Leste in 1999. The third (Chapters 6-8) spells out the nature of the relationship between the armed militia groups and the Indonesian authorities. The fourth (Chapters 9 and 10) provides summaries of the human rights situation in each of Timor-Leste's 13 administrative districts, and detailed examinations of 15 major human rights cases. The final part (Chapters 11 and 12) addresses questions of responsibility and judicial remedy for the crimes committed in 1999.

The report concludes that the acts of violence in 1999 constituted crimes against humanity, that they were part of an operation planned and carried out by the Indonesian authorities, and that senior Indonesian officials bear individual criminal and command responsibility for the crimes committed. More specifically, it concludes that:

1. The acts of violence described in this report - including murder, rape, torture, forcible displacement, and destruction of property - were part of a widespread and systematic attack on the civilian population of East Timor that targeted real or alleged supporters of independence. As such, they are appropriately considered not only grave violations of human rights but also crimes against humanity.
2. The direct perpetrators of those crimes were primarily members of armed pro-Indonesia militia groups, of which there were more than two dozen in 1999. However, members of the TNI, and to a lesser extent the Police, were also very often directly responsible.
3. Contrary to the claims of Indonesian officials, the militia groups did not emerge spontaneously in response to provocation by pro-independence groups. Rather, they were recruited, trained, armed, paid, and coordinated by Indonesian military authorities, in accordance with long-established Indonesian military doctrine and practice.
4. TNI officers and civilian government authorities conspired to use the militias as proxies to terrorise the population into supporting the 'special autonomy' option in the August 1999 ballot and, to that end, they authorised, encouraged or acquiesced in acts of violence amounting to crimes against humanity.
5. Some 50 military officers at or above the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel, and some 30 senior civilian government and police officials, appear to bear either command or individual responsibility for the crimes that were committed, and should be the subject of further criminal investigation.

6. Notwithstanding their eventual contribution to ending the violence in September 1999, powerful members of the international community share responsibility for the crimes committed in 1999, by virtue of their historical acquiescence in Indonesia's unlawful occupation of Timor-Leste, and through their failure to insist upon adequate security provisions for the Popular Consultation in 1999.
7. The United Nations bears a special responsibility to ensure that the perpetrators of the violence in Timor-Leste are brought to justice. The Security Council should act upon the recommendations of previous UN investigations, and establish an international criminal tribunal for East Timor at the earliest opportunity.

Historical and political context

1. At the heart of the crisis in 1999 was the question of Timor-Leste's political status. Long a colony of Portugal, Timor-Leste was invaded by neighbouring Indonesia in 1975 and subsequently annexed. For the next 24 years, the territory's political status remained in dispute, both in Timor-Leste itself and internationally. Though some states recognised Indonesian sovereignty, the United Nations never did so. As far as the UN was concerned, Portugal retained its formal status as administering authority.

2. The period of Indonesian rule (1975-1999) was marked by persistent resistance, both armed and peaceful. In the early years, that resistance was led by Fretilin (Frente Revolucionária de Timor Leste Independente – Revolutionary Front for an Independent East Timor); and its armed wing, Falintil (Forças Armadas de Libertação Nacional de Timor Leste – Armed Forces for the National Liberation of East Timor). In the 1990s, an umbrella organisation called the CNRT (Conselho Nacional da Resistência Timorense –National Council of Timorese Resistance) assumed the leadership, supported by a range of social and political organisations, the Clandestine Front, and by Falintil.

3. Indonesian rule was also marked by a pattern of serious and systematic human rights violations by the Indonesian armed forces and by pro-Indonesian militias and paramilitary groups serving as proxies. Notwithstanding growing international criticism of Indonesian abuses, and continued resistance, little concrete action was taken to address the question of Timor-Leste's political status.

4. That situation began to change with the resignation in May 1998 of Indonesia's long-time President, Soeharto. In January 1999 the Government of Indonesia announced its readiness to rescind its annexation of Timor-Leste if the people of the territory rejected its proposal for greater 'autonomy.' That initiative paved the way for a set of accords between Indonesia and Portugal, under UN auspices, known as the 5 May Agreements. The Agreements spelled out the modalities through which the people of the territory would vote and security be maintained, and stipulated that the ballot would be organised and carried out by the United Nations. The UN Mission in East Timor (UNAMET) began its work later the same month, and the ballot was conducted on 30 August 1999.

Indonesian invasion and occupation

5. For roughly three centuries, the territory known as Timor-Leste was governed as a colony of Portugal. That arrangement began to unravel in 1974 when, in the aftermath of its own Carnation Revolution, Portugal set about to relinquish control of its colonies, including Timor-Leste. Portuguese disengagement stimulated the growth of political parties in Timor-Leste.

6. By 1975, three principal parties had emerged: the ASDT (Associação Social Democrática Timor) later renamed Fretilin; the UDT (União Democrática Timorense – Timorese Democratic Union), and Apodeti (Associação Popular Democrática Timorense – Timorese Popular Democratic Association). Fretilin was a social democratic party whose leaders called for immediate independence. UDT, a more conservative party, advocated maintaining ties with Portugal pending a gradual transition to independence. Apodeti, the smallest of the three parties, favoured integration with neighbouring Indonesia.

7. Despite an alliance between Fretilin and UDT formed in January 1975, tensions between the two parties grew and, following an attempted UDT coup in August, degenerated into armed conflict. At that critical juncture, the Portuguese authorities effectively abandoned Timor-Leste. The Portuguese Governor and his staff fled to the offshore island of Ataúro, and the government in Lisbon made only perfunctory efforts to negotiate a satisfactory process of decolonisation.

8. After several weeks of fighting, in the course of which serious human rights violations were committed, Fretilin emerged as the victor in the civil war and began efforts to consolidate its authority at home, and to win international support. Those efforts, however, ran up against the plans of Indonesia, the neighbouring country then led by President Soeharto, a former Army General who had come to power in an anti-communist coup in 1965, and who remained in power until May 1998.

9. Soeharto's so-called 'New Order' regime had provided unparalleled opportunities for the expansion of the military's economic and political power. Civilian institutions and leaders were gradually pushed to the margins of political life, and deprived of meaningful decision-making authority.[*] The manner in which Soeharto and his allies came to power also shaped and prefigured a new style of governance that profoundly affected political life in Indonesia for the next 30 years, and which gave rise to a pattern of egregious human rights violations in Indonesia and, after 1975, in Timor-Leste.

10. That new style entailed a state ideology preoccupied with security and national unity, and an extreme official intolerance of dissent. It also led to the articulation of a military doctrine of 'total people's defence' that involved the mobilisation of militia forces to wage war on the state's internal enemies.[†] In the post-coup period, both the military and the militias adopted increasingly brutal repertoires of action, many of them modelled on the actions taken in the massacres of 1965-66. Under Army guidance – and especially under the notorious Special Forces Command (Kopassus) – militias and paramilitary forces were deployed to carry out a range of 'dirty tricks' and covert operations, including assassination, torture, public execution, decapitation and rape, as mechanisms of political control.[‡]

11. Those ideological tendencies and patterns of behaviour shaped the New Order's response to developments in Timor-Leste in 1975. While outwardly conducting diplomatic negotiations with Portugal, and maintaining a public posture of non-interference in Timor-Leste's internal affairs, Indonesia set in motion a covert campaign to ensure the territory's annexation.

12. The covert campaign launched in 1975 entailed the infiltration of combat units and paramilitary forces across the border from West Timor into Timor-Leste, where they posed as anti-Fretilin 'volunteers' favouring integration with Indonesia. These covert military operations were revealed to a wider public in October 1975, when five Western journalists covering the story were killed by Indonesian troops in the town of Balibó, inside Timor-Leste. Recently declassified government documents reveal that a number of governments chose not to press the issue with Indonesian authorities.

13. Under constant pressure from repeated cross-border raids, abandoned by Portugal and much of the international community, and with a full-scale Indonesian invasion looming, on 28 November 1975 Fretilin declared Timor-Leste's independence. The declaration of an independent Democratic Republic of East Timor provided the final pretext for Indonesia's invasion. Claiming that it posed a threat of communist insurrection and political instability on its border, on 7 December 1975 Indonesia launched a combined land, sea, and air invasion of the newly independent country.

14. Indonesian military leaders expected that the operation to occupy Timor-Leste would take only a matter of days, and that the population would offer no more than token resistance before succumbing to Indonesian control. The reality was different. The Indonesian operation was poorly planned and executed, and East Timorese resisted the invading force with great tenacity.

15. In an apparent effort to silence international critics, Indonesian authorities set up a Regional People's Assembly in Timor-Leste that, in its sole meeting on 31 May 1976 formally requested integration as an Indonesian province. Indonesian authorities obliged on 17 July 1976, with the promulgation of Law 7/76 that provided for Timor-Leste's integration as Indonesia's 27th province.

16. Meanwhile, the Indonesian Armed Forces responded to continuing resistance by stepping up military operations. Particularly intense and brutal operations were conducted in the years 1975-1983. Using U.S.-supplied OV-Bronco warplanes, Indonesian forces conducted large-scale aerial bombardment of the countryside. Populations thought to be supporting the resistance were forcibly resettled in an Indonesian version of the 'strategic hamlets' used by U.S. forces in Vietnam.

17. The bombings and forced relocations led to widespread famine and disease. By 1980 church and human rights organisations estimated that as many as 200,000 of a pre-invasion population of less than 700,000 had already died. The vast majority died of starvation and disease, but a substantial number were killed in combat or in summary executions. While the scale of the killing and humanitarian crisis declined somewhat over the next two decades, Indonesian forces and the local militia groups they mobilised continued to be responsible for gross and systematic human rights violations until their final departure from the territory in October 1999.

Resistance

18. Indonesian forces faced persistent resistance, both armed and peaceful, throughout the 24 years of their occupation of Timor-Leste. The Resistance movement benefited from the support of the Catholic Church and from large segments of the younger generation that devised new strategies linking their struggle to international networks and organisations.

19. For most of the period of occupation, the Resistance was spearheaded by Fretilin, and by its armed wing, Falintil. In the early 1980s, Falintil evolved into a mobile guerilla force, whose component units operated with a high degree of autonomy. They also had support from at least part of the population who provided them with food, shelter and intelligence. That approach created certain dangers for the civilian population, who became the target of Indonesian army operations. At the same time, it allowed a group of perhaps 1,000 armed fighters to engage and occasionally inflict casualties upon well-equipped Indonesian forces as much as twenty times larger.

20. Important as these fighters were, resistance to the Indonesian occupation was not solely, or even primarily, exercised through force of arms. That was especially true after 1981, when the overall leadership of the Resistance, and of Falintil, passed to José Alexandre Gusmão, better known as Xanana Gusmão. Under his leadership, the armed Resistance was increasingly complemented by a network of groups that operated primarily in the political sphere, both in Timor-Leste and abroad. The formally constituted organisations included Renetil (Resistência Nacional dos Estudantes de Timor Leste – East Timorese National Students Resistance), Ojetil (Organização de Juventude de Timor Leste – Organisation of East Timorese Youth), and the women's group OMT (Organização da Mulher Timor – Organisation of Timorese Women), but they were joined by dozens of semi-formal and informal groups spread across the country and in major towns and cities in Indonesia.

21. Broadly described as the Clandestine Front, this network maintained links with the armed resistance, but did not play a direct role in the armed conflict. Many of those active in the Clandestine Front were young people and students who had been raised and educated under Indonesian rule. In addition to their work inside Timor-Leste, elements of this network also gathered information on political and human rights developments and disseminated it to international human rights organisations, the media and foreign governments. Among the most prominent groups engaged in such work was the human rights group, Yayasan HAK.

22. Critics and opponents of Indonesian rule also found support within Timor-Leste's Catholic Church, a powerful ally among a population that was overwhelmingly Catholic.* Religious leaders provided sanctuary to the victims of military operations, and spoke out strongly against the occupation. The tone was set by Monsignor Martinho da Costa Lopes, an outspoken critic of Indonesian rule who was removed from his post as Apostolic Administrator in 1983. His successor, Monsignor Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo, was expected to be more compliant. In 1989, however, Monsignor Belo wrote to the then UN Secretary General, Javier Perez de Cuellar, decrying Indonesian violence and urging UN support for a referendum on Timor-Leste's political future.*

* For an account of the role of the Catholic Church see Arnold Kohen, From the Place of the Dead: The Epic Struggles of Bishop Belo of East Timor. New York: St Martin's Press, 1999.

23. In the late 1980s the resistance underwent a further political transformation. Eschewing the leftist rhetoric of previous years, Xanana Gusmão called on the different East Timorese parties to join in a united national resistance front called CNRM (Conselho Nacional da Resistência Maubere – National Council of Maubere Resistance).

24. At a convention in Portugal, in April 1998, the CNRM was reconstituted as the CNRT (Conselho Nacional de Resistência Timorense), with Xanana Gusmão as President. Falintil, which had begun as the armed wing of Fretilin, was declared to be the armed force of the whole national resistance.

25. The resignation of Indonesia's President Soeharto in May 1998 added greater urgency to the objective of forging a national front, while also providing unprecedented opportunities for organisation and mobilisation inside Timor-Leste. In September 1998, the CNRT openly declared its existence in Timor-Leste, and established offices around the country. CNRT officials quickly came under political and physical attack by pro-Indonesian groups, forcing many of them to close down their offices and to flee. Indeed, by some accounts, the mobilisation of the pro-Indonesian militia groups that became the main perpetrators of violence in 1999 began at this time in response to CNRT initiatives.

26. Nevertheless, by early 1999 the CNRT had emerged as the principal political representative of the pro-independence position, both in Timor-Leste and in dealings with the United Nations and foreign governments. Notwithstanding some objections from certain groups, the CNRT flag became the universally recognised symbol of the independence option, and appeared as the symbol of the "No" vote on the ballot for the 1999 Popular Consultation.

International response

27. Indonesia's claim to sovereignty over Timor-Leste was never recognised by the United Nations. Between 1975 and 1981 the UN Security Council and the UN General Assembly passed a series of resolutions deploring the Indonesian invasion and recognising the inalienable right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination.† In keeping with those resolutions, the UN continued to regard Portugal as the formal administering power in the territory.

* The text of the letter is reproduced in Kohen, From the Place of the Dead, p. 137.

† The relevant Security Council Resolutions were: No. 384 (1975) of 22 December 1975 and No. 389 (1976) of 22 April 1976. Both called for Indonesia to withdraw all its troops from Timor-Leste without delay. Thereafter, until 1981, the General Assembly passed yearly resolutions reaffirming the inalienable right of East Timorese to self-determination, and expressing concern at the suffering of the population.

28. Timor-Leste remained on the agenda of the General Assembly until 1982 when, with Resolution 37/30 (1982) the Secretary General was mandated to work with Indonesia and Portugal to find an internationally acceptable solution. Talks were held periodically under the Secretary General's auspices through the 1980s. Throughout this period, East Timor also remained on the agenda of the UN's Decolonisation Committee, which convened annually in New York to consider the status of the few remaining cases of non-self-governing territories.

29. Nevertheless, little was done in practice to reverse the Indonesian invasion. On the contrary, many governments effectively supported Indonesia's position. The December 1975 invasion, for example, was launched just one day after a meeting in the Indonesian capital, Jakarta, between President Soeharto and U.S. President Ford and Secretary of State Kissinger. The transcript of that 6 December 1975 meeting, finally released in uncensored form in 2001, reveals that the United States effectively condoned the Indonesian invasion.*

30. President Ford assured President Soeharto that the United States would "understand" if Indonesia deemed it "necessary to take rapid or drastic action" in Timor-Leste. Kissinger told Soeharto: "Whatever you do, we will try to handle in the best way possible." The two men asked only that any Indonesian action be delayed until they had returned to Washington so that, in Kissinger's words, they could "influence the reaction" and lessen "the chance of people talking in an unauthorized way."

31. The supportive posture of the U.S. government and its allies became even clearer in the months and years after the invasion. According to the U.S. State Department's own estimates, roughly 90% of the military equipment used in the 1975 invasion was supplied by the United States. And in the years after the invasion, successive U.S. administrations funnelled hundreds of millions of dollars of economic and military aid to the Indonesian government, and protected it from any serious political challenge to its illegal occupation of Timor-Leste.

32. The United States was not alone in lending its support to Indonesia. Official documents recently declassified by the governments of Australia and New Zealand reveal a similar pattern of inaction and acquiescence.

33. Australia chose not to interfere with the 1975 invasion, and later became the first and only major power to give de jure recognition to Indonesia's claim to Timor-Leste. Declassified government documents make it clear that Australia was privy to Indonesian plans to invade in 1975, and had details of the atrocities that Indonesian forces committed throughout the 24-year occupation.† For most of that time, however, a succession of Australian governments sought to downplay reports of gross human rights violations in the territory, and provided substantial military training to Indonesian forces. In 2001, the former Australian Foreign Minister (1988-1996), Gareth Evans, admitted that much of Australia's military training to Indonesia had "helped only to produce more professional human rights abusers."*

34. Events on the ground in Timor-Leste and shifts in the international context began gradually to weaken Indonesia's position through the 1990s. The watershed event was unquestionably the Santa Cruz massacre of 12 November 1991, in which as many as 270 people were shot or beaten to death by Indonesian soldiers.† Shocking video footage of the massacre was broadcast worldwide, prompting outrage and stimulating the formation of Timor-Leste support groups throughout the world.

35. The arrest of the resistance leader Xanana Gusmão in late 1992, his political trial the following year, and his dignified advocacy for Timor-Leste's independence from his prison cell, further raised the profile of the Resistance. These developments stimulated renewed activity at the UN Commission on Human Rights, and led to the dispatch of UN officials to Timor-Leste to investigate allegations of human rights violations.‡

36. A further critical development came in 1996 when two East Timorese, the international spokesman for the Resistance, José Ramos-Horta and the Bishop of Dili, Monsignor Carlos Belo were awarded the Nobel Prize for Peace. The Nobel Prize raised hopes for independence to unprecedented levels, and further increased the leverage of Timor-Leste support groups and non-governmental organisations (NGOs). The prospects for a resolution of the Timor-Leste question were further raised in 1997 by the appointment as UN Secretary-General of Kofi Annan.

37. The most important change, however, came in May 1998 when a rising storm of protest in Indonesia coupled with a major economic crisis forced President Soeharto to step down after more than 30 years in power.

Breakthrough in Indonesia

38. President Soeharto's resignation stimulated widespread demands for democratisation, and an unprecedented questioning of the role of the Indonesian armed forces in politics. The economic crisis, moreover, made the new government especially attentive to the demands of donor countries, and lending institutions such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank.

‡ The UN Special Rapporteur on the question of torture visited Indonesia and Timor-Leste in 1991; Amos Wako visited the territory as personal envoy to the UN Secretary-General in 1992 and 1993; the UN Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions visited in 1994; the UN Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences, visited in late 1998; the UN Working Group on arbitrary detention visited in February 1999; and the personal envoy of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights visited in May 1999. In November 1999, three UN Special Rapporteurs conducted a joint mission to the territory. The three were: the Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions, the Special Rapporteur on the question of torture, and the Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences.

39. For these reasons, Soeharto's successor, President B.J. Habibie, and some members of his cabinet, were anxious to demonstrate their commitment to democratisation, human rights and civilian rule. As part of that new approach, in June 1998 the Habibie government indicated that it was prepared to grant Timor-Leste wide-ranging autonomy, with Jakarta retaining control over foreign affairs, external defence and fiscal policy.

40. The new posture gave impetus to the UN-brokered talks between Indonesia and Portugal, and in October 1998 a proposal to grant Timor-Leste 'wide-ranging autonomy' under Indonesian rule was prepared under UN auspices. Indonesia took the position that 'autonomy' would constitute a final dispensation. Portugal took the view that 'autonomy' would constitute a transitional phase, leaving open the possibility of full independence at some future date. The East Timorese leadership – including Xanana Gusmão and José Ramos-Horta – took a similar view, suggesting that a referendum on independence might follow several years of autonomy under Indonesian rule. Despite these differences, all parties agreed to continue discussions on the autonomy proposal.

41. In Timor-Leste, Soeharto's resignation galvanised the CNRT, Falintil and other supporters of independence. Thousands of people took to the streets to demonstrate in favour of independence, and against the proposal for 'autonomy.' While most of these expressions were peaceful, some were not. In November 1998 Falintil forces attacked and killed TNI soldiers at Alas, in Manufahi District. The open expression of popular support for independence, and the attacks at Alas, generated anxiety on the part of Indonesians and East Timorese who favoured continued Indonesian rule. The attacks at Alas led to heavy retaliation by TNI forces, in which more than a dozen civilians were killed (See District Summary: Manufahi, par. 718, below). It was at about this time, too, that the mobilisation of new militia groups began to gather pace.

42. Against this backdrop, on 27 January 1999 Indonesian President Habibie unexpectedly announced that the people of Timor-Leste would be given a chance to express their views on the political future of the territory.* Clarifying the new policy, the Foreign Minister Ali Alatas said that East Timorese would be asked whether they accepted or rejected the proposed 'autonomy' under Indonesian rule. If they rejected it, he said, Indonesia would withdraw and Timor-Leste would be on its own.

43. The boldness of the decision seems to have surprised even those who had been urging a policy adjustment – notably Australian Prime Minister John Howard who had written to Habibie in December 1998 proposing an act of self-determination after several years of autonomy under Indonesian rule. It also surprised Indonesia's powerful armed forces. The preservation of 'national unity' at all costs had long been a central tenet of Indonesian military thinking, and most senior officers were implacably opposed to Timor-Leste's independence.

44. Army leaders apparently put up little resistance to Habibie's proposal in cabinet, but that did not mean they supported it. Indeed, as discussed in greater detail elsewhere in this report, there is evidence that active and retired military officers began at this time to develop plans to derail the process or, failing that, to ensure a victory for the pro-autonomy option. In any case, the surge in the mobilisation of militia forces in late 1998 and early 1999 was more than a coincidence.

* The initial announcement was made on 27 January 1999 by Foreign Minister Ali Alatas, and Minister of Information Yunus Yosfiah. Kompas, 28 January 1999.

UNAMET and the Popular Consultation

45. The Indonesian announcement on 27 January 1999 also changed the terms of reference for the continuing UN-sponsored negotiations. The focus shifted from the details of the 'autonomy' package itself, to arrangements for ascertaining the opinion of East Timorese with respect to the political status of the territory. That shift laid the foundation for the direct involvement of the UN in conducting a ballot on Timor-Leste's political future.

46. To the surprise of UN and Portuguese negotiators, in March 1999 Indonesia readily accepted the idea of a direct ballot, though it rejected the use of the term 'referendum.' Thus reoriented, the talks led quickly to a set of accords known as the 5 May Agreements, signed by Indonesia, Portugal and the UN Secretary-General. The Agreements spelled out a constitutional framework for the future status of Timor-Leste, and entrusted the UN with conducting a 'popular consultation' of East Timorese on the proposal.*

47. The main agreement, signed by Indonesia and Portugal and witnessed by the UN, stipulated that East Timorese would be asked to accept or reject the autonomy package. The rejection of that package, the agreement made clear, would set Timor-Leste on the path toward independence. The two options on the ballot were to be phrased as follows: "Do you accept the proposed special autonomy for East Timor within the Unitary State of the Republic of Indonesia?" or "Do you reject the proposed special autonomy for East Timor, leading to East Timor's separation from Indonesia?" Despite some concern that this language might cause confusion, this part of the agreements was widely welcomed.

48. More controversial was the agreement on security – signed by Indonesia, Portugal and the UN – which placed sole responsibility for maintaining law and order during and after the consultation in the hands of Indonesian security forces, and specifically the Police. The UN contingent in Timor-Leste would include as many as 300 Civilian Police (Civpol), but they were to serve in a purely advisory capacity, and would be unarmed. The agreement emphasised the responsibility of the Indonesian authorities in securing an environment free from violence and intimidation and conducive to the conduct of the popular consultation. It also stressed that the absolute neutrality and impartiality of the Indonesian Armed Forces and Police would be essential in that regard.

* The full text of the agreements is in Report of the Secretary-General (A/53/951-S/1999/513), 5 May 1999. It consists of "Annexe I: Agreement Between the Republic of Indonesia and the Portuguese Republic on the Question of East Timor" (the main agreement) to which is appended "A Constitutional Framework for a Special Autonomy for East Timor" (the autonomy proposal); "Annexe II: Agreement Regarding the Modalities for the Popular Consultation of the East Timorese Through a Direct Ballot" (the modalities agreement); and "Annexe III: East Timor Popular Consultation" (the security agreement).

49. Despite these caveats, the potential danger of the security arrangement was not lost on outside observers, or even on those who had helped to negotiate it.* The Secretary-General Kofi Annan was evidently so concerned about it that in a separate memorandum, submitted to the signatories, he set out several criteria by which he would judge whether the security situation was acceptable.† These included an immediate ban on rallies by armed groups, the prompt arrest and prosecution of those inciting or threatening violence, and the redeployment of Indonesian military forces. He also made it clear that he would stop the process should he find that these criteria were not being met.

50. With that fragile guarantee, in late May 1999 the UN began to recruit and to deploy its personnel in Timor-Leste with the objective of conducting a referendum in early August. The UN flag was raised over the mission's headquarters in Dili on 4 June, and a week later, on 11 June, the Security Council formally established the United Nations Mission in East Timor, more commonly known as UNAMET.

51. The mission was led by Ian Martin, who was designated Special Representative of the Secretary General (SRSG). The principal components of UNAMET were: Civilian Police (Civpol), Military Liaison Officers (MLOS), Electoral Affairs, Political Affairs, Security, and Administration. At UN headquarters in New York, the UNAMET operation was coordinated and overseen by the Department of Political Affairs. High-level diplomatic contacts with the Indonesians were handled by Ambassador Jamsheed Marker, who had been Personal Representative of the Secretary General for Timor-Leste since 1997.

52. UNAMET established its headquarters in Timor-Leste's capital city, Dili, and eight regional offices were established to cover the territory's 13 administrative districts. Staff were deployed in, or made regular visits to, most sub-districts and villages in the territory, to conduct voter education, register voters, monitor the political and human rights situation, advise and liaise with Indonesian Police and Army forces on security issues, and finally to administer the ballot itself.

53. Aside from important political, logistical, and administrative matters, UNAMET's first order of business was to devise, and set in motion, a credible system of voter registration within the tight time-frame spelled out in the 5 May Agreements. That work was being carried out in record time by UNAMET's Electoral Affairs Office. On 22 June, however, the Secretary-General announced a three-week delay in the registration (and also in the ballot) on both operational and security grounds. Security concerns, and in particular the continuing violence by pro-Indonesian militias, led to a further three-day delay in mid-July, and to the threat of additional delays, or even cancellation, should the situation not improve substantially by the half-way point in registration.

54. Despite these concerns, voter registration finally commenced on 16 July, and continued without interruption through the half-way point of 25 July, on the understanding that the Indonesian authorities would further improve the security climate and the situation of internally displaced persons (IDPs). Registration ended on 6 August, having been extended by two days beyond the planned 20-day period at the insistence of some Indonesian officials and pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders. Notwithstanding pervasive threats and acts of violence by pro-Indonesian militias during this period, 446,666 people registered to vote, a figure that substantially exceeded expectations.*

55. Registration was followed by a formal campaign period lasting roughly two weeks, from 14 to 26 August. Campaigning was governed by a code of conduct developed under UNAMET auspices, and monitored by committees with representatives from the different political parties. Throughout this period, UNAMET also worked toward a mutual "laying down of arms" by pro-independence and pro-Indonesian forces. Despite these initiatives, the campaign period was marred by serious acts of violence, principally from the pro-autonomy side. On the final day of pro-autonomy campaigning, for example, at least eight people were killed in the city of Dili alone (See District Summary: Dili, par. 595, below).

56. In an apparent effort to limit or forestall violent conflict, in August Xanana Gusmão initiated the unilateral 'cantonment' of pro-independence forces. By 12 August, Falintil had withdrawn its forces to four cantonment sites, and had given a commitment that they would remain there for the duration of the ballot process. The armed pro-Indonesian militia groups, backed by Indonesian authorities, refused to follow that example. Between 16 and 19 August, the militias conducted a series of 'cantonment ceremonies' at which they handed over some, but by no means all, of their weapons to Indonesian Police and military authorities. In reality, however, the militias continued to operate without inhibition, and the weapons they had handed over were later returned to them.

57. Notwithstanding serious concerns about possible violence, the vote proceeded as planned on 30 August. To the surprise of many, there was little violence through most of the day, and a remarkable 98.6% of registered voters cast their ballots. Regrettably, the peace did not last. Almost as soon as polling ended, militias began to attack those they believed to be supporters of independence. The earliest victims included local UNAMET staff members who were killed as they carried ballot boxes from a polling station to their vehicle.

58. The Secretary-General announced the results of the ballot on the morning of 4 September. A substantial majority (78.5%) had voted against autonomy and for independence. Within hours of the announcement, however, pro-autonomy militias and TNI soldiers took to the streets and began a campaign of violence of unprecedented ferocity. Private homes, public buildings, and infrastructure were systematically burned and destroyed. More than 400,000 people were forced to leave their homes and flee to the hills, or were forcibly displaced by TNI and militia units to areas outside Timor-Leste.

* That number included 433,576 in Timor-Leste, and 13,090 who registered at designated centres outside the territory.

59. These events coincided with two significant changes to the chain of command in Timor-Leste. The first came on 4 September, when the TNI assumed responsibility for all security operations in the territory, formally relegating Police and civilian authorities to auxiliary roles. The new command arrangement was designated Koops Nusra (Komando Operasi TNI Nusa Tenggara – Nusa Tenggara Military Operations Command). Ko-ops Nusra was commanded by Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri, the Military Commander for Region IX of which Timor-Leste was a part.

60. The second major shift came with President Habibie's declaration of Martial Law in the territory, with effect from 00.00 hours on 7 September. After that date all military, police and civilian operations in Timor-Leste were formally under the control of the Martial Law Commander, Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri, who was accountable to President Habibie, as Supreme Commander.*

61. Notwithstanding these changes, the violence continued to escalate. As a consequence, the UNAMET mission was forced to evacuate its staff from Timor-Leste in the early morning hours of 14 September 1999. Some 1,400 East Timorese civilians who had sought refuge in the UN compound were also airlifted to safety. The violence and destruction continued unabated after the departure of the mission, despite repeated calls on the Government of Indonesia to control the situation and respect its obligation to ensure order and security.

62. On 12 September, the Government of Indonesia formally agreed to the presence of an international intervention force in Timor-Leste. This force, known as the International Force for East Timor (Interfet), began deploying on 20 September and began immediately to re-establish law and order and to facilitate the distribution of humanitarian assistance. In October 1999, the Indonesian legislature rescinded the law under which Timor-Leste had been declared an Indonesian province, and by the end of the month, Indonesian forces had completely withdrawn from the territory.

Indonesia: power and strategy

63. Notwithstanding the dramatic changes that had taken place in 1998-99, the official Indonesian response to the prospect of a vote in Timor-Leste was shaped by attitudes and structures of political and military power that had become deeply entrenched over at least three decades. Those attitudes and structures of power formed the backdrop to, and facilitated, the systematic violations of human rights observed in 1999.

* Although he was formally in charge as of 7 September, it would appear that Maj. Gen. Syahnakri did not take effective command in Timor-Leste until a few days later. When UNAMET's Head of Mission Ian Martin went to Korem headquarters on the evening of September 8, for example, he found that Maj. Gen. Damiri was still in charge. A credible source later told Martin that Syahnakri did not assume effective command until his written orders arrived from Jakarta some time after 8 September. Personal communication with Ian Martin, 1 June 2003. According to a separate account, Syahnakri assumed effective command at 11 pm on 9 September. See Don Greenlees and Robert Garran, Deliverance: The Inside Story of East Timor 's Fight for Freedom. Crow's Nest, NSW: Allen & Unwin, 2002, p. 229.

64. The key institution within this power structure was the Indonesian Armed Forces (Tentara Nasional Indonesia – TNI). Despite the challenges to its authority that attended President Soeharto's fall, in 1999 the TNI remained the most powerful political institution in the country, and its influence was especially great in Timor-Leste. The unique power of the TNI, and certain aspects of its doctrine, structure, and standard operating procedure go a long way to explaining the pattern of human rights violations in 1999. Especially important were its doctrine of 'total people's defence,' its territorial command structure, the dominance of special forces and intelligence units, and its penchant for mobilising proxy militia forces.

65. But the Indonesian strategy to ensure victory for the autonomy option was not simply a military, or paramilitary, one. It also relied upon a range of other institutions, including the Indonesian Police and the civilian government apparatus. Subordinate to the TNI, and therefore unable or unwilling to challenge its strategy, the Police contributed to the violence primarily by failing to take effective measures to stop it. Likewise, the civilian government apparatus played a contributing role, by implementing an official campaign to 'socialise' the autonomy option. Finally, the strategy entailed the mobilisation of new pro-Indonesian political groups, such as the FPDK and the BRTT, and various specialised government agencies, which together provided a cover for official efforts to influence the outcome of the vote by peaceful as well as violent means.

The Indonesian Armed Forces

66. Under the terms of the 5 May Agreements, the Indonesian Armed Forces (TNI) were enjoined to maintain a strict neutrality with regard to the Popular Consultation. However, given the deeply entrenched political power of the TNI in Indonesia and in Timor-Leste, the long established patterns of behavior of military forces, and the strong feelings of officers and men on the issue, that was an implausible expectation.

67. The TNI had never been purely 'professional' in the sense of being an apolitical institution that implements orders from a civilian political leadership. From its origins during the Indonesian struggle for independence from the Dutch colonial authorities (1945-1949), the Indonesian military – and in particular the Army – had always played an important role in the political, social, and economic life of the state. The political power of the military became more deeply entrenched during the New Order regime of President Soeharto (1965-1998). Even after Soeharto's resignation in 1998, the TNI remained by far the most powerful institution in the country, and in Timor-Leste.

68. At the heart of the TNI's power, both in Indonesia and in Timor-Leste, were certain unique features of its command structure. One of these was its territorial organisation. In 1999, roughly two thirds of TNI forces were dispersed throughout the country in a structure that descended all the way to the village level. Thus, the country was divided into ten Regional Military Commands (Komando Daerah Militer – Kodam). Each Kodam was further divided into a series of successively smaller geographical command units known as: Sub-Regional Military Commands (Komando Resor Militer – Korem); District Military Commands (Komando Distrik Militer – Kodim); and Sub-District Military Commands (Komando Rayon Militer – Koramil). At the village level, the TNI was represented by a Non-Commissioned Officer, known as a Babinsa.

69. In 1999, Timor-Leste fell under the authority of Regional Military Command IX (Kodam IX/Udayana), which had its headquarters in Bali. Kodam IX was commanded by Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri. Timor-Leste itself was under the authority of Sub-Regional Military Command 164 (Korem 164/Wiradharma), commanded by Col. Tono Suratman and, after August 13, by Col. Noer Muis. Beneath the Korem, Timor-Leste was further divided into 13 District Military Commands (Kodim 1627 through 1639), each of them commanded by a 'Dandim', usually of Lt. Colonel rank. The Kodims were in turn each divided into several Sub-District Military Commands (Koramil), each of them commanded by a 'Danramil.'

70. It was through this structure of territorial military command that much of Indonesia's basic military policy was carried out in Timor-Leste. Indonesian military strategy in 1999 was framed by a strategic plan called 'Operation Tatoli IV Korem 164/WD' (Operasi Tatoli IV Rem 164/WD).* Other operational plans framing military action in Timor-Leste were the Sub-Regional Military Command's plan for the referendum, 'Operation Wira Dharma-99' (Operasi Wira Dharma-99); the Regional Military Command's post-ballot evacuation plan, 'Operation Pull-Out' (Operasi Cabut Kodam IX/UDY); and an overall 'Contingency Plan 1999-2000' (Rencana Kontingensi 1999-2000) developed at TNI headquarters to address the possibility of Indonesian defeat in the referendum.†

71. The system of territorial military command ran parallel to the structures of civilian political authority down to the village level – the Korem Commander shadowed the Governor; the 13 Kodim Commanders looked over the shoulders of the 13 District Heads (Bupati); the 62 Koramil Commanders supervised the 62 Sub-District Heads (Camat); and the 442 Babinsas operated alongside an equal number of Village Heads (Kepala Desa). In this way, the territorial military command effectively ensured military involvement in and dominance over, the formulation and implementation of policy at every level. Thus, even if civilian authorities such as the Governor and the Bupatis were formally in charge, in the final analysis military officers within the territorial command exercised greater power.

72. In addition to the territorial command system that was a feature of Indonesian rule everywhere, in 1999 military power in Timor-Leste had a number of unique features that stemmed from its long history as an area of active military operations. It had, for example, two 'organic' infantry battalions permanently based in Timor-Leste. Battalion 744, with its headquarters in Dili, and Battalion 745, based in Lospalos, had been formed in the late-1970s, shortly after Indonesia's invasion. Though many of the soldiers in these units were East Timorese, the officers were predominantly Indonesian. Both units, moreover, were formally answerable to the Korem commander.‡

* The title indicated that the operation was controlled by the Korem Commander, while the designation 'IV' suggested that 1999 was the fourth year of the operation. See Dan Sat Gas Pam Dili to Danrem 164/WD and others. Secret Telegram STR/199/1999, 24 August 1999 (Yayasan Hak Collection, Doc #40).

73. These 'territorial' and 'organic' units were supplemented by combat forces drawn from other parts of the country to perform tours of duty in Timor-Leste. The number of combat forces deployed at any time in Timor-Leste varied, but in the first half of 1999 there were at least ten combat battalions, bringing the total estimated TNI force there to something in excess of 15,000 men. The number of combat battalions, and the overall force strength, increased substantially with the President's declaration of Martial Law in Timor-Leste on 7 September 1999.

74. Military power in Timor-Leste and government strategy in 1999 also rested crucially on two elite counter-insurgency units: the Special Forces Command (Komando Pasukan Khusus – Kopassus), and the Army Strategic Reserve Command (Komando Strategis Angkatan Darat – Kostrad).* Crucially, both units operated outside the normal territorial chain of command, and often without the knowledge of territorial officers.

75. Established before the 1965 coup, Kostrad evolved into a formidable mobile strike force, its units deployed in response to perceived major threats to internal security in Aceh, Irian Jaya/West Papua, Timor-Leste, and elsewhere. Despite their reputation for professionalism and esprit de corps, however, Kostrad units were accused of serious human rights violations. Nevertheless, with the declaration of Martial Law in Timor-Leste, on 7 September 1999, Kostrad forces were among those deployed to restore order.†

76. It is noteworthy that many of the highest-ranking TNI officers, who shared command responsibility for Timor-Leste in 1999, had Kostrad backgrounds. They included: TNI Commander, Gen. Wiranto; TNI Chief of Territorial Affairs, Lt. Gen. Bambang Yudhoyono; Head of the national intelligence agency (BIA/BAIS), Lt. Gen. Tyasno Sudarto; TNI Chief of General Staff, Lt. Gen. Sugiono; Operations Assistant to the Army Chief of Staff, and later Martial Law Commander in Timor-Leste, Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri; Assistant for Operations to the Armed Forces Chief of General Staff, Maj. Gen. Endriartono Sutarto; and the Commander of Regional Military Command IX, Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri.‡

77. Like Kostrad, Kopassus had a reputation for expertise in methods of unconventional warfare, but also for brutality and abuse of authority, especially in Timor-Leste. In early 1999 Kopassus formed a special task force in Timor-Leste, called Satgas Tribuana VIII (Task Force Tribuana VIII), under the command of Lt. Col. Yayat Sudrajat.§ Satgas Tribuana VIII controlled a network of officers and soldiers deployed in small units across the territory.[*] Although Kopassus maintained some fixed posts, most Kopassus officers and men operated covertly, often in plainclothes, and were engaged mainly in intelligence gathering and counter-intelligence operations. There were credible allegations, discussed in greater detail elsewhere in this report, that some militia members were in fact highly trained Kopassus soldiers, whose job it was to command and to stiffen the resolve of local militia members.

78. In addition to those actively serving with Kopassus units in Timor-Leste, a number of senior military officers with command responsibility for Timor-Leste in 1999 had Kopassus backgrounds. They included: Army Chief of Staff, Gen. Subagyo Hadisiswoyo; Territorial Assistant to Armed Forces Chief of General Staff, Maj. Gen. Sjafrie Sjamsuddin; Deputy Assistant for Security to the Army Chief of Staff (and later Deputy Martial Law Commander in East Timor), Brig. Gen. Amirul Isnaeni; Chief of Staff of Kodam IX, Brig.Gen. Mahidin Simbolon; East Timor Korem Commander until mid-August 1999, Col. Tono Suratman; and his successor in that post, Lt. Col. Noer Muis.[†]

79. Also closely linked to Kopassus were many of the key Cabinet ministers with responsibility for Timor-Leste in 1999. They included: the powerful Coordinating Minister for Political and Security Affairs, Lt. Gen. (ret.) Feisal Tanjung; the Minister of Transmigration and Resettlement, Lt. Gen. (ret.) A.M. Hendropriyono; the Minister of Information, Lt. Gen. (ret.) Yunus Yosfiah, and a close military adviser to President Habibie, Maj.Gen. (ret.) Sintong Panjaitan.[‡]

80. The various combat forces deployed in Timor-Leste, including Kopassus and Kostrad, appear to have had a distinct command structure related to their combat function. Unlike the territorial forces, which were divided into 13 District Military Commands, combat forces deployed in Timor-Leste were grouped into two Sectoral Commands, known as 'Sektor A' which covered the eastern part of the territory, and 'Sektor B' which covered the western districts.[§] Each Sector was commanded by an officer of Colonel rank. Significantly, these Sectoral commanders, and their deputies, all had backgrounds in Kopassus or Kostrad, and in military intelligence.[¶] The Sectoral command structure was § Combat Sector A apparently covered the Districts of Baucau, Viqueque, Lautém and Manauto. Sector B covered the Districts of Aileu, Ainaro, Bobonaro, Covalima, Ermera, Manufahi, and Oecussi.

¶ The Commander of Sector A (until 21 June 1999) was Col. Sunarko, who had a background in Kopassus and military intelligence. He was replaced by Col. Irwan Kusnadi, whose career had been spent with Kopassus and Kostrad. Sector B was commanded by Col. Tatang Zaenuddin, whose background was in Kopassus and military intelligence. The Deputy Commander of Sector B was Lt. Col. Nyus Rahasia, another career Kopassus officer. Some documents suggest that the Sector A Commander during the period of Martial Law in September 1999 was Col. Gerhan Lantara.

a legacy of Timor-Leste's long history as a military operations area, and was evidently maintained to facilitate counter-insurgency operations there. There are indications that it played a key role in mobilising and coordinating the militias in 1999.

81. Finally, military power and strategy in Timor-Leste rested on a pervasive intelligence network. Military intelligence officers and units were attached to, and often played a dominant role at, each level of the territorial command hierarchy (Kodam, Korem, Kodim, and Koramil). Complementing, and often superceding, those normal intelligence operatives, however, was the 'Intelligence Task Force' commonly referred to as SGI (Satuan Tugas Intelijen). In 1999, it maintained posts throughout the country but much of its work – including the mobilisation and coordination of militia groups – was covert.* Formally, SGI was under the authority of the Korem.† In practice, however, it appears to have been controlled and coordinated by Kopassus officers. The SGI commander in 1999, for example, was Lt.Col. Yayat Sudrajat, who was also the commander of the Kopassus unit in Timor-Leste, Satgas Tribuana VIII.‡

82. Each of these units, and in particular SGI, mobilised an extensive network of spies and informants. This system permitted the armed forces, and especially Kopassus, to engage with considerable ease in continual surveillance or intelligence gathering, and also to carry out covert counter-intelligence operations, including the mobilisation of militia groups.

The Militias

83. Among the most conspicuous elements of the government's strategy, and an element with immediate consequences for human rights, was the mobilisation of armed militia groups dedicated to maintaining the tie with Indonesia. Militia groups had always been an integral element of Indonesian counter-insurgency strategy in Timor-Leste and elsewhere, so their sudden proliferation at this time pointed strongly to military involvement.

84. Although they had deep historical roots, militia groups began to mobilise anew in mid-1998, shortly after President Habibie first floated the 'autonomy' option for Timor-Leste.§ News of the new militia groups began to trickle out of the country in late 1998 as the UN-sponsored negotiations over special autonomy for Timor-Leste

* One known SGI post was 'Post Nanggala-13' (Pos-Nanggala-13) in Baucau. A secret list of Sera militia members, issued by that post in January 1998, confirms the long-standing links between SGI and militia groups. See: Komandan Pos Nanggala-13, Satuan Tugas Intelijen (Sgt. Mudji Maulani), "Daftar Nama Nama Anggota Sera (Surwan) Kec. Baguia," 2 January 1998 (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #2). Another SGI post was 'SGI Post Kresna 12' (Pos SGI Kresna 12) in Atsabe Sub-District, Ermera. The Commander of that Post, Amran Odhe, co-signed a document listing 62 Aitarak members in the village of Atudame, again confirming the link between SGI and militia groups. gathered steam. With President Habibie's announcement in late January 1999 that East Timorese would be free to choose autonomy or independence, the trickle became a flood. Within a few months, more than two dozen militia groups had formed, and they quickly became the main conduits for pressuring the population to vote for autonomy, and the main perpetrators of human rights violations.

85. Some of the groups that came to light at this time had existed for several years, such as Halilintar in the district of Bobonaro, Team Saka and Team Sera in Baucau, and Team Alfa in Lautém. But others were new, including: Besi Merah Putih, based in Liquiçá, Aitarak in the District of Dili, Dadurus Merah Putih in Bobonaro, Mahidi in Ainaro, Laksaur in Covalima, AHI in Aileu, and ABLAI in Manufahi (See Table 4: Pro-Indonesian Militia Groups in Timor-Leste, 1999, par. 1113, below).

86. Reflecting their close ties to the TNI, the militia groups adopted military rhetoric and modes of organisation. They were organized into 'companies' and 'platoons' and their members were described as soldiers, or freedom fighters. The headquarters of one of the most notorious groups, Aitarak, adopted the title 'Aitarak Troop Command' (Komando Pasukan Aitarak).*

87. By early 1999 the different militia groups had been drawn together under a single military-style structure, called the 'Integration Fighters Force' (Pasukan Pejuang Integrasi – PPI). The PPI was led by a long-time pro-Indonesia figure, João Tavares, who was given the military-style title of Panglima or 'Commander.' In a further imitation of military organisation, the PPI was made up of three 'Sectoral Commands,' each of which was under the control of a 'Deputy PPI Commander.'†

- Sector A of the PPI covered the easternmost districts of Baucau, Lautém, Viqueque and Manatuto, and was commanded by Joanico Cesario Belo who was also commander of the Team Saka militia. A Kopassus officer with the rank of 1st Sergeant, Belo was a protégé of the notorious Kopassus officer and Soeharto's son-in-law, Prabowo Subianto.‡
- Sector B covered the central districts of Dili, Liquiçá, Ermera and Aileu, and was under the command of Eurico Guterres, who was also the commander of Aitarak. Once a supporter of independence, Guterres emerged in 1995 as the head of Gadapaksi, a pro-Indonesian youth organisation established by Kopassus, and deployed to harass and intimidate members of the independence movement.
- Sector C covered the western districts of Bobonaro, Covalima, Ainaro, Manufahi, as well as the enclave of Oecussi. It was commanded by Cancio Lopes de Carvalho, who was also the commander of the Mahidi militia group.

† The different militia sectors are outlined in: Wakil Panglima, Komando Pasukan Pejuang Integrasi (Eurico Guterres) to Governor of Nusa Tenggara Timur. Letter No. 55/SP/MK-AT/VI/1999, 30 June 1999 (SCU Collection, Doc #39).

‡ Joanico was also said to be the adopted son of a career Kopassus officer, Lt. Gen. Luhut Panjaitan. See Don Greenlees and Robert Garran, Deliverance: The Inside Story of East Timor 's Fight for Freedom. Crow' s Nest, NSW:Allen & Unwin, 2002, p. 132.

Carvalho had close ties to Brig. Gen. Mahidin Simbolon, a Kopassus officer who was Chief of Staff of Kodam IX in 1999.

88. The stated aims of the militias reflected a preoccupation with the outcome of the popular consultation, and an approach that was both dogmatic and bellicose. In a letter to his Post Commander dated 30 March 1999, for example, an Aitarak member spelled out his vision for the coming months:

> "Aitarak, which now has 400 men, is going to answer and destroy all threats from the pro-independence side . . . . If in spite of that there are still those who insist on asking for independence, they are welcome to it but they should beware that independence will, without a doubt, end with the spilling of blood . . .This is the foundation on which Aitarak has been created, under the leadership of Eurico Guterres."*

89. Indonesian authorities asserted that these groups were spontaneous reflections of local support for integration, and that the violence was the result of conflict among pro-independence and pro-integration East Timorese. Accordingly, they argued, the TNI and Police were more than ever needed to preserve the peace. As discussed in detail in later chapters, that claim disguised the central role of the TNI in creating and supporting the militias responsible for the violence. Thus, it helped to ensure that the relationship with the militias remained intact, and that the systematic pattern of human rights violations that stemmed from it would continue without serious interruption.

The Indonesian Police

90. Under the 5 May Agreements, the task of maintaining security during the popular consultation was entrusted to the Indonesian national police force (Kepolisian Negara Republik Indonesia – Polri). The key figure on the ground in Timor-Leste was the Regional Police Commander (Kepala Kepolisian Daerah – Kapolda), Col. Timbul Silaen. Beneath him were 13 Police Resort Commanders (Kepala Kepolisian Resor – Kapolres), one for each of Timor-Leste's administrative districts; and a larger number of Police Sector Commanders (Kepala Kepolisian Sektor – Kapolsek).

91. As part of its responsibility for maintaining law and order, in August 1999 the Regional Police Command developed a detailed plan, called 'Operasi Hanoin Lorosae II' (Operation Hanoin Lorosae II), which included plans for a post-ballot evacuation.† Some observers have argued that the existence of this plan is evidence that the post-ballot violence, and in particular the forcible relocation of civilians, was planned in advance at the highest levels. A close examination of the document, however, does not support that conclusion. As discussed in greater detail below (see par. 298), whatever one may say about the behaviour of the Police, the document itself reads as a fair attempt to plan for the widely predicted violence in the post-ballot period.

* The author of the letter was Mário Pinto da Costa. See: Letter from Mário Pinto da Costa to Komandan [Aitarak], 30 March 1999 (SCU Collection, Doc #262).

† Kepolisian Negara Republik Indonesia, Daerah Timor Timur,"Rencana Operasi Hanoin Lorosae II," Secret Plan No. Pol: Ren Ops/04/VIII/1999, August 1999 (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #39).

92. Faced with accusations that they were not doing enough to stop militia violence, Polri officials sometimes complained that they were seriously understaffed, and that maintaining order with so few men was a 'mission impossible.' But the reality was that Polri had a substantial number of officers on the ground in Timor-Leste, and their numbers grew significantly as the ballot date drew near. The evacuation plan cited above, for example, indicates that there were 6,704 Police officers stationed in Timor-Leste in August 1999. That number included 3,876 organic Police forces and 2,828 who had been seconded from other units.*

93. A more plausible explanation for the ineffectiveness of the Police in containing militia violence was that Polri was subordinate to the TNI and, at the same time, shared much of the latter's institutional culture. Polri had been part of the armed forces until April 1999, when it was formally separated. Even after the separation, however, Polri maintained its character as a highly militarised police force, and it remained under the authority of the Minister of Defense, Gen. Wiranto, who was simultaneously TNI Commander.

94. The militarised character of the Indonesian Police was especially evident in its elite unit, the Mobile Brigade (Brigade Mobil – Brimob), deployed in substantial numbers in Timor-Leste. According to the Police document cited above, 2,497, or almost half, of the Police deployed in Timor-Leste in August 1999 were from Brimob. Armed with automatic weapons, and with counter-insurgency training and field experience, Brimob was and is a paramilitary unit, with a record of serious human rights abuse across the country.

95. In response to criticism of the deteriorating security conditions, Indonesia deployed more and more Brimob units to Timor-Leste as the Popular Consultation approached. Indonesian authorities argued that these deployments would help to control the situation, but they did not. By some accounts, the growing number of Brimob forces only made it worse. As discussed in more detail below (see par. 191), Brimob officers committed most of the violations of human rights committed by Police in Timor-Leste in 1999.

The civilian government and the 'socialisation' campaign

96. A central component of Indonesian strategy in 1999 was a campaign to 'socialise' the proposed autonomy package. As depicted by government authorities, 'socialisation' was a community education effort aimed at explaining the advantages of the autonomy option to the people of Timor-Leste. In practice, it was a concerted propaganda offensive involving a combination of inducements, threats, and acts of violence designed to pressure civil servants and ordinary citizens to vote for continued Indonesian rule.

97. Under the auspices of the 'socialisation' campaign, civilian government officials used the authority of their office to pressure civil servants and others to support the autonomy option, and to persecute those who favoured independence. In some cases, the names of independence supporters were recorded and submitted to military intelligence authorities.

* Ibid.

98. The Governor of Timor-Leste, Abílio Osório Soares, had started to issue such demands and threats against disloyal civil servants as early as mid-1998. A secret Indonesian military intelligence report, dated 23 June 1998, reporting on his remarks to a meeting of the pro-integration group, Gadapaksi, quotes him saying:

> "On June 23, 1998, I am going to call together all government servants of Echelon IV and above, and tell them that if they do not support integration, they must resign immediately."*

99. Such measures were explicitly ordered by the Governor in a circular, dated 28 May 1999, distributed to the heads of all government bodies in Timor-Leste, and copied to the Indonesian Minister for Home Affairs. The circular stated that any civil servant who supported independence would be "terminated." The circular further stated that civil servants suspected of harbouring pro-independence sympathies would be made to sign oaths of loyalty to the government, and threatened with dismissal should they later engage in pro-independence activities.†

100. These were not idle threats. Known or suspected supporters of independence were indeed forced from their jobs, and their homes, under the auspices of the 'socialization' campaign. The agents of enforcement, more often than not, were the militias. A letter from an Aitarak militia member to his Post Commander shows that the militias regarded this as one of their main purposes:

> "We members of Aitarak are going to take a tough stance in investigating and rooting out civil servants who support independence. We will oust them from their positions, we will strip them of the official uniforms they are wearing, and we will confiscate from them any official vehicle they may be using. This is the concept behind the operations we plan to undertake in April 1999."‡

101. In keeping with its status as an element of government policy, the 'socialisation' campaign was amply funded by the Indonesian treasury (see par. 431ff). Public 'socialisation' meetings and rallies were organized throughout the country, at which civilian and military authorities spoke at length about the benefits of autonomy. Buttressed by the government's largesse, official speakers underlined their case by distributing rice, T-shirts, and other goods, and by promising more of the same to those who supported Indonesian rule. A UN-accredited observer, commented:

> "We went to one autonomy rally . . . where two big trucks came in with bags full of T-shirts, hats, bandanas, flags . . . and then they > were thrown to them and the people were grabbing at them. Nobody in the pro-independence campaign had those sorts of resources."*

102. The distribution of rice to the population was an especially important element of the government's 'socialisation' campaign. Secret military documents reveal that the explicit aim of distributing rice was to influence the opinion of the population with regard to the popular consultation. The documents also indicate that substantial resources were devoted to this effort, and that the highest-ranking military officers in the country were involved. In a secret telegram to Gen. Wiranto, dated 6 July 1999, Brig.Gen. Mahidin Simbolon (Chief of Staff, Kodam IX) requested the immediate deployment of a Frost-type Navy vessel to transport rice to Timor-Leste. The telegram explained that "the government must distribute rice to the population" because food distributions by some 35 NGOs were bound to affect the outcome of the referendum.†

103. Such inducements were supplemented by open and veiled threats of violence should the autonomy option fail.‡ Among the threats commonly reported from 'socialisation' meetings was the following: "If autonomy wins, blood will trickle. If independence wins, blood will flow!" Such threats were reinforced by the public statements of pro-autonomy leaders, and further underlined by the menacing presence of armed pro-autonomy militiamen. Indeed, the militias effectively served as enforcers of the 'socialisation' campaign – ensuring that people came to meetings and threatening or physically abusing those who refused.

Pro-autonomy political parties

104. A related element of the government's strategy was the encouragement, and funding, of a number of new pro-integration political parties and organisations, led and staffed by East Timorese. The two principal groups were the Forum for Unity, Democracy and Justice (Front Persatuan, Demokrasi dan Keadilan – FPDK), and the East Timor People's Front (Barisan Rakyat Timor Timur – BRTT), both of which were established in the first half of 1999.§

† Secret telegram from Chief of Staff, Kodam IX/Udayana (Brig. Gen. Mahidin Simbolon) to Armed Forces Commander (Gen. Wiranto), 6 July 1999 (HAK Collection).

‡ Like the demands for the removal of disloyal civil servants, the implied threats of violence date at least to mid-1998. Addressing a Gadapaksi meeting in June 1998, for example, the Speaker of Timor-Leste's Parliament, Domingos S. Mariano, reportedly said: "In my opinion, if there is a referendum, there will certainly be an even greater blood-letting than we had in 1975." See: Dandim 1627 (Lt. Col. Endar Priyanto) to Danrem 164/WD and others, "Laporan hasil pertemuan di Gada Paksi," 23 June 1998 (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #3).

§ The FPDK was formally established on 27 January 1999, and BRTT was set up in April 1999. See Ian Martin, Self-Determination in East Timor: The United Nations, the Ballot, and International Intervention, London: Lynne Rienner Publishers, 2001, p. 43. Another organisation, the East Timor Unity Form (Forum Persatuan Timor Timur – FPTT) was established on 7 December 1998, under the leadership of Eurico Guterres. It appears to have been dissolved some time in January 1999, and replaced by FPDK and Aitarak. See: Forum Persatuan Timor Timur (FPTT) to Danrem 164/WD. Hand-written (draft?) letter, requesting TNI funding for FPTT activities, [December] 1998 (SCU Collection, Doc #233); and Ketua Umum Forum Persatuan Timor Timur (Eurico Guterres) to Kepala Biro Keuangan Pemda Tkl Timor Timur, 1 January 1999 (SCU Collection, Doc #159).

105. The two parties adopted slightly different tactics, with BRTT reaching out to older members of the political elite, and the FPDK seeking to mobilise a somewhat younger element.* The FPDK was also more closely linked to the militia groups – with which it claimed an 'advisory' relationship – than was the BRTT, some of whose leaders were concerned that militia violence was counter-productive.† Despite these differences, the FPDK and the BRTT both represented the East Timorese face of the Indonesian government position. And as ballot day approached, the two groups were merged into a single party, known as the United Front for East Timor Autonomy (UNIF) which advocated the pro-Indonesian position without question.‡

106. The formation and encouragement of these political parties may have been intended to substantiate the official Indonesian claim that the conflict was among East Timorese, with the government serving as neutral arbiter. That claim was weakened, however, by the fact that FPDK, BRTT, and UNIF leaders were overwhelmingly Indonesian government officials. The leader of the BRTT, for example, was the Indonesian Government's Ambassador-at-large for Timor-Leste, Mr. Francisco Lopes da Cruz. That relationship was symptomatic of a more general phenomenon. As Ian Martin writes:

> "The links between the local administration, the FPDK, the militia, and the TNI were so close that they constituted a single operation to counter pro-independence activities and ensure a pro-autonomy vote."§

107. In addition to their overt political goals, there is some evidence that these pro-autonomy political organisations also served a more covert purpose – as a conduit for the disbursement of funds and materials to the militias. As detailed elsewhere in this report, the FPDK and the BRTT both received substantial funding and resources from official sources, both civilian and military (see par. 431, below).

Specialised government bodies

108. A final vital element of the government's strategy was the creation of a number of specialised political bodies in Timor-Leste. These bodies – most notably the Commission on Peace and Stability (Komisi Perdamaian dan Stabilitas – KPS) and the Task Force for the Implementation of the Popular Consultation in Timor-Leste (Satuan Tugas Pelaksanaan Penentuan Pendapat mengenai Timor Timur – Satgas P3TT) – served as public relations machines.¶ The latter also served as a cover for the coordination of covert Indonesian government and military strategy.

¶ The English here is not an exact translation of the Indonesian. However, these were the titles used in official correspondence and documents.

109. The Commission on Peace and Stability (KPS) was a product of the 'peace agreement' brokered by TNI commander Gen. Wiranto and signed by pro-independence and pro-Indonesian groups in Timor-Leste on 21 April 1999. Ostensibly established to facilitate dialogue among the different parties in Timor-Leste, in practice the KPS almost invariably served as a mouthpiece for the Indonesian government position. This was partly the consequence of its composition, which was heavily weighted toward the Indonesian and pro-autonomy side.* It also stemmed from the deeply partisan position adopted by representatives of Indonesia's Human Rights Commission (Komisi Nasional Hak Asasi Manusia – Komnas HAM) which had been drawn in to convene the KPS.

110. The public relations antics of the KPS were part of a broader government effort to present its version of events, and its preferred option, to East Timorese and Indonesian audiences. It was assisted in this effort by a generally compliant domestic media – including radio, TV, and print. The government's campaign included what appeared to be deliberate efforts at disinformation by the KPS designed to discredit UNAMET and to lay the foundation for a future challenge to the credibility of the process.

111. In addition to their general hostility toward UNAMET, Indonesian and pro-autonomy spokesmen claimed that UNAMET had deliberately hired only supporters of independence. Despite the absence of evidence, they repeated this claim with increasing frequency as ballot day approached, and in its immediate aftermath. Government and military officials, as well as pro-autonomy leaders, also issued direct and veiled threats against local staff members, causing some of them to resign and flee to the mountains.

112. A less visible but significantly more influential body established by the government in 1999 was the Task Force for the Implementation of the Popular Consultation in East Timor (Satgas P3TT). The Task Force, as it was commonly known, represented a national ministerial group (TP4 OKTT) headed by the Coordinating Minister for Political and Security Affairs.† The Task Force was headed by a former Indonesian permanent representative to the UN in Geneva, Ambassador Agus Tarmizi, and, like its parent body (the TP4 OKTT), included representatives from several central government Ministries and bodies.

113. Formally, the Task Force represented Indonesian government interests in Timor-Leste, and served as a direct point of contact with UNAMET, in the context of the Popular Consultation. However, because it reported directly to the Coordinating Minister for Political and Security Affairs in Jakarta, the Task Force also constituted a crucial channel of authority directly under the control of the Minister, Lt. Gen. (ret.) Feisal Tanjung.

* Representatives from the government, the TNI, the Police, and each of the two pro-autonomy parties, were ranged against just two delegates from the CNRT/Falintil. The sole CNRT representative present at the signing of the agreement, Leandro Isaac, was brought to the venue from a Police station where he had taken refuge after his house had been attacked. UNAMET was entirely excluded from the KPS as were local non-governmental organisations and other civil society groups. On the composition and weaknesses of the KPS, see Ian Martin, Self-Determination in East Timor, pp. 30-31, and 70.

† TP4 OKTT stands for Tim Pengamanan Pelaksanaan Penentuan Pendapat mengenai Otonomi Khusus Timor Timur – Team for the Security and Implementation of the Popular Consultation on Special Autonomy in Timor-Leste. It would appear to have been established on the authority of Presidential Decision No. 43, dated 18 May 1999. See: Armed Forces Chief of General Staff (Lt. Gen. Sugiono) for Panglima TNI (Gen. Wiranto), "Surat Perintah No. Sprin/1096/VI/1999," 4 June 1999 (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #28); and Panglima TNI (Gen. Wiranto), "Surat Perintah No. Sprin 1180/P/VI/1999," 16 June 1999 (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #29). The TP4 OKTTministerial team comprised: the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Minster of Home Affairs, the Minister of Defense, the Minister of Justice, the National Chief of Police, and the Head of the National Intelligence Agency (BAIS). Ian Martin, Self-Determination in East Timor, p. 42.

114. Moreover, the Task Force leadership included a number of high-ranking military officers, active and retired, with long experience in Timor-Leste, and backgrounds in military intelligence or Kopassus, or both. They included: H.R. Garnadi, a retired Army Major General, with a background in military intelligence; and Brig. Gen. Glenny Kairupan, who had served as Deputy Korem Commander in Timor-Leste in the mid-1990s, and who reportedly had a Kopassus background.*

115. The key figure on the Task Force, however, was Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim. A career intelligence officer, Makarim had served until January 1999 as head of the military intelligence agency, BIA (Badan Intelijen ABRI, renamed BAIS, Badan Intelijen Strategis, in April 1999). Officially appointed to his post in Timor-Leste in early June, † he had been involved in military and political operations there for some time before that.‡ In the early 1990s, he had been a military intelligence officer in Aceh, at the height of a counter-insurgency campaign in which the army mobilised militia groups to assist in their effort to crush a local independence movement.

116. The most senior military officer in Timor-Leste until the declaration of Martial Law in September 1999, Maj. Gen. Makarim is the most likely candidate for the role of overall field coordinator of military and government strategy in Timor-Leste. To the extent that that strategy entailed the mobilisation of armed militia groups, and the commission of systematic acts of violence against the civilian population, he is also a leading suspect among those aiding and abetting crimes against humanity.

Violations, victims and perpetrators

117. There is no doubt that the Indonesian authorities sought to influence the outcome of the Popular Consultation in favor of 'special autonomy.' Nor is there any doubt that egregious acts of violence were committed in the context of that plan. The real question is whether that violence was the spontaneous work of local militiamen and 'rogue elements' of the TNI, as Indonesian authorities have claimed, or an integral part of an operation planned and carried out by Indonesian officials.

* A third member, Col. (Pol.) Andreas Sugianto, had served as Chief of Police in Timor-Leste in 1994-96. As such, he had worked closely with a number of TNI officers who played key roles in 1999, including Mahidin Simbolon and Kiki Syahnakri, who were Commanders of Korem 164 in the mid-1990s, and Glenny Kairupan, who served as Deputy Danrem at that time.

† Maj. Gen. Makarim was formally ordered to deploy to Timor-Leste as a member of TP4 OKTT on 4 June 1999. The order (Surat Perintah No. Sprin/1096/VI/1999) was issued under the authority of TNI Commander, Gen. Wiranto, but signed by the Armed Forces Chief of General Staff, Lt. Gen. Sugianto (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #28).

‡ He and Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri were members of a team sent by TNI headquarters to investigate the Liquiçá church massacre in April 1999. See Greenlees and Garran, Deliverance, p. 126-127.

118. A fair answer to that question requires a careful description of the violence, and an analysis of the underlying patterns and variations in that violence. This chapter is the first of three in this report that undertakes that task. It describes and analyses the most basic patterns of the violence in 1999, asking the following questions: What kind of violations were committed? When did they happen? Who were the victims? And who were the perpetrators?

119. The answers point to one central conclusion: most of the acts of violence committed in 1999 were part of a widespread and systematic attack directed against the civilian population of Timor-Leste, targeting those who were believed to be supporters of independence. As a matter of international law, then, those acts constitute not only grave violations of human rights but also crimes against humanity.

Types of violation

120. The principal crimes committed in Timor-Leste in 1999 included unlawful killing, torture and ill-treatment, sexual violence, forcible transfer of population, and destruction of property. These acts infringed a wide range of fundamental human rights recognised in international law, including the right to life, the right to personal security, the right to physical integrity, freedom of thought, freedom of association, and the right to own or hold property.

Unlawful killing

121. The most notorious of the crimes committed in 1999 were unlawful killings (murders) of which there were at least 1,200 and perhaps as many as 1,500 during the year. These killings were typically committed by multiple assailants, armed with an assortment of weapons, including knives, machetes, swords, home-made firearms, and automatic weapons.

122. Many of the victims were individually targeted, but a significant number – perhaps as many as 400 – died in mass killings. Many of these mass killings occurred in places of worship and/or refuge, including Catholic churches and the homes of prominent citizens (See Case Studies: Liquiçá Church Massacre, par. 768; Carrascalão House Massacre, par. 803; and Suai Church Massacre, par. 903). They also took place on the premises, or in the custody of Indonesian Army and Police forces (See Case Studies: Cailaco Killings, par. 787; and Maliana Police Station Massacre, par. 923).

123. As a rule, the method of killing was cruel. Victims were commonly beaten, hacked with machetes or swords, and their bodies sometimes deliberately mutilated, both before and after death. An especially common form of mutilation was the removal of one of the victim's ears, but other body parts were sometimes also removed, and several victims were deliberately decapitated. In some cases, the mutilated bodies (or body parts) of the dead were left in public places, in an apparent effort to terrorise the population. In other cases, especially where large numbers had been killed, the authorities took pains to dispose of the bodies, and other evidence.

Torture and ill-treatment

124. Torture and ill-treatment, like unlawful killing, had for years been part of standard Indonesian counter-insurgency strategy in Timor-Leste and elsewhere. It was not surprising, therefore, that the practice was commonly reported in 1999. The torture of detainees typically took the form of beatings and the infliction of wounds with sticks, machetes, knives, swords, and rifle butts.

125. As noted in the joint report of the UN Special Rapporteurs, in 1999 torture in Timor-Leste commonly occurred as a prelude to murder or attempted murder.[*] More recent evidence indicates that torture and ill-treatment were also used, as they had been for many years, as methods for extracting information about the pro-independence movement.

126. As in the past, torture and ill-treatment in 1999 were also part of a strategy aimed at intimidating and terrorising the population. The purpose of that intimidation varied over time. In the pre-ballot period, it was intended primarily to silence pro-independence voices in the context of the registration and campaigning, and to force recruitment into the pro-Indonesian militia groups. In the post-ballot period, it was used to force or 'convince' the population to flee.

Gender-based violence

127. As the UN Special Rapporteurs noted in their report, torture and ill-treatment also took the form of sexual violence, including rape, sexual slavery, and sexual harassment.[†] By 2001, the local non-governmental organisation Fokupers had documented some 182 cases of gender-specific violations committed in 1999. These included 46 cases of rape, five cases of attempted rape, and 16 cases of sexual assault. More than half of the 46 rape victims were raped repeatedly, or by more than one attacker. In addition, many women were raped over a period of months, and sometimes years, after being forced into a relationship of sexual slavery by TNI soldiers and militiamen.[‡]

128. Given the understandable reluctance of most East Timorese women to speak about such experiences, it is very likely that the actual number of cases of rape and sexual slavery in 1999 was significantly higher than thus far reported.[§] The problem of under-reporting has been compounded by social, legal, and logistical barriers to documentation and redress. East Timorese women, like women elsewhere, have suffered guilt, shame, and isolation in the aftermath of these attacks. Some have also been abandoned by their husbands, who have claimed or implied that their wives had consented to their own rape and or sexual slavery.*

129. The perpetrators of crimes of sexual violence were predominantly militiamen, but almost half were TNI soldiers and officers.6† In some cases, militiamen and TNI soldiers entered the home of a young woman and, brandishing their weapons, threatened to kill family members if she refused to have sex. In other cases, TNI officers and militiamen connived to abduct women, and then shared them like chattel.

130. Apart from the identity of the perpetrators, certain details of these assaults make it clear that rape and sexual violence were not random acts, but were planned by or with the approval of military authorities. For example, military authorities appear to have designated those women considered 'fair game' for rape or sexual assault. Some attackers, moreover, had access to relatively sophisticated contraceptive technology, including medication that they injected into their victims prior to raping them (See Case Study: Arbitrary Detention and Rape in Lolotoe).

Forcible transfer of population

131. In addition to constituting crimes in their own right, sexual violence, torture, and unlawful killing also formed the essential underpinning for the further crime of forcible transfer of the population. Such forcible transfers occurred in Timor-Leste in two broad waves. The first, which took place before the ballot, saw as many as 60,000 people displaced from their homes to other parts of Timor-Leste. The second, which occurred in the immediate aftermath of the 30 August vote, resulted in the displacement of an estimated 400,000 people – or about half the total population. More than 250,000 of that number were forced across the border into Indonesian West Timor, and neighbouring islands, while the remainder took refuge in the hills and forests of Timor-Leste.

132. In the pre-ballot period, forcible displacement stemmed primarily from a campaign of violence and terror by pro-Indonesian forces in perceived pro-independence strongholds. The campaign took a variety of forms, including the burning of houses, and the detention, torture, and execution of alleged pro-independence leaders. Starting in late 1998, and reaching a crescendo in April 1999, that campaign caused residents of entire villages to flee to the mountains, or to neighbouring towns. Many took refuge in places of worship, including churches in the towns of Liquiçá, Suai, and Maliana. Others sought protection in the homes of prominent citizens in Dili and elsewhere. As noted above, many people were killed in these places of worship and refuge.

133. Forcible relocation of the population also threatened to derail the popular consultation and deny thousands the right to vote, by disrupting plans for registration,

* To make matters worse, in early September 1999 the office of Fokupers, the only organisation that had seriously documented the problem of gender-based violations in 1999, was burned and looted by militias, and all of its records were destroyed.

† Of the 46 cases of rape documented by Fokupers, 18 were committed by TNI soldiers alone or jointly with militiamen. See Fokupers, "Progress Report 1 – Gender-based Human Rights Abuses," Dili, June 2000.

voter education, and voting. Internally displaced persons (IDPs), particularly those in the hills, were understandably reluctant to leave their places of refuge to take part in such activities. Ultimately, UNAMET was able to make special arrangements that permitted all but a small number of IDPs to register and to vote.

134. Even more serious was the forcible relocation of roughly half of the population, mostly to West Timor, in the days and weeks after the ballot. Some observers* have concluded, on the basis of documentary evidence, that the forced transfer of the population was part of a strategy devised by Indonesian authorities at the highest level. While there is reason for caution in drawing that conclusion solely from the available documents, the pattern of behavior reported by numerous eyewitnesses strongly supports the claim that the forcible evacuation was deliberate and well-organised (See Case Study: Forcible Relocation and Murder of Refugees in Dili).

135. The pattern of evacuation was virtually identical everywhere in the territory. It began in the days immediately after the vote with a campaign of intimidation and violence carried out jointly by militias and TNI soldiers. Across the territory, bands of militiamen and soldiers roamed freely through villages and towns, setting fire to homes and offices, selectively beating or killing pro-independence figures, and threatening residents that they must leave or suffer the same fate. Police either took part in the violence, or appeared unwilling or unable to stop it.

136. Victims and witnesses from widely disparate locations in Timor-Leste reported that they were told by TNI and Police officials, as well as militias, that they would be killed, and in the case of women, raped, if they did not board the trucks or boats to West Timor. They also reported consistently that the vehicles used in the evacuation were seized by military officials and militia under duress, and that money was extorted from those being forced to board the trucks.

137. Faced with the evident collapse of law and order, and imminent danger of death, many citizens felt they had no option but to flee. Their flight was encouraged by military and civilian authorities who told residents their safety could not be guaranteed unless they moved to police and military stations, and other designated gathering points throughout the territory. At these designated sites, refugees were systematically loaded onto trucks or ships, and transported to West Timor and neighbouring islands.

138. The problems did not stop once the refugees left Timor-Leste. On the contrary, they faced perilous conditions in the Indonesian refugee camps where they were placed. The most serious problem was that the militiamen who had terrorised them into fleeing were also in the camps, where they continued to harass, threaten, and intimidate the refugees. As in Timor-Leste, the Indonesian authorities, including the TNI, made little effort to control the militias inside the camps. The predictable result was that they were free to commit serious violations of human rights against the refugees, including rape, sexual slavery, and murder.

* For example, the Indonesian Commission on Human Rights, and the International Commission of Inquiry on East Timor, whose reports were both issued in January 2000.

Destruction of property

139. The violations committed in 1999 also included the massive destruction of property, and in particular the targeted burning of houses and the killing of livestock. Some of this destruction took place in the context of the campaigns of terror in the pre-ballot period. Most, however, occurred in a period of three weeks immediately after the 30 August ballot. In that brief period, roughly 70% of all buildings in the territory were deliberately burned or otherwise rendered uninhabitable. The buildings destroyed included private homes, shops, government offices, schools and medical clinics. Crucial infrastructure, including water, electricity, and telecommunications facilities were also destroyed or disabled.

140. Although some parts of the territory were harder hit than others, the pattern of destruction indicated that the violence against property was planned and orchestrated at a high level. Eyewitnesses from disparate towns and villages all reported that the burning and destruction was done systematically, and with either the full participation, or acquiescence, of TNI soldiers and Police (See District Summaries, par. 496, below).

141. Physical destruction on this scale had dire humanitarian consequences. It rendered hundreds of thousands of people homeless, and left a similar number without access to adequate food. It also deprived the vast majority of the population of access to health care and education. In these ways, as the International Commission of Inquiry on East Timor noted in its January 2000 report, the destruction of property also constituted breaches of basic economic and social rights.*

Chronology of violations: three periods

142. The pattern of human rights violations, and crimes against humanity, committed in 1999 varied significantly over time. Three rough periods, each with its own characteristic features, can be discerned: (i) the Pre-UNAMET period (January to late May); (ii) the UNAMET period (early June to 30 August); and the Post-ballot period (30 August to late October).

Pre-UNAMET period (January to late May)

143. Some of the worst human rights violations occurred in the pre-UNAMET period, before Timor-Leste had become the focus of serious media and international attention. Militia groups had begun to form in mid-1998, and by January 1999, together with TNI units, some had already embarked upon a campaign of violence and intimidation targeting real or alleged supporters of independence.

* The Commission of Inquiry noted that various economic and social rights ". . . were violated through the large-scale destruction, including the right to work, the right to an adequate standard of living, including food, clothing, housing and medical care, and the right to education." United Nations, Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, "Report of the International Commission of Inquiry on the Question of East Timor to the Secretary General," UN Doc A/54/726,S/2000/ 59, 31 January 2000. See esp. paragraphs 20, 102-103, and 142.

144. As more militia groups formed, and as military and civilian authorities lent them political and logistical support, the violence accelerated and spread. Between January and the end of May 1999 several dozen people were unlawfully killed, and tens of thousands were forcibly displaced from their homes. Many of those who fled their homes sought refuge in nearby churches or in the private homes of prominent citizens. It was against these people, and in these places of refuge, that some of the most egregious human rights violations were committed.

145. Among the most notorious violations of this period were three mass killings that took place in April 1999. The first, on 6 April 1999, was a massacre of at least 60 people at the parish church in the town of Liquiçá. The second was the deliberate execution of seven people while they were in the custody of TNI soldiers and officers, in the Sub-District of Cailaco, Bobonaro. The third was the killing of at least 12 people who had taken refuge at the Dili home of a prominent supporter of independence, Manuel Carrascalão on 17 April (See Case Studies: Liquiçá Church Massacre, par. 768; Cailaco Massacre, par. 787; and Carrascalão House Massacre, par. 803). These massacres coincided almost exactly with the final negotiations taking place in New York that would lead to the 5 May Agreements.

UNAMET period (early June to 30 August)

146. The human rights situation improved slightly after UNAMET and a substantial number of international observers and journalists began to deploy throughout the territory in early June 1999. Measured by the number of people killed in acts of political violence, there was a marked improvement. Nevertheless, serious violations – including ill-treatment, sexual violence, and forcible relocation – continued. By mid-July 1999, UNAMET and other organisations estimated that there were some 60,000 IDPs, in a population of just over 800,000.*

147. The most commonly reported violations during the UNAMET period were acts of intimidation, beating, and forcible relocation of alleged supporters of independence. Among the best documented cases during this period was the 29 June militia attack on the UNAMET headquarters in the town of Maliana, in Bobonaro District. That attack left several people injured and caused considerable property destruction. An internal UN investigation concluded that the attack had been organised and coordinated by local military commanders, including the District Military Commander, and that it had been intended to intimidate UN staff (See Case Study: Attack on UNAMET Maliana, par. 835). Another well-documented incident typical of this period was the 4 July militia attack on a humanitarian convoy in the town of Liquiçá (See Case Study: Attack on Humanitarian Convoy, par. 852).

148. The human rights situation deteriorated further in late August, during the pe-riod of open campaigning prior to the vote. In addition to a greater number of incidents of threat and intimidation, and a new surge in forcible displacement, there was a significant increase in the number of killings.

* Ian Martin, Self-Determination in East Timor, p. 57.

149. The worst single day of violence during the UNAMET period was 26 August, the final day of campaigning for the pro-autonomy side. The incidence of human rights violations was especially great in Dili, where pro-autonomy forces from around the country had gathered in large numbers, and engaged in aggressive campaigning. In the course of the day in Dili, at least eight people were killed, all but one of them supporters of independence killed by militiamen or members of the security forces (See District Summary: Dili, par. 595).

Post-ballot period (30 August to late October)

150. The most serious and widespread violations of human rights occurred in the aftermath of the ballot. Between 30 August 1999 and the final departure of the TNI at the end of October, an estimated 900 people were unlawfully killed, and some 400,000, or roughly half the population, fled their homes under extreme duress. Of that number at least 250,000 fled or were forcibly relocated to West Timor, and other parts of Indonesia, while the rest took refuge in the hills and forests.

151. The opening salvo came at about 5 pm on ballot day, when a group of militiamen and TNI soldiers attacked a polling station in the village of Boboe Leten, in Ermera district. Two Timorese UNAMET staff members were killed in the attack, and a third was wounded. Subsequent UN investigations revealed that the attack had been planned in advance with the knowledge of the Sub-District military commander, and that TNI soldiers had participated in the attack (See Case Study: Murder of UNAMET Staff Members at Boboe Leten, par. 871).

152. Serious human rights violations were also reported from other notorious centers of pro-autonomy activity. On 2 September, for example, militia forces and TNI soldiers in the town of Maliana began to threaten and attack known independence supporters, and to loot and burn their homes. Similar activities were reported from the districts of Covalima and Ermera.

153. In much of the territory, however, the violence did not begin in earnest until 4 September, the day the result of the ballot was formally announced. The announcement was made in the morning, local time, and by early afternoon the militias, TNI soldiers, and Police had taken to the streets in towns and villages across the territory, firing their weapons, attacking supporters of independence, and burning houses and public buildings.

154. Although it had vowed to remain in Timor-Leste after the vote, UNAMET was rendered powerless in the face of the mounting violence. By 7 September, all staff had been evacuated to Dili, where they took refuge in the UNAMET headquarters. They were joined there by several hundred local people who had fled their homes for the relative safety of the compound. By 8 September there were roughly 500 UN staff and 1,500 IDPs inside the compound. Meanwhile, armed militia gangs had laid siege to the compound, preventing UNAMET staff and refugees from venturing outside. With UNAMET under siege in its main headquarters, and virtually all observers and journalists having fled the country, the violence began in earnest.

155. It was against this background that the TNI took two initiatives ostensibly aimed at restoring order. On 4 September, the TNI assumed responsibility for law and order from the Police, under the auspices of a special command headed by Maj. Gen. Damiri, called 'Nusa Tenggara Military Operations Command'(Ko-Ops TNI Nusra). Then, on 6 September, President Habibie declared Martial Law in Timor-Leste, with effect from 00.00 hours, 7 September. Indonesian military authorities gave assurances that these measures would bring the violence under control. In reality, however, it was during this period that the most egregious violations of human rights took place.

156. A sense of the pattern can be glimpsed by noting just a few of the major violations that occurred in the immediate post-ballot period, and after the military took charge.

- On 6 September, TNI and Brimob troops backed militias as they executed scores of people, including three priests, who had sought refuge in the Cathedral in the town of Suai (See Case Study: Suai Church Massacre, par. 903).
- On the same day, soldiers and police stood by as militias forcibly evacuated thousands of people who had taken refuge in the Dili residence of Bishop Belo, and at the International Committee of the Red Cross and the Canossian Convent nearby (See Case Study: Forcible Evacuation and Murder of Refugees in Dili, par. 887).
- Two days later, on 8 September, militias and TNI soldiers massacred as many as 14 people who were among hundreds who had taken refuge at the police station in Maliana. Another 13 who fled the massacre were hunted down and killed the next day (See Case Study: Maliana Police Station Massacre, par. 923).
- At least 21 people, including a foreign journalist, were killed in September, by elements of TNI Battalion 745 as it withdrew from its base in Lospalos through Baucau and Dili, en route to West Timor (See Case Study: Battalion 745 Rampage, par. 981).
- In the enclave of Oecussi, almost one hundred people were massacred by militiamen and TNI soldiers in two separate incidents in September and October, bringing the total number killed in the district to 170 people (See Case Study: Passabe and Maquelab Massacres, par. 947).

157. These incidents, and many others, formed a critical backdrop to the pattern of systematic threat, intimidation, and terror that, by a conservative estimate, led to the forcible relocation of half of the entire population in a space of two to three weeks. The mass killings were arguably an essential part of a deliberate campaign of terror. They more or less guaranteed that virtually all who could do so would flee their homes, even go into exile, to avoid a similar fate.

Victims

158. The victims of human rights violations in 1999 were overwhelmingly real or alleged supporters of independence, and their close relatives. Some of those targeted were well-known political leaders or prominent members of society, but most were ordinary men and women, more often than not farmers or fishermen. Important sub-categories of pro-independence victims included: CNRT leaders; local authorities; alleged traitors; villagers in pro-independence base areas; members of the Catholic clergy; students and young people; locally employed UNAMET staff; women and girls; and small children.

159. Non-Timorese – including UNAMET staff, journalists and observers – were also subjected to threats, intimidation and harassment, and some were physically attacked and injured. It was notable, however, that international staff and observers were very seldom the target of lethal violence, and only two foreigners were killed during the year.[*] As discussed below, that pattern appears to have been part of a deliberate strategy on the part of Indonesian authorities, rather than simply a matter of good fortune.

160. A small number of the victims of violence were members of pro-autonomy groups, or known supporters of Indonesia. The total number of pro-autonomy supporters killed in 1999 was not more than 20 out of a total death toll of at least 1,200. This disparity belies claims by Indonesian authorities that pro-autonomy forces were the chief victims of violence, and that the mobilisation of militias was a matter of self-defence.

161. Taken together, these patterns make it clear that the violence in 1999 was not random, but targeted, and that it was designed to achieve a particular political purpose: victory for the pro-autonomy option in the Popular Consultation.

CNRT leaders

162. Known leaders of the CNRT were conspicuous among the victims of human rights violations in 1999, both before and after the ballot. In the pre-UNAMET phase, several such leaders were unlawfully killed, and dozens of others were forced to seek protection in police stations or to flee to the mountains or other towns. The situation became even more dangerous in the post-ballot period. In virtually every district of the country, militiamen and TNI soldiers deliberately targeted CNRT leaders for execution.[†]

Local authorities

163. Also targeted, both before and after the ballot, were local authorities – including village heads, Sub-District heads, and civil servants – who had not shown sufficient enthusiasm for the pro-autonomy option, or who had resisted it altogether. Such local officials were subjected to intense pressure not only from militias but also from TNI soldiers and officers, and from civilian authorities. The forms of pressure included

* The two were an elderly German priest, Carolus Albrecht, and a Dutch journalist, Sander Thoenes (See Case Study: Battalion 745 Rampage, par. 981).

† There is no doubt that CNRT leaders were deliberately targeted. In addition to the abundant circumstantial evidence outlined in this report, there is also some documentary evidence to that effect. For example, in an order dated 3 September 1999, Aitarak Commander, Eurico Guterres instructed his Deputy, Inacio de Jesus, and ten other militia members to coordinate with Aitarak and BMP members inspecting people trying to leave Timor-Leste. The order states explicitly that they should "arrest and detain CNRT and Falintil leaders, and await further instructions from the Commander of Aitarak Forces." See: Komandan, Komando Pasukan Aitarak, Sektor B (Eurico Guterres). Order No. 39/SPT/MK-AT/IX/1999, (3) September 1999 (SCU Collection, Doc #27).

public denunciation at meetings, physical threats, and assault on family members, the burning and looting of the victim's house and, in some cases, killing.

Alleged traitors

164. An important sub-category of independence supporters targeted in 1999 were those who had once been considered supporters of Indonesian rule. Such figures were regarded as traitors by Indonesians and pro-Indonesian Timorese, and were singled out for attack or murder.

165. One example of that pattern was the murder of the Liurai of Lospalos, Verissimo Dias Quintas, on 27 August 1999. Although he portrayed himself to Indonesians as a supporter of Indonesian rule, he nevertheless seems to have been a covert supporter of independence, and in 1999 made his home available to the CNRT for use as their office. His murder, committed by militias and BRTT members, under the direction of Kopassus officers and the Bupati, was widely understood as payback for his 'treachery.' Likewise, the violent attack on the home of Manuel Carrascalão on April 17, 1999, which resulted in the death of at least 12 people, appears to have been motivated by animosity toward the Carrascalão family, which had undergone a change of political heart in the final years of Indonesian rule.

166. While some of the victims of human rights violations in 1999 were prominent local or national figures, most were ordinary people living in villages thought to be pro-independence strongholds. Some were suspected of being active members of the Resistance, while others were accused of supplying the Resistance with food. Still others were targeted as proxies for family members who had fled.

167. Whatever the reasons, it was overwhelmingly these people, typically farmers and fishermen, whose homes were looted and burned to the ground, and who were forced to flee to the mountains or to nearby towns, both before and after the ballot. Difficult to access by road, without telephones, and with few outside visitors, the villages were vulnerable to the depradations of militia groups and TNI soldiers. The massacre of almost 100 people in several villages in Oecussi in mid-September 1999 is a case in point (See Case Study: Passabe and Maquelab Massacres, par. 947).

Members of the clergy

168. One of the most shocking aspects of the violence by pro-autonomy forces was the deliberate targeting of Roman Catholic clergy and places of worship. The massacres at the churches in Liquiçá and Suai, in April and September respectively, the attack on Bishop Belo's residence in September, and the execution-style killing of a group of clergy along the road to Baucau on 25 September, seemed deliberately calculated to terrorise a population that was (and still is) 80% Roman Catholic.

169. Some observers have suggested that the targeting of Catholic clergy and places of worship implied a religious motive to the violence, perhaps encouraged by Muslim Indonesians. The available evidence does not support that claim. Rather, it appears that the assault on religious figures and faithful was rooted in a perception that the Church had supported, and even encouraged, the cause of independence. Violence against church leaders and followers, then, was motivated, or at least justified, on political rather than religious grounds.

Students and young people

170. Students and young people were among those deliberately targeted by the militias and the Indonesian security forces. Like some Catholic church figures, the youth and students had gained a reputation over several years as a focal point of pro-independence activity. It is fair to say that young people had been on the frontlines of the struggle for independence, at least since the early 1990s, and many had already died in that cause. The Indonesian authorities and pro-Indonesian Timorese recognised the danger they posed, and were keen to thwart their efforts.

171. Members of the various pro-independence student organisations were especially vulnerable. One group singled out in 1999 was the Student Solidarity Council of East Timor (Dewan Solidaritas Mahasiswa dan Pelajar Timor Timur – DSMPTT), which had started to conduct vigorous public information activities in August 1998. Many of the DSMPTT's members were threatened, beaten, and killed in the course of 1999 (See Case Study: Killing of Two Students at Hera, par. 820).

UNAMET local staff

172. Timorese working with UNAMET were also singled out for attack. At least 14 local UNAMET staff were killed in 1999, all of them in the post-ballot period. Among those killed were the two men, already mentioned, stabbed to death at the end of polling on 30 August, in Boboe Leten, Ermera (See Case Study: Murder of UNAMET Staff Members in Boboe Leten, par. 871). When militia groups began their rampage of violence in Maliana, on 2 September 1999, two more local UNAMET staff were among the first victims there.

173. Local UNAMET staff were sometimes targeted because of their real or alleged pro-independence sympathies. That would appear to have been one reason for the attack on Ana Lemos, a UNAMET staff member beaten, raped, and then killed in Ermera in the days after the ballot (See Case Study: Rape and Murder of Ana Lemos, par. 964). They were also singled out because of a general antipathy toward UNAMET among supporters of Indonesia, that had been fueled by repeated allegations, including some from official sources, of UNAMET bias and unfairness. In other words, these killings were not random acts of violence but politically motivated assassinations.

Women and girls

174. Among the victims of gross human rights violations in 1999, East Timorese women and girls warrant special mention. For, in addition to suffering the full range of violations experienced by men – including murder, torture, and forcible displacement – women and girls were also subjected to gender-specific violations of human rights, including rape and sexual slavery.

175. The political climate in 1999 left women especially vulnerable to such attacks. As the violent campaign against independence gathered pace, many men fled to the mountains or to major towns, leaving their wives and children at home to tend fields and livestock. There, as the local women's rights organisation Fokupers has noted, "women and their children became proxy targets of intimidation and terror."* Women whose husbands were believed to be Falintil fighters, or who were alleged to have pro-independence sympathies themselves, were especially vulnerable to attack (See Case Studies: Arbitrary Detention and Rape in Lolotoe, par. 826; and Rape and Murder of Ana Lemos, par. 964).

Children

176. Although very young children do not appear to have been specifically targeted in 1999, a significant number did suffer serious human rights violations. At least a dozen children were killed in political violence during the year. They included a small child and two young teenagers killed in the massacre at the Suai church on 6 September, and five children from one family killed, together with their mother, after being abducted by militiamen in September 1999. The mother of the children, Georgina Tilman, was known for her pro-independence views (See District Summary: Ermera, par. 618).

177. Children also suffered mental anguish and serious injury when they were caught up in, and became witness to, indiscriminate violence, including attacks on their family members. A number of children witnessed their relatives being beaten or hacked to death. Children were also among the victims of sexual violence in 1999. Of the cases of sexual violence documented by Fokupers, three involved the rape of a minor, and five involved the sexual assault of a minor. Five others were cases of a minor being forced to witness a rape.†

International staff and journalists

178. A striking feature of the pattern of human rights violations in 1999 was that, in spite of the apparent chaos and the rampaging militias – and notwithstanding some very close calls – not a single member of the UN's international staff was killed. While some considered this to be simply a matter of good fortune, it provides a further indication that the descent into violence was carefully planned, most likely by those in Jakarta conscious of the potential international ramifications of violence against foreigners.

179. An essential part of the plan, it appeared, was to create an impression of anarchy that was calculated to terrify – but not to kill – UNAMET and international observers and journalists. That approach was evident in the assaults on UNAMET in late June and early July, and in the August 30 attack at Atsabe that left two local UNAMET staff dead, but no international staff killed or even injured.

* Fokupers, "Progress Report 1 – Gender-based Human Rights Abuses," Dili, June 2000, p. 7.

† Fokupers, "Progress Report 1 – Gender-based Human Rights Abuses," Dili, June 2000, p. 5.

180. One near exception to this general rule occurred in the course of the UNAMET evacuation from Liquiçá, on 4 September 1999. In that case, a UNAMET convoy was ambushed and fired upon by militias, Police, and TNI as it left the compound. One U.S. Civpol was shot and seriously wounded, and several vehicles were riddled with bullet holes, but somehow there were no fatalities. A second near exception occurred in Baucau on 7 September when Brimob fired directly on the UNAMET compound, with apparent intent to kill or injure UN staff. In that case, too, there were no injuries.

181. Notwithstanding these near exceptions, there was clearly a strategy of terrorizing but not killing foreigners. That strategy, it would appear, was based on the recognition – at a fairly high level and most likely in Jakarta – that the death of a foreigner was likely to stimulate a strong and undesirable international response. By contrast, the creation of an appearance of chaos, and even the death of some East Timorese, would provide a plausible pretext to remove all international observers from the countryside, and to call upon the Indonesian army to 'restore order.'

182. For a time, in early September 1999, the strategy appeared to have worked. With most international observers having fled the territory, and the rest confined to the UN compound in Dili, Indonesian authorities and the militia were free to take their revenge against East Timorese who had voted for independence. By all accounts, this is when the worst of the violence was unleashed.

Pro-autonomy figures and militiamen

183. The victims of political violence in 1999 also included a number of well-known pro-autonomy figures, and members of militia groups. Some were detained, beaten, and interrogated before being released, while others were killed. Indonesian authorities and pro-autonomy leaders alleged that a great many of their supporters were killed in 1999. However, fewer than 20 such murders could be confirmed.

184. The killings that did occur often stimulated retaliatory violence by pro-autonomy groups and Indonesian troops, thereby contributing to the cycle of violence. For example, the murder of an FPDK officer and civil servant, Manuel Gama, in April 1999 set in motion a major crackdown by Indonesian forces that resulted in several killings in Cailaco, Bobonaro (See Case Study: Cailaco Killings, par. 787). Likewise, in Manatuto, the murder of a leader of the Morok militia group, Filomeno Lopes da Cruz, in April led to retaliatory killings by pro-Indonesian forces (See District Summary: Manatuto, par. 693). Similarly, the killing of two ABLAI militiamen in Dili in April appears to have contributed to a wave of violence in their home district of Manufahi later that month, in which at least five people were killed (See District Summary: Manufahi, par. 718).

The perpetrators

185. The direct perpetrators of human rights violations in 1999 were predominantly militiamen, but TNI soldiers and officers were almost always involved, either directly or indirectly. Members of the Indonesian Police and Mobile Brigades were somewhat less frequently identified as direct perpetrators, but they were almost always described as having taken no action to prevent, stop or investigate serious violations of human rights. Falintil soldiers, and possibly members of other pro-independence groups, were responsible for ill-treating and killing a small number of pro-autonomy figures and militiamen.

186. Beyond these general patterns, the available evidence shows that certain militia groups, TNI detachments, and Police units were more commonly involved in directly perpetrating human rights violations than others.

Militias

187. The worst militia groups, from the point of view of the severity and frequency of the violations they committed, were Dadurus Merah Putih and Halilintar in Bobonaro, Sakunar in Oecussi, Aitarak in Dili, Besi Merah Putih in Liquiçá, Darah Integrasi in Ermera, Mahidi in Ainaro, and Laksaur in Covalima. Somewhat less conspicuous, but nevertheless responsible for serious violations, were Team Alfa in Lautém, Makikit in Viqueque, Saka and Sera in Baucau, ABLAI in Manufahi, and Morok and Mahadomi in Manatuto.

Military

188. TNI involvement in human rights violations in 1999 took four basic forms. First, the TNI helped to recruit, train, fund, and arm militia groups that committed violations. Second, the TNI led and took part in joint operations with militia groups, in the course of which violations were committed. Third, TNI forces contributed to the commission of violations by deliberately taking no action to prevent or stop planned or continuing militia violence. Finally, in a substantial number of cases, TNI forces directly committed acts of violence amounting to grave human rights violations.

189. The single most dangerous military unit was the Special Forces Command, Kopassus, and its Intelligence Task Force, known as SGI (Satuan Tugas Intelijen). Although relatively few in number, Kopassus and SGI officers and operatives were instrumental in orchestrating and carrying out some of the most brutal and deadly assaults and acts of violence throughout the territory in 1999. The other elite TNI unit deployed in East Timor, the Stragetic Army Reserve (Kostrad) appeared to play an important, if somewhat less conspicuous role in human rights violations.

190. The most dangerous of the regular territorial TNI units in East Timor were those attached to Kodim 1636 in Bobonaro, Kodim 1635 in Covalima, Kodim 1638 in Liquiçá, Kodim 1633 in Ainaro, and Kodim 1639 in Oecussi. Also conspicuous for its systematic violations of human rights, especially in the post-ballot period, was TNI Battalion 745 based in Lospalos. As noted above, elements of this battalion were responsible for killing at least 21 people, including the Dutch journalist Sander Thoenes, as they withdrew from Lospalos to West Timor in September 1999 (See Case Study: Battalion 745 Rampage, par. 981).

Police

191. The Police units most frequently involved in killings and other human rights violations were the paramilitary Mobile Brigades (Brimob), which were deployed in substantial numbers throughout the territory in 1999. Brimob troops were directly responsible, for example, for the unlawful killing of an unarmed pro-independence supporter in Dili on 26 August. The young man in question was exhorting the Brimob soldiers to take action against armed militiamen who were attacking unarmed pro-independence youths. In response, the Brimob soldiers raised their automatic weapons and shot him dead (See District Summary: Dili, par. 595).

192. It needs to be noted, however, that in contrast to the other patterns of Police behavior observed, the direct perpetration of violence by Brimob officers appeared to be somewhat sporadic. Thus, there is a possibility that such incidents were not in fact part of an overall plan, but were instead the product of an institutional pre-disposition to use lethal force. Equipped with high-powered automatic weapons (S-1s), and given military-style training, the Brimob were (and still are) essentially a paramilitary rather than a Police force, and they therefore shared much of the institutional culture of the regular TNI and combat forces.

Falintil

193. For the most part, Falintil forces exercised restraint in the face of attacks by pro-Indonesian forces. However, there were exceptions. In late 1998, and again in April 1999, Falintil units in different parts of the country initiated operations in which pro-Indonesia militiamen, soldiers, and civilians were detained, beaten or killed. Such attacks and killings are known to have occurred in Manufahi, Ermera, Manatuto, Bobonaro, Liquiçá, and Dili. In the post-ballot period, Falintil security bodies, known as Forças Popular and Segurança, committed violations of human rights. In a number of cases, known or suspected pro-Indonesian militiamen were detained and tortured while being interrogated.

194. To sum up, the principal crimes committed in East Timor in 1999 included unlawful killing, torture and ill-treatment, sexual violence, forcible transfer of population, and destruction of property. These acts infringed a wide range of fundamental human rights recognised in international law, including the right to life, the right to personal security, the right to physical integrity, freedom of thought, freedom of association, and the right to own or hold property.

195. The victims of human rights violations in 1999 were overwhelmingly real or alleged supporters of independence, and their close relatives. Important sub-categories of pro-independence victims included: CNRT leaders, local authorities, alleged traitors, villagers in pro-independence base areas, members of the Catholic clergy, students and young people, locally employed UNAMET staff, women and girls, and small children. A very small number of the victims of violence were members of pro-Indonesian groups.

196. Non-Timorese – including international UNAMET staff, journalists and observers – were also subjected to threats, intimidation and harassment, and some were physically attacked and injured. It was notable, however, that international staff and observers were very seldom the target of lethal violence, and only two foreigners were killed during the year. As discussed below (par. 199 ff), that pattern appears to have been part of a deliberate strategy on the part of Indonesian authorities.

197. The direct perpetrators of human rights violations in 1999 were generally members of one of the many militia groups, but TNI soldiers and officers were involved in most cases. TNI officers, especially those attached to military intelligence and Kopassus units, led or directed most militia groups, while some TNI officers and soldiers directly committed grave violations of human rights. Members of the Indonesian Police and Mobile Brigades were also identified as direct perpetrators, though somewhat less frequently than members of the TNI. In addition, the Police seldom took action to prevent, stop or investigate serious violations of human rights. The main perpetrators of the violence against pro-Indonesian figures were Falintil soldiers.

198. These patterns leave little doubt that the acts of violence committed in Timor-Leste in 1999 were carried out on a scale that was both widespread and systematic, in the context of a deliberate attack against particular segments of the East Timorese population. As such, we can fairly conclude that those acts constituted crimes against humanity, as defined in the Rome Statute and related international treaties and instruments.

Patterns and variations

199. A closer examination of the violence in 1999 reveals yet further patterns and variations in its character and its distribution. These include: systematic variations in the intensity of violence over time; a pattern of routine failure by the Police to take effective measures against acts of violence; marked similarities in the modus operandi of militia forces; and a significant variation in the geographical distribution of violence. These patterns and variations provide some of the strongest evidence available that the violence in 1999 was not spontaneous, but was systematic and coordinated by Indonesian authorities.

Temporal variation – turning off the faucet

200. As noted in the previous section, from the perspective of the severity of human rights violations in Timor-Leste, 1999 can be divided into three periods: (i) the pre-UNAMET period, from January to late May; (ii) the UNAMET period, from 1 June to 30 August; and (iii) the post-ballot period, from 30 August to late October. Broadly speaking, human rights violations were most frequent and grave in the first and third periods, and somewhat less serious in the second.

201. That pattern was not random, nor can it be explained by reference to the interests or attitudes of individual militia groups or 'rogue' TNI soldiers. On the contrary, in view of the systematic nature of the variation across the territory, it can only be reasonably explained as the product of a policy decision, taken minimally at the provincial level, and probably higher. More precisely, it appears to reflect a decision to exercise a measure of control over militias and troops during the period of a strong international presence. Both before and after that period of international scrutiny, both the TNI and the militias engaged jointly in systematic campaigns of violence.

202. Perhaps even more revealing of high level planning is the pattern of variation within each of these three broad periods. A close examination shows that the violence ebbed and flowed rather precisely in accordance with the international political interests of Indonesian authorities. Secret documents from 1999 leave no room for doubt, moreover, that TNI commanders in Timor-Leste sought to exercise direct control over the violent actions of the militias, effectively turning the violence on or off in accordance with broader political objectives.

203. This pattern began to come into focus in late January 1999, at the height of the first wave of militia violence and shortly before a planned visit to Timor-Leste by a United Nations delegation on 9 February 1999. In anticipation of that visit, Indonesian military authorities – and in particular the Danrem, Col. Tono Suratman – took deliberate steps to ensure that the militia violence would either stop, or would be invisible to the delegation.

204. A number of secret TNI documents record these initiatives. The first is an order from Col. Suratman, dated 28 January 1999, to all 13 Dandim in Timor-Leste. It opens by referring to "the planned visit by the UN Human Rights Commission to East Timor on 9 February 1999" and "a number of cases that have occurred in Timor-Leste involving Wanra [i.e. militias] that resulted in the loss of life." It then continues:

> "In connection with the foregoing, you are ordered to . . . withdraw the weapons held by Wanra and Ratih [i.e. militia] members when they are not conducting special tasks or combat operations in your respective Kodim areas."1[*]

205. This document is revealing on several levels. First, as discussed below (par. 367 ff), it confirms that the TNI had indeed distributed weapons to the militias, and that armed militias were routinely deployed by the TNI to carry out combat operations. Second, it convincingly demonstrates that Indonesian military authorities were in a position to control the flow of militia violence, and did so in accordance with larger political objectives. In this instance, the aim was to hide from the expected UN delegation the facts about TNI-militia collaboration.

206. Another secret TNI document, dated 12 April 1999, reveals a similar pattern – a well-orchestrated plan by military officers to temporarily control militia violence in order to deceive international observers. The telegram is an order from Col. Tono Suratman to a wide range of operational commanders, including the commander of Kopassus' Satgas Tribuana, and the commanders of military Sectors A and B. It opens by referring to the violent "clashes" in Liquiçá on 5 April that had left many dead. The crux of the matter, however, is revealed in the next paragraph of the cable, which refers to “the planned visit by foreign guests – including Military Attaches, Ambassadors and NGOs – to Timor-Leste, and specifically to Liquiçá” in the coming weeks. In connection with that visit, the recipients of the telegram are given the following order:

> “In order to avoid criticism of our territorial operations by these foreign visitors, for the time being activities should be limited to base security operations.”*

207. The reason for this order was straightforward. TNI authorities understood – or had perhaps been told by their superiors in Jakarta – that it would be politically disadvantageous to Indonesia’s international position if the foreign delegation of military attaches, ambassadors and NGOs saw any evidence of joint TNI-militia co-operation. Accordingly, for the duration of the visit, unit commanders were ordered not to conduct such operations.†

208. The pattern of official manipulation of violence came into focus again in mid-July 1999, in the week before UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan was scheduled to determine whether the registration process, and the Popular Consultation as a whole, should continue. Serious concern had been expressed about the poor security situation and there was a real possibility that Annan might issue a negative determination, and blame it on Indonesia’s failure to establish the necessary security conditions. That outcome would have been extremely damaging to the Indonesian government’s international prestige and to its strategy in Timor-Leste. The government underlined its concern by sending a high-level delegation of cabinet ministers to Dili on 12 July to meet UNAMET and local officials.

209. It was significant, therefore, that as the day of reckoning approached, there was a marked decline in militia activity. While there were instances of violence, the many threats of major, coordinated militia attacks on local people and UNAMET staff simply did not materialise.‡ More general indicators of militia activity – roadblocks, shooting incidents, house-burning, and beatings – also appeared to decline during this period. The TNI, the Police, and some Indonesian civilian authorities seemed to be making an effort to behave in accordance with the 5 May Agreements.

210. UNAMET’s Political Affairs Office saw the lull as evidence that the violence was being coordinated at a fairly high level – from TNI headquarters, under pressure from the Foreign Ministry and the President – and that it could resume as quickly as it had ended. The metaphor they began to use was that of a water faucet, which could be turned on and off at will. What was happening in mid-July, they believed, was an example of the violence being turned off, in a carefully calibrated official effort to avoid a negative determination at the halfway point of the registration. If the violence could be turned off, they reasoned, it could just as easily be turned back on.*

211. Documentary evidence discovered since that time provides strong support for those conclusions. The evidence includes a secret telegram from the Dandim of Dili to all Danramil, ordering them to establish tighter security at weapons stores, to assist the Police and government authorities in controlling the militias, and in particular to assist in dismantling road-blocks. The relevant passage of the order reads:

> "1.BB. Weapons are only to be used on official duty; afterwards weapons should be returned to the storage area. 2.AA. Unit Commanders are to assist the Government and the Police in controlling the Pam Swakarsa in their respective areas. 2.BB. Coordinate with Police to re-open roads that have been closed by road-blocks . . . ."†

212. This instruction was issued as a follow up to an order on the same subject, issued by the Danrem on 17 July 1999.

213. The timing of these orders leaves little doubt that they came in response to strong UN and international pressure on the TNI to improve the security situation or risk a negative determination that would derail the whole process. Just as importantly, they confirmed the UNAMET analysis that military authorities had the ability to turn the violence on and off, and that they did so in accordance with their political needs.

214. Events in August provided additional support for that interpretation. As the end of registration neared in early August, there were serious militia attacks on UNAMET staff in Bobonaro and Ainaro and then a sudden spasm of violence in Dili on the final day of campaigning in which at least eight people were killed. The surge of violence in August was followed by an almost complete cessation of militia activity on the day of the vote, August 30, and during the ballot count in the following days.‡

215. Both of these occasions – the vote and the ballot count – offered ample opportunity for pro-Indonesian militias to completely derail the process, but they did not do so. The

* A weekly situation report written by the Political Affairs Office, for the period 12-18 July 1999, noted: "There were signs of modest improvement in the security climate in certain districts during the week, but it is still too early to conclude that the necessary security conditions exist for a free and fair consultation. The main reason for caution is that there has not been any verifiable change in the fundamentals that lie at the heart of insecurity, with the result that any apparent improvements could quickly be reversed." ‡ 20/7A handful of polling stations had to be closed down temporarily during the day as a result of threats or acts of violence, but on the whole, voting proceeded much more smoothly than anticipated. The same was true of the ballot count that took place in the government-run museum next door to the regional Police headquarters (Polda) in Dili between 31 August and 4 September.

only plausible explanation for the sudden lull in violence at such critical moments was that the militias and their Indonesian patrons still believed their side was likely to win. Indeed, in comments to the media after the vote key Indonesian officials – including Ali Alatas and Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim – indicated that they had expected the vote to be won or lost by a narrow margin.* If they had believed otherwise, the days of the vote and of the ballot count would have been the ideal times to step up the intimidation and violence, rather than stopping it. The fact that the same pattern occurred across the territory would seem to indicate that the decision not to attack on these days must have been made at a high level.

216. Finally, it was notable that militia activity, which Police and TNI authorities had consistently claimed was uncontrollable, suddenly stopped on almost every occasion that important high-level delegations visited the territory. As already noted, this had happened in February, in April, and near the mid-point of registration in July. However, the most conspicuous instance came on 11 September 1999 when the UN Security Council delegation, and Gen. Wiranto, visited Dili to investigate reports of militia and TNI violence. Sandwiched between several days of relentless shooting and burning, the day of the visit was almost completely without incident. For those who had been in Timor-Leste for some time, including analysts in the Political Affairs Office, this came as no surprise. It was further evidence that the violence could be turned on and off like a tap, in accordance with the political interests or needs of senior TNI and government officials.

217. Given that evidence, the pattern of violence and human rights violations after the declaration of Martial Law on 7 September 1999 is especially revealing. In virtually every district of the territory, TNI forces joined the militia in a systematic campaign of burning and looting, or at least did nothing to stop it (See District Summaries, par. 496).

218. In Manatuto, for example, UNAMET Military Liaison Officers witnessed the TNI transporting numerous drums of petrol that were then used in an orchestrated six-day burning operation that decimated the town. Although it is true that that operation began before 7 September, the imposition of Martial Law did not appear to inhibit or slow it in any way. The same pattern was observed first hand by numerous UNAMET personnel, including the Chief Military Liaison Officer, who witnessed TNI soldiers burning buildings throughout Dili long after Martial Law had been declared and the TNI had taken full control of the territory.

219. Perhaps even more striking, it was after the imposition of Martial Law that some of the most notorious massacres occurred, virtually all of them with TNI and/or Police complicity. For example:

- On 8 September, militiamen and TNI soldiers killed at least 14 people, and possibly more, who had taken refuge in the Maliana Police station (See Case Study: Maliana Police Station Massacre, par. 923).

* Speaking to journalists in January 2000, Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim said: "In our prediction, we would either lose or win by a slight margin . . . But only 21 per cent voted in favour of Indonesia's continued rule in East Timor . . . It was really disappointing." South China Morning Post, 5 January 2000.

- Between 8 and 10 September, militiamen together with TNI soldiers rounded up and executed at least 82 men from three villages in the District of Oecussi, in the most concentrated mass killings in the territory (See Case Study: Passabe and Maquelab Massacres, par. 947).
- In a systematic campaign of violence, as they moved from their base in Lospalos to West Timor in September, soldiers of Battalion 745 killed as many as 21 people, including a Dutch journalist (See Case Study: Battalion 745 Rampage, par. 981).
- On 25 September, several Kopassus-trained and armed militiamen from Lospalos ambushed and executed five clergy and four lay people as they drove down the road toward Baucau. (See Case Study: Murder of Lospalos Clergy, par. 1002.)

220. Some observers have suggested that certain senior TNI officers made serious, albeit unsuccessful, attempts to bring the militias and territorial forces under control, shortly before and after the imposition of Martial Law. According to one unconfirmed report, for example, Gen. Wiranto tried to order the withdrawal of the militias to West Timor before the ballot, but was unable to make his order stick in the face of opposition from within the TNI. Likewise, some who had direct dealings with the TNI leadership at the time have claimed that Martial Law Commander Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri and Col. Noer Muis made an effort to control the violence during Martial Law. If these claims could be demonstrated to be true, they might affect judgments about the culpability of individual officers. They might also help to clarify whether the post-ballot violence was ordered through the normal chain of command or not. However, they would not alter the more general conclusions drawn here – that very serious acts of violence were committed after the imposition of Martial Law, and that some senior TNI officers coordinated or condoned that violence.

221. The persistence of apparently coordinated violence after the declaration of Martial Law is especially significant because Martial Law entailed the deployment of Kostrad troops. Unlike the territorial and other forces that had been in Timor-Leste for some time – and who it was thought may have been 'contaminated' by links with the militias – the Kostrad troops were new and centrally commanded. Moreover, they were considered to be loyal to Gen. Wiranto, who had served as Kostrad commander in 1996-97. For these reasons, some observers expected that the Kostrad troops would be more disciplined and that they would break the grip of any 'rogue elements' in the TNI who might have been assisting the militias. But as demonstrated by the evidence just noted, the reality was rather different.

222. In short, the patterns in the timing of the violence leave little question that the violence was systematic and that it was coordinated to some degree by the TNI and other government authorities.

Police inaction and complicity

223. The view that the violence was planned, and not spontaneous, finds further support in the patterns of Indonesian Police behavior. The most conspicuous pattern was the routine failure of the Police to respond to acts of violence by militia groups while they occurred, or to take adequate measures to investigate or punish them after the fact.

224. One of the clearest examples of this pattern was the Police response to the militia attack on the humanitarian convoy in Liquiçá on 4 July. Despite clear warnings that the convoy might be attacked, and despite repeated requests by UNAMET for an official Police escort, none was provided. Indonesian Police also failed to intervene once the attack was underway, even though the District Police headquarters (Polres) was only a few minutes away by car. In the immediate aftermath of the attack, moreover, the Police made no effort to detain, or even to interview any of the militia members who had been observed attacking the convoy with weapons. On the contrary, they worked with the militia to round up those who were fleeing from the attack. As UNAMET and NGO personnel drove toward Dili in their damaged vehicles, they encountered a road-block just outside the Liquiçá District Police station (Polres). The roadblock was manned by two militia-men one of whom was carrying an automatic weapon (See Case Study: Attack on Humanitarian Convoy, par. 852).

225. Militiamen known to have committed acts of violence were almost never arrested or charged with any crime. The only known exceptions came in the wake of intense international pressure and political intervention at the highest level. In response to such pressure, several militia-men were detained and charged in connection with the 4 July attack on the humanitarian convoy, and a 29 June attack on UNAMET headquarters in Maliana. However, the cases were not vigorously prosecuted and, after receiving very short suspended sentences of four or five months, all of the accused were set free.*

226. The problem was not one of legal ambiguity. Even in Timor-Leste, Indonesian law unequivocally prohibited murder, kidnapping, property destruction, and the carrying of weapons without a license, so there was ample legal foundation for Police action against the militias. Moreover, under the terms of the 5 May Agreements, the Indonesian Police were given sole responsibility for the maintenance of law and order during the Popular Consultation. Nor was it a matter of inadequate training or expertise. On occasion the Police did act assertively and professionally, although this was usually in pursuit of an alleged criminal from the pro-independence side.

227. The real problem was that the Indonesian Police were politically and operationally subordinate to the TNI.† To the extent that East Timor's militias were backed by the TNI – and the Police were under no illusions on that score – the chances were extremely slim that the Police would dare to interfere with them. Indeed, Indonesian Police officers told their UN Civpol counterparts that they were constrained by the TNI. This was not only a matter of following TNI demands or orders. It was also the result of a general perception that some of the militiamen were actually TNI, perhaps even Kopassus, soldiers. Under the circumstances, the Police were legitimately afraid to intervene forcefully.

228. The nature of the problem was well illustrated by the experience of a UNAMET team that went to the Sub-District of Atsabe on 31 August 1999 to investigate the murder of João Lopes, one of two local UNAMET staff members killed in the area by militias on ballot day. Approaching the building where Mr. Lopes' body lay, the team saw that it was surrounded by about 50 militiamen – evidently the very men who had killed him – armed with machetes, home-made guns, and rifles. Mingling among them were Police and TNI soldiers. Lengthy discussions with the local Police chief (Kapolsek) and an Indonesian Police officer based in Ermera, produced assurances that the militias would be dispersed and restrained. But no action was ever taken, and the militias remained in the immediate vicinity, weapons in hand. In response to renewed protests, both the Kapolsek and the officer from Ermera explained that they did not dare to order the militias to do anything, because they would very likely turn against the Police (See Case Study: Murder of UNAMET Staff Members at Boboe Leten, par. 871).

229. Police also took part in operations that facilitated militia and TNI violence, some of which judging from their scope must have been planned at the provincial level or higher. The most powerful evidence to that effect came from the post-ballot period, and specifically from the behavior of the Police and TNI during the evacuation of UNAMET personnel from district offices in early September. The events leading to the evacuations bore remarkable, indeed chilling, similarities, and had the hallmarks of a well-planned psychological warfare operation. A UNAMET report about the evacuations from five separate district offices on 3 and 4 September concluded that the violence had been part of a "deliberate strategy to force UNAMET to withdraw from certain regions back to Dili."* In retrospect, it is evident that an important aim of that operation was to terrorise UNAMET international staff and all other international observers, with a view to making them leave the territory.

230. In every instance, the sequence of events began with militias roaming freely through the main town, more heavily armed than usual, shooting, setting fire to buildings, and killing. In every case, the Indonesian Police and TNI either made no attempt to restrain the militias, or actively assisted them. Within a matter of hours, the Police in every affected district warned that they could no longer control the situation, and recommended that all UNAMET staff relocate to the District Police station. Once they had gathered UN staff in their stations, Police suddenly announced that they would be leaving, and advised UNAMET to follow. Having no means of guaranteeing their own security, and cut off from all independent sources of information, district UNAMET officials had little choice but to go along. And so, in each case, they joined the Police convoy out of town and back to Dili.

231. Now and then the Police went beyond their customary failure to act, or their facilitation of militia violence, and actually played a direct role as perpetrators of violence. This was particularly true of the Police Mobile Brigades (Brimob), several thousand of which were deployed to Timor-Leste during the Popular Consultation. In one incident in Dili, on the final day of campaigning (26 August 1999) a uniformed member of the Mobile Brigade shot a civilian in the back with his automatic weapon, killing him instantly. The victim was a student, Bernardino Agusto Guterres (a.k.a. Bernardino da Costa). The incident was witnessed by several bystanders and captured on video. In a sworn statement to the independent Electoral Commission that oversaw the ballot process, one eyewitness described the incident:

> The crowd shouted to the Police to stop the militias who were shooting. One of them . . . remonstrated with the Police, directing their attention to the militias. A Policeman who was not wearing a beret like his comrades . . . told [the youth] that he could shoot him because he was exciting the people. [The youth] turned and ran. The Policeman thereupon shot him at a range of about three paces. I subsequently saw a gunshot wound in the middle of his back and one behind the neck. He died there. When the ambulance attendants lifted the body later I saw a large gaping wound to the throat.*

232. A local resident who called UNAMET later the same day, claimed that Indonesian Police had been observed handing weapons to militia members before and during the incident. Other bystanders claimed that the Aitarak militiamen were in fact TNI soldiers. These claims were never independently verified, but they were consistent with the well-established pattern of official support for the militia.

233. To sum up, there is a substantial body of evidence, based on field observation, that the Indonesian Police were unwilling or unable to intervene to prevent or stop unlawful militia activity, and that the reason lay primarily in their subordinate position vis-a-vis the TNI. This conclusion is not based on any single act or event but on the analysis of clearly patterned behavior.

234. The fact that virtually the same sort of Police behavior was observed consistently throughout the territory strongly suggests that this was a matter of policy, at least as high as the regional level (Polda). The chillingly similar pattern of Police behavior at the time of the forced evacuations of early September suggests the same conclusion. The documentary evidence also confirms that the Police role in the evacuation was planned at the Provincial (Polda) level. But, since we know (from the documents analyzed in Chapter 5 of this report) that overall strategic planning for the evacuation took place at TNI headquarters in Jakarta, we can be reasonably sure that this observed Police behavior was mapped at that level, and very likely under TNI supervision.

Militia modus operandi

235. The militias' style and modus operandi were virtually the same everywhere in the territory. Those broad similarities, across all 13 districts, provide additional indications of planning and co-ordination of the militias by military and government authorities, at least at the provincial level, and possibly higher.

* UNAMET, Electoral Commission, "Statement Minuted on Friday, 27 August 1999."

236. The militia style was designed to deceive. A small handful of militiamen wore Indonesian military uniforms, or parts of one, but most wore 'civilian' clothing – red and white bandanas around their neck or head, and often a T-shirt bearing a pro-autonomy slogan of some sort. Such 'civilian' garb was evidently designed to sustain the illusion that the militias had formed spontaneously, and to provide plausible grounds for denial of official involvement in acts of violence.

237. If the militia style was intended to deceive, the modus operandi was designed to terrorise, and intimidate. Significantly, perhaps, none of the methods used were unique to Timor-Leste. Like the very idea of using 'civilian' militia forces, they were drawn from the repertoire developed by TNI forces in other counter-insurgency and anti-crime operations conducted elsewhere in Indonesia over more than thirty years.[*]

238. The most common elements of the militia repertoire included the erection of road-blocks and check-points, beatings, house-burning, public death threats, the brandishing and firing of weapons, and in the case of women, the threat and reality of sexual violence, including rape.[†] When not engaged in these activities, most militia units engaged in military-style drilling and marching in formation with real or mock weapons.

239. Targeted killing, corpse display and mutilation were also part of the repertoire and, again following standard TNI practice, these were intended to be exemplary - to send a message to others in the community of what would happen to those who did not heed the militias' or the TNI's warnings. The bodies of the victim were often mutilated in some way – decapitated, disemboweled or hacked into small pieces - and then left in full public view. A report on the militias in Viqueque, prepared by UNAMET Military Liaison Officers (MLOs) in August 1999, noted that: "The methods of killing, as reported, are gruesome. For example, one victim had an animal bone driven through his brain . . .There appears to be an intention to achieve psychological impact and use the manner of death to intimidate others."[‡]

240. Another common element of the militia repertoire that was clearly intended to terrorise the population was the marking of targets for killing. As the UNAMET report from Viqueque explained:

> "This is a basic psychological ploy, which can involve issuing threats against a victim to a wide circle of people to ensure it reaches the target.

Another tactic noted in our area is the practice of marking houses with a red 'X' to denote that the occupant(s) was/were marked for death."*

241. In the view of UNAMET analysts, the intention of such tactics was to achieve a psychological objective ". . . such as demonstrating to the population that the militia has the power to target and kill an individual."

242. The militia's manner of attacking its targets was evidently intended to produce similar psychological effects. When militias staged an attack, they did not do so with the cool precision of professional hit-men. Rather, they created the impression of men in a state of frenzy, shouting and slashing the air with their weapons. In other words, they behaved as one imagines a man 'running amok.'

243. The 'amok' style of militia attack was captured in much of the terrifying television footage that came out of Timor-Leste between June and September 1999. One of the earliest and most shocking incidents of this kind occurred on 4 July, when members of the militia group Besi Merah Putih attacked a humanitarian convoy that had stopped briefly while passing through the town of Liquiçá† (See Case Study: Attack on Humanitarian Convoy, par. 852). A UNAMET report on the attack provided the following account:

> "About five minutes after the convoy stopped in Liquiçá, a blue-green mini-van with the word 'Miramar' on the side sped down the hill from the south, and came to a sudden stop near the middle of the line of parked vehicles. As the van stopped, some 20 young men jumped out and began to approach the NGO and UNAMET staff, shouting 'kill them!' Most were carrying machetes, knives or home-made guns. At least one member of the group was carrying an automatic weapon. Without warning or provocation the militia members began to attack, waving their machetes and knives menacingly, pointing their guns at members of the convoy, and smashing the windows of most of the vehicles. The attack continued as people tried to flee. . ."‡

244. The marked similarity in the repertoire of militia violence across Timor-Leste appears to confirm that the militias were trained and their actions orchestrated by the TNI. The militia behaviour observed was so widespread, and so consistent, that it can only reasonably be understood as the product of coordinated planning, at least up to the 'provincial' (Korem) level. Even if all militia actions were not the result of direct TNI co-ordination, it is abundantly clear that the militias could not have behaved as they did without the acquiescence and encouragement of the TNI and, to a lesser extent, the Police.

Geographical variations

245. While it is true that human rights violations in Timor-Leste varied systematically over time, and that the perpetrators adopted a very similar modus operandi wherever they were, there were significant geographical variations in the intensity and frequency of violations. Paradoxically, those variations provide additional support for the claim that the violence was planned, not spontaneous.

246. Militia groups did not emerge simultaneously or evenly throughout the territory. Broadly speaking, militias were established first in the western and central districts and somewhat later in the east, and in the enclave of Oecussi. The western and central districts also boasted larger numbers of militia recruits, and a deeper penetration of groups down to the Sub-District and Village level. It was no coincidence that the best known, and most feared, of the militia groups – BMP, Aitarak, Mahidi, Laksaur, Darah Integrasi, Dadurus Merah Putih, and Halilintar – were all concentrated in the western districts.

247. Similarly, there was some geographical variation in the intensity of the violence. In the pre-UNAMET and UNAMET periods, the worst areas were the western Districts of Bobonaro, Liquiçá, Covalima, with the Districts of Dili, Ermera and Ainaro occasionally reaching similar levels of insecurity. By contrast the central and eastern-most Districts of Aileu, Manufahi, Manatuto, Baucau, Lautém, and Viqueque together with the enclave of Oecussi, were relatively calm, and the militias far less active, at least until the post-ballot period.

248. At first glance, those variations appear to lend credence to the claim that the 1999 violence was spontaneous. On closer analysis, however, the variations strongly suggest that the violence stemmed from a systematic pattern of linkages between the militias and the Indonesian authorities that was unique to the western districts. More specifically, militias tended to be stronger and more violent in areas: (i) that shared a border with Indonesia; (ii) where military and civilian authorities played an aggressive role in supporting them; and (iii) where there was a long-established network of pro-Indonesian operatives before 1999.

249. The first, and arguably the most important, factor explaining the concentration of violence in the western districts was their geographical proximity to Indonesia. The most violent districts – Covalima and Bobonaro – shared a border with Indonesian West Timor. The shared border offered a number of advantages, logistical, military, and political, that facilitated and encouraged the use of violence there.

250. For one thing, the common border meant that young men could easily be recruited in NTT and transported across the border to serve as 'East Timorese' militias.

Geographical proximity likewise made it easy to infiltrate TNI soldiers into Timor-Leste to undertake covert operations. An investigation conducted by an Indonesian NGO in early August 1999 revealed substantial evidence of such recruitment and cross-border movement by militias, including BMP, Laksaur, Mahidi, and ABLAI. One militia member told the investigators that approximately 250 militiamen in Suai were in fact from Belu, NTT. The same report revealed that the supreme militia commander, João Tavares, had rented a house on the NTT side of the border, in Atambua, which he used as a militia headquarters.*

251. The shared border also facilitated the disposal of the bodies of the victims of human rights violations. In September 1999, TNI and militia forces transported the bodies of at least 27 victims of the massacre at the Suai Church across the border to West Timor, and there was anecdotal evidence that other victims were disposed of in the same way (See Case Study: Suai Church Massacre, par. 903).

252. Geographical proximity was also an essential condition for the massive forcible deportation of the population in the post-ballot period. The vast majority of the roughly 250,000 people forcibly displaced to NTT were from the western districts that bordered Indonesia. The displacement of those populations could not have happened on so great a scale had Indonesia not been easily accessible by land. Support for that claim lies in the fact that the vast majority of those forcibly deported lived in towns and villages that lay along the main roads to the border.

253. The greater intensity of violence in the western districts was also clearly related to the attitudes of the military and civilian authorities serving in these areas. The posture of district and local authorities affected the way in which TNI and Police were deployed, and also the strength and level of activity of the militia groups in the area.

254. The attitudes of District Military Commanders (Dandim), and military intelligence officers, were particularly important. The Dandim of Bobonaro, Lt. Col. Burhanuddin Siagian, and his chief of intelligence, Lt. Sutrisno, were unusually energetic in their support for the militias, and this was the district with the most persistent human rights problems. Indeed, these officers – and others in Covalima, Liquiçá and Viqueque – were considered to be so much a part of the problem that UNAMET made formal representations to the Indonesian authorities for their removal less than two weeks before the ballot.† Apparently as a result of those representations, the Dandims of Bobonaro and Covalima were removed and replaced shortly before the ballot.

255. For various reasons, these 11th-hour transfers did not solve the problem. In part, that was because the transfers were not fully implemented. Lt. Col. Siagian was seen in Bobonaro on 30 August and thereafter commanding troops, and his presence coincided with the reported distribution of arms to the militias and a dramatic escalation of violence in the district. It is not clear whether Lt. Col. Achmad Mas Agus remained in Covalima District after his formal removal. But it is certain that his replacement as Dandim was a military intelligence officer hand-picked by Kodam IX commander, Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri. The new Dandim, Lt. Col. Lilik Koeshardianto, presided over some of the worst violence in the country, including the massacre at the Suai Cathedral on 6 September. His presence at the scene of the crime reinforces the general point that individual Dandim – and military officers more generally – were singularly important in shaping the pattern of violence.

256. The special importance of Dandims also helps to explain the relatively low levels of violence in certain districts. In Aileu, for example, the Dandim, Maj. Maman Rahman, seems to have played a rather minor role in mobilising and supporting the militias. That may have been because he was only a Major, outranked by the Bupati and by various Kopassus officers in the area, or because others in the district took the lead. Whatever the reason it is notable that Aileu suffered significantly lower levels of militia violence in 1999 than many other districts.

257. A similar pattern was evident in the District of Viqueque. By most accounts, the Dandim appointed shortly before the referendum, Lt. Col. Gustaf Heru, exercised a moderating influence on the militias, and worked actively to limit the post-ballot violence in the district. His efforts may help to explain why Viqueque reportedly suffered only two killings in the entire post-ballot period, by far the lowest level of violence in the country.

258. It was not only military officers, however, whose attitudes affected the geographical distribution of violence. The attitude of Bupatis, Sub-District Heads and Village Heads also made a difference. On the whole, the violence tended to be worst where Bupatis lent their full personal and professional support to the militias. This was most notably the case in Liquiçá, Bobonaro, and Covalima, where the Bupatis were directly and aggressively involved in organising militias.

259. The importance of the Bupati, as a potentially independent power, was also highlighted by the situation in Baucau District, where militias remained relatively quiet, even after the 30 August ballot. There, in spite of strong pressure from the Kodim Chief of Staff, the Bupati actively opposed the formation of new militias. His reasons for doing so remain unclear. There was some speculation that the older militia groups – such as Saka and Sera – were controlled by forces close to him, and that he saw the creation of new militias as a challenge to his own authority. Others have suggested that he was influenced by the Bishop of Baucau, Monsignor Nascimento. Whatever the reasons, the fact is that he managed to impede the mobilisation of new militias, at least for a time.

260. The Bupati of Manufahi appears to have had a similarly moderating effect on militia violence there. Although he served as an Indonesian government official, Nazario José Tilman de Andrade was considered to be a moderate and perhaps even sympathetic to independence. There were signs, moreover, of a rift between him and the leadership of the ABLAI militia. It seems likely that his lack of support for ABLAI contributed to its weakness, and to the relatively low levels of violence its members inflicted in 1999.

261. A third, and related, explanation for the somewhat uneven geographical distribution of violence in 1999 is that the western districts had a reliable network of pro-Indonesian power brokers in place long before 1999. The concentration of pro-Indonesian bosses in the western districts had deep historical roots. In the latter half of the 19th century, the Portuguese regarded the kingdoms in the border region as unruly, disobedient, and lawless, and made them the focus of repeated pacification campaigns.* As Portuguese power began to crumble in 1974-75, many of the powerful local families in the area saw an opportunity to get rid of them, and opted to support the Indonesian invasion and annexation.

262. That long established pro-Indonesian network was relied upon to mobilise substantial militia forces at relatively short notice. A case in point was João Tavares, the man designated in 1999 as the Supreme Commander of the Pro-Integration Forces (PPI). Tavares had earned his stripes by fighting on the Indonesian side as early as 1975. He was rewarded for his loyalty by being appointed for two terms as Bupati of Bobonaro.† He was also able to amass substantial land-holdings, making him one of the largest landlords in the territory, after President Soeharto and a number of his cronies. By 1999, then, Tavares had long been a very powerful local operator, and he was only one of several in the western districts who could be relied upon to organise pro-autonomy militias and activities.

263. By contrast, the central and eastern districts had a much less solid network of local pro-Indonesian bosses. In part this was because these districts were generally poorer than those in the west, and therefore arguably less conducive to the emergence of wealthy and powerful local power brokers. Just as importantly, the central and eastern districts had historically been important base areas for the Fretilin and Falintil resistance. Some Village Heads in these districts, and even some Bupatis, were sympathetic or at least not hostile to Fretilin, even if they did not show this outwardly. That situation seriously limited the cohort of people likely to join a militia, or to lead one.

264. Paradoxically, then, the uneven geographical pattern of militia violence does not support the claim that the violence was spontaneous. Rather, it reinforces other evidence that the violence was systematic, and that it rested crucially on the relationship between militia forces and Indonesian authorities. More precisely, the concentration of violence in the western districts was related to three main factors: geo-graphical proximity to Indonesia; the attitude and career background of District and local authorities; and the historically conditioned location of pro-Indonesian networks.

265. To sum up, this chapter makes the case that discernible patterns in the character and distribution of violence in East Timor indicate that it was not spontaneous, but rather systematic and planned by Indonesian authorities. Four distinct patterns point to that conclusion.

* On the west's reputation for lawlessness, see Katherine Davidson, The Portuguese Colonisation of Timor: The Final Stage, 1850-1912, Ph.D Thesis, University of New South Wales, 1994, pp. 74, 101, 170, and 181.

† Tavares was appointed Bupati of Bobonaro in 1978 and held the post for the next ten years. Dunn writes that, after the formal 'integration' of East Timor in 1976, ". . . trusted Timorese, such as João Tavares and Tomás Gonçalves were appointed Bupatis." Dunn, Timor: A Nation Betrayed, p. 266.

266. First, there was systematic variation in the incidence and gravity of violence over time. Three rough periods, each with its own characteristic features, can be discerned: (i) the Pre-UNAMET period (January to late May); (ii) the UNAMET period (early June to 30 August); and (iii) the Post-ballot period (30 August to late October). The violence ebbed and flowed in apparent harmony with the political needs and interests of the Indonesian authorities, and there was both circumstantial and documentary evidence that those variations were a matter of official policy.

267. Second, there was a pervasive failure on the part of the Police, and other responsible authorities, to take effective action against the perpetrators of violence. The consistency of such inaction, and the pattern of impunity to which it contributed, appeared to reflect a policy decision taken at a high level.

268. Third, there were striking similarities in the modus operandi of the militias across the territory. The consistency with which certain styles and behaviours were observed in different locales strongly suggested that the violence was coordinated at least at the level of the Sub-Regional Military Command (Korem), and probably higher.

269. Finally, notwithstanding such broad similarities in behaviour across the territory, there were significant geographical variations in the intensity and incidence of violence. Those variations were systematic, and consistent with other evidence of overall planning by Indonesian authorities.

Six key documents

270. Since early 1999, a number of documents have surfaced that have been portrayed as evidence of high-level TNI planning of violence both before and after the 30 August ballot. That evidence needs to be examined carefully because it may be critical in establishing questions of political and legal responsibility for the crimes committed in Timor-Leste.

271. Six documents in particular deserve special scrutiny because of the claims that have been made on their behalf. They are: a secret memorandum from a militia leader spelling out plans to conduct an operation against supporters of independence; a circular allegedly issued by the supreme militia commander, João Tavares; a secret report prepared by a high ranking government official, H.R. Garnadi; a telegram outlining plans for the mobilisation of a special military unit after the ballot; a Police plan for a massive post-ballot evacuation, called 'Operation Hanoin Lorosae II;' and a TNI operational plan for the popular consultation and evacuation, called 'Operation Wira Dharma-99.'

Operation Clean Sweep

272. The first of the documents offered as proof of high-level planning of violence is a memorandum dated 11 March 1999, addressed to Timor-Leste's supreme militia commander, João Tavares, and other militia leaders.* Issued by the commander of the Darah Merah militia, Lafaek Saburai, the memo announces plans for the start of 'Operation Clean Sweep' (Operasi Pembersihan) at 00:00 hours on 1 May 1999. According to the document, the operation would "capture and eliminate" key pro-independence supporters, by first moving the entire pro-Indonesian population of Dili to the district of Bobonaro, and then killing all those who remained in Dili as of a certain date.

273. When the document first surfaced in early 1999 some analysts quickly concluded that it proved the existence of a central plan by Indonesian military intelligence to disrupt the referendum through militia violence and intimidation. Before long, other observers and analysts had accepted this conclusion and had begun to speak and write confidently about 'Operation Clean Sweep' as a TNI plan to subvert the referendum.† The East Timor Action Network (ETAN) wrote, for example, that "implementation of the plan [to disrupt the vote] started immediately after President Habibie's broad autonomy offer in August 1998, and it came into being formally in March 1999 under the code name Operation Clean Sweep (Operasi Sapu Jagad)."‡

274. In support of this view, analysts noted that the author of the 'Clean Sweep' document, Lafaek Saburai (also known as Afonso Pinto) was known to have links to BIA, the military intelligence organisation headed until January 1999 by Major General Zacky Anwar Makarim. ETAN wrote that because of Saburai's known links to BIA, "conclusions can be drawn as to where the orders were originating."§

275. That may be true, but there are a number of reasons for caution in accepting this reading of the document. For one thing, Saburai's background as a BIA operative does not in itself constitute evidence that his threatened 'Operation Clean Sweep' was a TNI or BIA plan, and there are reasons to doubt that it was. As later events revealed, his militia group Darah Merah was very much a local outfit and by no means among the most influential or powerful groups in the territory.¶ Compared to Aitarak in Dili, Besi Merah Putih in Liquiçá, or Mahidi in Ainaro, Darah Merah was small and insignificant. One might reasonably ask why this would be the case if Saburai and Darah Merah really were the main conduit of a central BIA plan.

276. The value of the 'Clean Sweep' document as evidence of a centrally planned military operation is also diminished by the fact that the operation it announced never actually happened. 1 May came and went without any sign of the mass cleansing that the memorandum promised.

277. In short, the TNI may well have had a plan to terrorise the population and influence the outcome of the vote, but the 'Clean Sweep' document does not provide convincing proof of it. Instead, it appears to be the work of a slightly over-zealous local militia commander who is boasting about his intentions to fellow commanders and to any TNI officers who might be listening.

278. Yet if the 'Clean Sweep' document does not prove that there was a high level plan for violence by Indonesian military intelligence, it does provide additional evidence of the nature of the relationship between the militias and the Indonesian authorities. It shows, for example, that militia groups at least aspired to broad co-ordination with the TNI. It also reveals the extent to which the rhetoric of terror, a hallmark of the TNI's own counter-insurgency strategy, had become a standard feature of the militia style by early 1999.

The Tavares Document

279. A second document commonly cited as evidence that pre- and post-ballot violence was planned at high levels is an instruction, dated 17 July 1999, purportedly signed by Timor-Leste's supreme militia boss – formally known as 'Commander of the Integration Fighters Force' – João da Silva Tavares. The two-page instruction is addressed to the principal militia commanders in Timor-Leste, and copied to various military and Police officers, including Armed Forces Commander Gen. Wiranto and Regional Military Commander for Kodam IX, Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri.

280. With shocking bluntness, the Tavares instruction directs all militia commanders to: "Continue your terror and intimidation campaign against those who are influencing the public to reject Special Autonomy" and urges them to "pressure and threaten the public not to participate in the campaign being conducted by the pro-independence leaders . . ."[*] The instruction also promises that the Indonesian authorities will provide the militias with substantial material support. "Before the results of the Popular Consultation are announced," it says:

> ". . . weapons will be distributed – 15,000 modern weapons that have been made available by ABRI [sic]. You will be supported by TNI elite troops and backed by heavy artillery/tanks and 50 modern fighter jets. . . .When the results of the Popular Consultation are announced, if the pro-Autonomy forces are defeated then Operation Clean Sweep will be simultaneously launched in full strength against the pro-independence forces beginning with those 15 years and older, both males and females, without exception."[†]

A copy of this document, and an English translation prepared by UNAMET, are in the author's possession.

† "Instruksi . . .Tentang Kesiapan dan Kesiagaan Pasukan Pejuang Integrasi (Milisi)."

281. The document first appeared in early August 1999 and was immediately seized upon by observers as proof of TNI-militia co-operation in orchestrating violence across the territory.* UNAMET's Head of Mission asked his staff for their opinion of the document. The UN Civilian Police (Civpol) consulted with their Indonesian Police counterparts who quickly concluded, on technical grounds, that the document was a fake. The Political Affairs Office also had doubts about the authenticity of the document, but these were rooted in political, rather than technical or forensic, analysis.

282. For one thing, Political Affairs noted that several copies of the document had been delivered to UNAMET in a matter of just a few days. This was rather unusual, especially for so sensitive a document, and it made the analysts suspicious of its provenance. How and why had so many copies of such a document become so quickly available? Attention also focused on the use of the term 'Militia' (Milisi) in the document's title, a term that Indonesian authorities and pro-integration leaders alike had rejected. Why would the Commander of the Integration Fighters Force use that term?

283. Political Affairs analysts thought there were two possible answers to these questions. The first was that the document had been a psy-war fabrication designed by the pro-Indonesian side to sow fear among pro-independence supporters. The second possibility was that it had been created by the pro-independence side in order to discredit the TNI and the militias with one satisfying documentary blow, and at a critical moment in the process.

284. The content of the document contributed to suspicion. The language in the instruction presented altogether too tidy a package of outrageous threats and claims to be wholly credible. Even if at some stage João Tavares had issued some or all of the orders and promises cited in the document, it seemed very unlikely that he would have put them in writing.

285. Based on these considerations, the Political Affairs Office concluded that the 17 July Tavares document was probably not authentic. That did not mean that UNAMET considered Tavares and other militia leaders to be innocent of wrongdoing, or that it seriously doubted TNI involvement in the violence. On the contrary, it remained convinced that the TNI and the militia were working very closely together. It was simply that UNAMET did not regard the Tavares document as convincing evidence of that fact.

The Garnadi Document

286. A third document, which surfaced in Dili in mid-July1999, is most likely authentic – but like the others already discussed, it does not necessarily prove all that some observers have claimed that it does. This is the so-called Garnadi document, which many have considered the 'smoking gun,' proving both that there was a close official relationship between the government and the militia, and that the post-ballot violence was planned at the highest levels – that is, in Jakarta.

* Several copies of the document came to UNAMET at about the same time, together with a letter addressed to the Vice Secretary of the Internal Political Front (Frente Politica Interna – FPI), of the CNRT, dated 3 August 1999.

287. The report, dated 3 July 1999 and entitled "General Assessment if Option I Fails," offers a candid assessment of government strategy toward the Popular Consultation process as of early July; 'Option I' referred to the government's offer of 'Special Autonomy.' The author, Maj. Gen. (ret.) H.R. Garnadi, was Special Assistant I to the powerful Coordinating Minister for Political and Security Affairs, Lt. Gen. (ret.) Feisal Tanjung. The fact that the report had been written by an important government official and sent to a senior Minister and ex-TNI General, gave it a singular significance. Here, it seemed, might be the document proving central government and TNI complicity in the violence.

288. Analysts noted that the document spoke of the government's duty to protect and support the anti-independence militias, whom it described as "heroes of integration." The relevant passage reads as follows: "We cannot ignore the attitude of the East Timorese militias that were recruited from the pro-integration groups. They are the heroes of integration."[*] More explosively, media reports and analysts claimed that the document spoke of a central government plan to destroy Timor-Leste in the event of a pro-independence victory at the polls. The key passage stated that ". . . evacuation routes must be planned and secured, possibly by destroying facilities and other key assets."[†]

289. The fact that Timor-Leste was utterly destroyed after the ballot lent credence to claims that the Garnadi report had spelled out a 'scorched earth' plan. However, a closer examination of the document reveals that it does not actually do so. Read in context, the passage about destruction cited above provides little evidence of a scorched earth policy at this stage. In fact, Garnadi's main point in the report is that, in its confidence of victory, the government had failed to plan for the possibility of defeat, and that it had better start doing so without delay. He writes, for example:

> ". . . we have another six weeks to ensure that Special Autonomy wins. But if it fails, then six weeks is a very short time to prepare an evacuation plan for the pro-integration personnel and their property. Therefore a contingency plan in case of independence must be developed as quickly as possible. The government must allocate a budget to finance such a plan."[‡]

† Garnadi, "General Assessment if Option I Fails," paragraph 8b.

‡ Garnadi, "General Assessment of Option I Fails," paragraph 8. In paragraph 8 he also writes that "A contingency plan must be drawn up to deal with the situation in the event that Option I is rejected." On the matter of budgeting, the CNRT claimed in early August 1999 that Jakarta had set aside Rp28 million for the evacuation plan.

290. His comment that vital infrastructure might be destroyed by departing Indonesian troops in the event of the defeat of Special Autonomy is offered as one of several suggestions in the direction of developing such a contingency plan. But it is not an expression of agreed policy at that stage. Indeed, what it indicates most clearly is that, as of early July, contingency and operational planning for a pro-in-dependence victory had not really begun.

291. In short, the Garnadi document itself does not reveal the degree of official involvement in planning of violence that some have claimed that it does. At the same time, as noted elsewhere in this report, it does highlight important aspects of the relationship between Indonesian authorities and the militias, and of official attitudes toward the latter. It confirms official government support for, and solidarity with, pro-Indonesian militias, and a strong suggestion that they should be taken care of in the event of a pro-independence victory. It also makes clear that high-ranking officials in Dili and Jakarta were at least considering and discussing the destruction of Timor-Leste in the event of a defeat for the autonomy option as early as July. And it confirms that the Coordinating Minister for Political and Security Affairs, Lt. Gen. (ret.) Feisal Tanjung, was very much involved in those discussions as they developed after 3 July 1999.

The East Timor Integration Saviour Brigade Telegram

292. A fourth document that seems to suggest some degree of TNI planning is a secret telegram apparently of military provenance, dated 29 August 1999, or just one day before the ballot. The telegram is directed to a wide range of TNI officers, including the Commander of Korem 164 and the Commander of Battalion 744, with copies to the supreme militia boss, João Tavares, and to various TNI intelligence officers.

293. The telegram is signed by Sergeant Henrike Agama, Deputy Commander of the "Timor-Leste Integration Saviour Brigade Command."* It calls on all named recipients and their men to be ready to report for duty in the days immediately following the vote and the announcement of the result. The message is worth citing in detail:

> "B. In connection with the foregoing, all unit commanders are requested to authorise those of their personnel who are part of the Dili Partisan Battalion to report for duty at the Seroja Barracks in Comoro, Dili, according to the following schedule:
> 1. Monday to Thursday 14.30 to completion
> 2. Friday and Saturday 13.30 to completion
> 3. Sunday 11.00
> C. Co-ordination.
> 1. Brigade Headquarters/Headquarters of Dili Partisan Battalion I are located at the Seroja Barracks in Comoro, Dili.

* In Indonesian, the Komando Brigade Penyelamat Integrasi Timor Timur or Brigade P.I. Tims.

2. All unit commanders can carry out a crosscheck of their members' attendance via the Chief of Operations for the Integration Saviour Brigade at headquarters."*

294. This telegram would appear to indicate the existence of a special military command – the 'East Timor Integration Saviour Brigade' and of a Dili unit of that command, the 'Dili Partisan Battalion' – made up of regular soldiers seconded from normal TNI units, and commanded by TNI officers.† At a minimum, it makes clear that the headquarters of these units were located at a TNI facility, the Seroja Barracks in Comoro, Dili. In other words, these would seem to be officially-sanctioned military units, preparing for action on behalf of integration in the days immediately after the ballot.

295. A letter from the CNRT's Internal Political Front (FPI) sent to UNAMET's Political Affairs Office on 1 September, together with a copy of the telegram, provided additional information about the plans reportedly obtained from a source at the Timor-Leste military command (Korem).‡ The letter explained that the Brigade mentioned in the telegram had been recently established by the TNI – with the assistance of key civilian figures including the Bupati of Dili – to take repressive action against pro-independence figures in the event of their victory. More specifically, it said that the unit had been tasked to carry out "an operation to abduct all pro-independence activists, like the operation conducted at the time of the October 1965 coup in Indonesia." Finally, the letter reported that on 31 August, the Korem Commander had presided over the distribution of 600 weapons to militias, and that a further 800 weapons were to be distributed in the near future.

296. The fact that repressive actions were indeed taken with TNI help after the ballot results were announced on 4 September forces us to take the CNRT letter seriously. Viewed together, the 30 August telegram and the CNRT letter appear to provide some documentary evidence that the post-ballot violence and repression were indeed conducted with the full knowledge of the TNI, at least up to the Korem level, and were perhaps even orchestrated by TNI officers.

297. But once again there is a need for caution. The telegram may simply prove that the TNI – or some part of it – was preparing for the possibility of disturbances after the vote; not an unreasonable course of action under the circumstances.

* Telegram, dated 29 August 1999, signed by the Vice Commander of the East Timor Integration Saviour Brigade, Sgt. Henrike Agama. A copy of this document is in the author 's possession.

† It is also possible that these units incorporated irregular forces, including militiamen. A letter dated 23 August 1999, from Cancio Lopes da Carvalho (Commander of the Mahidi militia and of PPI Sector C) to Gen. Wiranto, Maj. Gen. Damiri, and Col. Noer Muis, proposes the formation of "Partisan Battalions" throughout East Timor (SCU Collection, Doc #222).

Operation Pull-Out

298. The same ambiguity characterises two documents that outline the TNI and Police plans for evacuation after the vote. These include a plan developed by the Timor-Leste military command (Korem) in July 1999, for 'Operation Wira Dharma-99' (Operasi Wira Dharma-99), and a Police plan developed in August, dubbed 'Operation Hanoin Lorosae II' (Operasi Hanoin Lorosae II).*

299. Both of these documents appear to have been prepared in accordance with a Kodam IX operational plan for post-ballot evacuation, known as 'Operation Pull-Out' (Operasi Cabut), and with an overall 'Contingency Plan 1999-2000' (Rencana Kontinjensi 1999-2000) developed at TNI headquarters in Jakarta.† Although we do not yet have copies of these last two documents, we do know something about them.‡ 'Operation Pull-Out' was prepared in accordance with a 5 May 1999 order from the Army Chief of Staff, Gen. Subagyo Hadisiswoyo, to the Commander of Kodam IX, Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri. In that 5 May order, Subagyo called on Damiri to develop a plan for "evacuation in the event that the Option II [independence] is chosen."§ The plan was developed in July and set in motion in early September 1999.¶ 'Contingency Plan 1999-2000' was reportedly prepared, on General Wiranto's order, by Maj.Gen. Endriartono Sutarto, the Assistant for Operations to the Armed Forces Chief of General Staff. The 13-page document outlined with considerable accuracy what actually happened in the days and weeks after the ballot.

300. The two documents we do have (in whole or in part) describe plans for a massive post-ballot evacuation that accord very closely with the evacuation that was actually carried out in September 1999. Those targeted for evacuation in the plans, for example, included about 180,000 East Timorese, and some 70,000 Indonesian civil servants,

‡ On 31 August 1999, Army Chief of Staff Gen. Subagyo Hadisiswoyo said that the TNI had prepared a contingency plan to face any possibility in East Timor. Embassy of Japan, "Political News Round Up," 31 August 1999. In January 2000 Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim further clarified that "TNI headquarters . . . prepared a contingency plan while the Udayana military commander made an operational plan." See Jakarta Post, 5 January 2000. 'Operation Pull-Out' and 'Contingency Plan 1999-2000' are both mentioned explicitly in an order (No. Sprin/811/VII/1999) issued by Brig. Gen. Simbolon, Chief of Staff of Kodam IX, on 14 July 1999 (Yayasan HAK Collection).

¶ In a secret telegram from early September, the Dandim of Dili, Lt. Col. Soedjarwo, informed the Danrem, Col. Noer Muis, that 'Operation Pull-Out' had officially commenced in Dili District at 15.00 hours on 6 September 1999 (Yayasan HAK Collection).

soldiers and police, and their respective families.* The total numbers of evacuees in both plans was about 250,000, or almost exactly the number that were in fact evacuated. The Police document also includes an intelligence assessment that predicts widespread destruction and violence in the event of a pro-independence victory.

301. At least one analyst who has examined these documents has concluded that "... the military was not planning on 'a peaceful and orderly transfer of authority ...' as the 5 May Agreement stipulated. It was secretly planning for chaos."† This is essentially true, and it is damning evidence that the Indonesian authorities were being dishonest in assuring the international community that they would stay in Timor-Leste and maintain order regardless of the outcome of the vote. It is partially confirmed, moreover, by the private and public statements of senior Indonesian officials in the weeks before the ballot. In August 1999, Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim and Col. Noer Muis both told UNAMET about official preparations for a large post-ballot evacuation. Col. Muis and Indonesia's Minister for Justice and State Secretary, Muladi, were also quoted in the press on the issue. Muladi reportedly noted the "strong possibility" of an exodus of some 223,000 people in the event of a pro-independence victory.‡

302. But the question remains whether the documents in question prove that the post-ballot violence that did transpire was planned by TNI and/or Police authorities. The honest answer is that they do not. Indeed, the documents say nothing about the 'scorched earth' policy that is often said to have guided TNI and Police actions after the vote. Evidence of such planning might exist in the still missing documents outlining Kodam IX's 'Operation Pull-Out' or in TNI headquarter's overall 'Contingency Plan 1999-2000.' But it is unlikely that even those documents contain an explicit discussion of a post-ballot scorched earth policy. Indeed, it is quite likely that there are no written plans at all, and that the search for a documentary 'smoking gun' will ultimately prove to be fruitless.

303. Nevertheless, these two documents do provide important insights into official attitudes with regard to the Popular Consultation. They offer strong evidence that Indonesian Police and military authorities formally adopted positions antipathetic to the pro-independence side, to many outside observers, to UNAMET, and also to the Catholic Church leadership.

304. The intelligence assessment contained in the Police plan 'Operation Hanoin Lorosae II' is especially revealing.§ It describes several international and domestic organisations as having "acted in a way that is offensive to the pro-integration masses and to the government of Indonesia."* The groups so described include: the United States Agency for International Development (USAID), The Australian Agency for International Development (AUSAID), the US-based Carter Center, and a number of Indonesian and East Timorese non-governmental organisations. The assessment takes a similarly hostile position toward UNAMET which it says is "on a political mission, as evidenced in its biased and discriminatory attitude" toward the pro-integration side, and its encouragement of the pro-independence side.† Finally, the document says that the majority of the population are "fanatical" Catholics, and that "the Bishop has taken advantage of that fact for his own political purposes by influencing the population to support the anti-integration group."‡

* An appendix (on logistical needs) to the TNI's 'Operation Wira Dharma-99' estimates the total number requiring evacuation at 251,187, broken down as follows: Military personnel and families (26,015), Non-Timorese (43,347), East Timorese (180,000). See: Korem 164/WD, "Operasi Wira Dharma-99, Lampiran-D (Rencana Banmin), Sub-Lampiran¬3 (Kebutuhan Angkutan)," Dili, July 1999, n.d. (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #33).

305. The TNI's 'Operation Wira Dharma-99' provides similarly revealing insights into the thinking of the military authorities. In a section called "Enemy Forces" it lists the CNRT, the DSMPTT (Dewan Solidaritas Mahasiswa dan Pelajar Timor Timur – the Student Solidarity Council of Timor-Leste) and Ojetil (Organizaçao de Juventude de Timor Leste – Organisation of East Timorese Youth) all of which were civilian pro-independence groups, and all of which were key targets of violence by pro-Indonesian forces. An introductory paragraph to that section of the operational plan clarifies that: "Enemy forces are East Timorese who are against integration with Indonesia and who reject the Special Autonomy option that has been proposed by the government of Indonesia."§

306. Thus, while these documents do not prove that the post-ballot violence was planned at the highest levels, they provide other important evidence about military and Police responsibility for that violence. For one thing, they confirm that Indonesian military and Police authorities formally adopted positions that blatantly contravened the pledges of impartiality made by the government in the 5 May Agreements. The documents also prove that hostility to the pro-independence side – to the point that even civilians were described as "enemy forces" – was a matter of policy, and was not limited to a few 'rogue elements' driven by 'emotion.' Finally, by providing details of military and Police attitudes toward particular organisations and individuals, these documents also help to explain the particular pattern of human rights violations in 1999. With such openly hostile positions articulated in key policy documents, it is easier to understand why certain groups – including the CNRT, the DSMPTT and the Catholic Church – were specifically targeted.

307. To sum up, these documents do not provide definitive proof of direct high level official involvement in planning or carrying out specific acts of violence. In fact, the analysis here suggests that the planning of violence may never have been explicitly stated in writing. Accordingly, the case for or against official responsibility for the violence must instead be established through the analysis of events observed in the field, and a more patient examination of the hundreds of documents that are now available.

308. Viewed in that light, the six documents can contribute to our understanding of the violence in several ways. First, they help to establish the existence and the nature of links between the TNI and the militias. Second, they show definitively that there was discussion at the highest levels of the TNI of contingency plans, including plans for a massive evacuation, and at least the possibility of physical destruction as part of such an evacuation. Third, they demonstrate beyond any doubt that military and Police authorities formally adopted positions hostile to the pro-independence side (and to the UN), in contravention of their obligations under the 5 May Agreements.

309. The documents reviewed in this chapter also provide an indication that the key actors responsible for military policy and planning on Timor-Leste included: Army Chief of Staff, Gen. Subagyo Hadisiswoyo; Army Vice Chief of Staff, Lt. Gen. Johny Lumintang; Coordinating Minister for Political and Security Affairs, Lt. Gen. (ret.) Feisal Tanjung; the Commander of Kodam IX, Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri; the Commander of Korem 164/Wira Dharma, Col. Tono Suratman, and the Regional Chief of Police, Col. Timbul Silaen. Although they are not specifically mentioned in the available documents, we may assume that officers responsible for operations, both at TNI headquarters and at Kodam IX, were also involved.

Militias: history, formation and legal recognition

310. The question of responsibility for human rights violations and crimes against humanity in Timor-Leste hinges critically on the nature of the links between the militias and the Indonesian authorities. If, as Indonesian officials have claimed, the militias acted without official backing or approval, then responsibility for the crimes they committed rests with the militias themselves. If, on the other hand, the militias were created by Indonesian authorities, and received support and direction from them, responsibility for the crimes they committed extends to those authorities.

311. This chapter is the first of three in this report that examines those links in detail, by drawing together extensive documentary and testimonial evidence. Focusing on three types of evidence – the historical relationship between militias and the TNI, the involvement of senior officials in forming the militias, and the granting of formal legal recognition to the militias – it demonstrates beyond reasonable doubt that the militia groups were created, supported, and authorised by Indonesian authorities. That finding, in turn, means that the Indonesian authorities in question share responsibility for human rights violations, even those that were directly perpetrated by the militias.

Historical patterns

312. Militias are not a new phenomenon in Timor-Leste. They have existed, in some form, at least since the time of Portuguese rule, and without interruption through the Japanese occupation and the Indonesian invasion. Since 1975, their history has been tightly intertwined with that of the Indonesian army, and especially its counter-insurgency force, Kopassus.

313. Militias have been a central element of Indonesian counter-insurgency and counter-intelligence strategy at least since the 1950s, and they have been mobilised in every counter-insurgency operation the Indonesian army has ever undertaken. Although justified in terms of the military doctrine of 'total peoples' defence,' the main reason they are used is that they are cheap and effective, they help to establish bonds of loyalty with occupying forces, and they provide plausible deniability for acts of violence committed by soldiers.

314. That history offers compelling evidence that the militias that emerged in Timor-Leste in 1999 were part of a carefully prepared and directed military intelligence operation. A glance at that history confirms that virtually everything about the organisation, language, style, and repertoire of the modern militias derives from well-established Indonesian military doctrine and historical practice. It also helps to explain how the militias could have sprung up as quickly as they did all across the country in 1998-99.

315. Even before the December 1975 invasion, Indonesian military planners sought to mobilise local people to gather intelligence and to assist in military operations. In September 1975, a U.S. State Department report noted bluntly that "Indonesian intelligence . . . has trained, organised and covertly committed 650 Timorese irregular troops into Portuguese Timor to stem the advance of Fretilin forces."* In the period after the invasion, Indonesian forces established local militia forces, known as 'Partisan', wherever they had established a reasonable measure of control. Remnants of these early 'Partisan' groups were still evident in certain parts of the country in 1999, and some of their members were active in the new militia groups.

316. With the start of a major new military campaign in September 1977, the Indonesian army began even more energetically to recruit local people to fight on their side. Thousands of ordinary Timorese were conscripted to join military operations against the pro-independence group Fretilin that the Indonesian authorities portrayed as communists. By the early 1980s, the use of such civilian forces had been institutionalised. Semi-permanent militia forces were now spread throughout the entire territory, a certain number in every village and town; and they were tightly controlled by Indonesian military officers and other government officials, with nominal support from District, Sub-District and Village Heads.

* U.S. Department of State, cited in James Dunn, Timor: A People Betrayed, Sydney, NSW: ABC Books, 2001, p. 193.

317. Secret army documents from 1982 provide important details of the original nature of these militia units and their role in the army's counter-insurgency strategy.* They make clear, for example, that the essential starting point for the strategy was the military doctrine of 'total peoples' defense'.† They also show that, in practice, this meant that East Timorese could expect to be called upon to fight 'the enemy' at a moment's notice. It is also notable that a number of these documents were signed by the then Chief of Military Intelligence for Timor-Leste, Maj. Willem T da Costa, who later served as Chief of Staff (1997-98), and Commander (2000-02) of Regional Military Command IX.

318. Most local conscripts and 'volunteers' were grouped into two distinct, but related, official bodies – Ratih and Hansip – and the role of each in eliminating the enemy was carefully spelled out in official documents. Both were village-based auxiliary units, designed to assist the armed forces in detecting and combating the enemy. Like the militias of 1999, they were organised along military lines, divided into Companies, Platoons, and Teams, and were 'guided' by an assortment of military figures, including the Sub-District Military Commander (Danramil), soldiers from Battalion 745, and representatives of the powerful Kopassus intelligence outfit, SGI (Satuan Tugas Intelijen, Intelligence Task Force).‡ In other words, these were virtual replicas of the militias that emerged in 1999.

319. The most basic units were the Ratih (Rakyat Terlatih – Trained Populace). Ratih recruits received rudimentary military training, with an emphasis on discipline and ideology. Although the Village Head was usually their formal commander, they were in reality controlled by military officers.§

320. One step up in the militia hierarchy were the Hansip (Pertahanan Sipil – Civil Defence). They received somewhat more intensive military training, typically carried firearms, and performed a variety of combat-related functions, including reconnaissance. Hansip was in fact further divided into two sections, one of which (Kamra) served as a police auxiliary, while the other (Wanra) served with the army. In practice, Wanra were far more important than Kamra, so that the terms Wanra and Hansip came to be used interchangeably.

321. In addition to these basic militia forces, in the late 1970s and 1980s the army also established a number of more highly trained paramilitary units, including: Makikit, Halilintar, Team Saka, Team Sera, 59/75 Junior, Team Alfa, and Railakan. These units performed important reconnaissance, intelligence and combat roles, but they also took part in special operations, including assassinations. Formally coordinated at the level of the District Military Command (Kodim), they had close ties with and often operated alongside the elite counter-insurgency force, Kopassus – and in particular its Intelligence Task Force, the SGI, and operational units known as Nanggala.*

322. The persistence of close ties between the paramilitary groups and Kopassus/TNI is confirmed by a document, dated 2 January 1998, prepared by 'SGI Post Nanggala-13.' The document is a listing of 57 members of the Saka paramilitary unit in the Baguia Sub-District of Baucau District.† Apart from indicating that Saka was, in fact, coordinated by SGI, the document also shows clearly that many Saka members were themselves members of Kopassus' Nanggala-13. In other words, as late as 1998 Saka and very likely other paramilitary units were not only supported by the TNI, they were in fact TNI units.

323. This network of militia and paramilitary organisations formed an essential bulwark in the Indonesian occupation and counter-insurgency campaign through the next two decades. The Hansip, Ratih and paramilitary infrastructure continued to function throughout this period, and provided the model for the basic repertoire of training, marching, patrolling, and combat that were common throughout the territory in 1999. Moreover, many of the militia units that seemed to appear out of nowhere in 1999 were in fact the remnants of much older militia and paramilitary outfits that had been set up starting in the late 1970s and had continued to function in the intervening years.‡ Indeed, as explained later in this chapter, in 1999 Indonesian authorities commonly referred to the militias using the old terminology.

324. Nevertheless, these were not the only models for the militias that emerged in 1999. By the 1990s, a new version of the militia forces – more like death squads than citizens' auxiliaries – began to make its presence felt in Timor-Leste. The best known manifestations of the new type were the so-called Ninja gangs, first reported abroad in 1991, but very likely in existence a year or two before that.§ These gangs roamed the streets at night, dressed in black, their heads covered with dark balaclavas, harassing, kidnapping, and sometimes killing supporters of independence, leaving their dead bodies in public places.

325. For Indonesians, and probably for East Timorese, the Ninjas evoked memories of the terrifying state-sponsored killing of some 5,000 alleged petty criminals in the mid-1980s in Indonesia, known by the acronym Petrus (penembakan misterius, or mysterious killings).[*]10 Those executions were often carried out by men in plain clothes and balaclavas, and the victims' bodies were usually left in full public view. At the time, officials denied government responsibility. Yet in 1989 President Soeharto boasted in his memoirs that the killings had been deliberate government policy – 'shock therapy' to bring crime under control. The admission suggested that there was very likely also an official military hand guiding Timor-Leste's Ninjas.

* The Nanggala were special Kopassus units, set up in the late 1970s. A unit called Nanggala 28, commanded by a young Prabowo Subianto, was responsible for killing the Fretilin commander Nicolau Lobato in December 1978

‡ The January 1998 list of Saka members cited above, for example, indicates that many of the 57 members listed had joined the unit more than a decade before. While many of the dates of entry in the document are illegible, most are from the 1980s and at least 11 are from the late 1970s (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #2). Similarly, according to a letter from Eurico Guterres to the Dili District Chief of Police, dated 22 June 1999, at least 93 members of the Aitarak militia at that time were members of the police auxiliary, Kamra. See: Komandan, Komando Pasukan Aitarak, Sektor B (Eurico Guterres) to Kapolres Dili, 22 June 1999 (SCU Collection, Doc #244).

§ Circumstantial evidence suggests that they emerged in the late 1980s, when Abílio Osório Soares, the Apodeti leader and future Governor with close links to Prabowo Subianto, was the Mayor of Dili.

326. The military also set about reactivating and recasting its militia forces in the East Timorese countryside at this time. In October 1993, an army spokesman announced that some 3,844 East Timorese men had recently been sworn in as auxiliaries. Rather than calling them Ratih and Hansip or Wanra, however, the spokesman referred to them as 'Traditional Forces' (Pasukan Adat). The decision to mobilise these auxiliaries, and the odd choice of name may have been related to the fact that Indonesia was at the time under unusual international pressure to reduce its troop presence in Timor-Leste, and also to show progress on the human rights front.

327. In 1995 a new pro-Indonesian group emerged with many of the hallmarks of the earlier Ninjas – now mixed with characteristics of the notorious politically-connected gangsters of Java (known as preman). The new group was called Gadapaksi (Garda Pemuda Penegak Integrasi, or Youth Guard for Upholding Integration).[†] Gadapaksi's assigned role appears to have been to infiltrate the underground resistance and to provoke disturbances among East Timorese. Dressed in black and armed with knives, they terrorised Dili and other towns, throwing rocks, burning houses, setting up road-blocks, abducting and occasionally killing independence activists.

328. Like the Ninjas, Gadapaksi members and leaders had links to criminal networks and to Kopassus.[‡]12 We know of Gadapaksi's historical link to Kopassus/TNI through both anecdotal and documentary evidence. Among the most telling documents is a monthly report, dated 10 November 1995, on the training of Gadapaksi recruits in Surabaya, East Java. The report is signed by a TNI officer (Capt. Handy Geniadi) and pays special attention to the intelligence training received by recruits. The report does not say explicitly that the training was coordinated by Kopassus, but that conclusion may reasonably be drawn from the fact that the sole order cited as a basis for the report is a July 1995 order issued by the Kopassus Commander.[§] Additional evidence of the link between Kopassus and Gadapaksi lies in the fact that the SGI commander in Dili from 1996-99 had previously been in charge of training Gadapaksi in Central Java and then in Surabaya.

329. Gadapaksi was still active in 1998, and continued to have the strong support of government authorities. A Gadapaksi meeting on 22 June 1998 was addressed by, among others, the Governor of Timor-Leste, the Head of the provincial legislature (DPRD) and the Bupati of Lautém. A secret military intelligence report on that meeting, submitted to the Timor-Leste military commander, Col. Suratman, on 23 June 1998, quoted the Governor as saying: "I formally declare myself to be a member of Gadapaksi."[*]

330. Gadapaksi survived until early 1999 when, almost overnight, it disappeared and the militia group Aitarak emerged in its stead. The link between the two groups was personified by the career path of one of the most notorious of Timor-Leste's militia leaders, Eurico Guterres. Between 1995 and January 1999, he was the leader of Gadapaksi.[†]15 When the militias were mobilised in early 1999, he was rewarded for his loyalty by being made commander of Aitarak, and overall commander for militia (PPI) Sector B. There is no reason to believe that the link with Kopassus/SGI was affected by the transformation of Gadapaksi into Aitarak.

331. In short, the militias that appeared to come from nowhere in 1999 were nothing new. Many had been around for years, though often under a different name. That fact helps to explain how the militias were able to organise and mobilise so swiftly in 1999. It also helps to explain their unique style and repertoire of violence. Forged during the 24 years of Indonesian rule, and shaped by Indonesian military doctrine and practice, the militias enacted much of the deliberate brutality that was central to the TNI's own institutional culture. Most importantly, the historical pattern of militia mobilisation by the TNI offers compelling evidence that the militias that became visible in 1999 were the product of a standard TNI strategy, of which the acts of violence they committed were an important part.

Militia formation

332. There is considerable evidence that the close relationship between Indonesian authorities and militias continued through 1999, and that high-ranking military officials

* See: Dandim 1627 (Lt. Col. Endar Priyanto) to Danrem 164/WD and others, "Laporan hasil pertemuan di Gada Paksi," 23 June 1998 (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #3).

† Guterres was evidently still the head of Gadapaksi until some time in January 1999, when he wrote to the Government of East Timor to request Rp7.5 million in support of Gadapaksi activities. See: Ketua DPP Gadapaksi (Eurico Guterres) to Assisten III Kessos Sekwilda Tingkat I Timor Timur, January 1999 (SCU Collection, Doc #205). After that date, Gadapaksi disappeared from sight. For a time, it was replaced by the FPTT (Forum Persatuan Timor Timur) a pro-integration organisation established on 7 December 1998, and headed by Guterres. In that capacity, in January 1999 Guterres wrote to the Head of the Finance Bureau of the Government of Timor-Leste, to request that a staff member in that bureau be seconded to the FPTT. The staff member was Inacio de Jesus Soares, who later emerged as the Deputy Commander of Aitarak. See: Ketua Umum Forum Persatuan Timor Timur (Eurico Guterres) to Kepala Biro Keuangan Pemda Tk-I Timor Timur, 5 January 1999 (SCU Collection, Doc #159); and Forum Persatuan Timor Timur (FPTT) to Danrem 164/WD, [December] 1998 (SCU Collection, Doc #233). The FPTT was apparently dissolved some time in January 1999, and replaced by Aitarak and the FPDK.

were in fact directly involved in forming and coordinating the militias in that period. The evidence comes both from the statements of former pro-integration figures, and from the secret communications of high-ranking TNI officers and civilian government officials. Given the nature and actions of the groups in question, such official involvement in forming the militias arguably constitutes incitement to commit, and therefore complicity in, serious human rights violations and crimes against humanity.

333. Some of the information about the role of high ranking TNI officers in forming the militias in late 1998 and early 1999 – and of TNI orders to commit acts of violence – has come from former government officials and pro-Indonesian East Timorese figures. In early 1999 the long-time pro-integration figure Tomás Gonçalves told Australian television how militia formation began in 1998:

> "The order came from the regional commander, [Maj.Gen.] Adam Damiri, to the Timor-Leste commander [Col. Tono Suratman] and the Special Forces commander, [Lt. Col.] Yayat Sudrajat – liquidate all the CNRT, all the pro-independence people, parents, sons, daughters and grandchildren. Commander Sudrajat promised a payment of Rp 200,000 [US$ 26.66] to anyone wanting to serve in the militia."*

334. Other sources confirm the central role of Damiri, Suratman and Sudrajat in forming the militias, but indicate that higher ranking officers – notably Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri and Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim – were also directly involved. Those sources have described a series of meetings that took place from mid-1998 to early 1999, in Dili, Denpasar, and Jakarta, at which high-ranking TNI officers formulated plans for the mobilisation of militia forces.

335. Much of the evidence of those meetings is summarised in an indictment of eight senior Indonesian officials filed by Timor-Leste's Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes in February 2003.† The passages relevant to the issue of militia formation read as follows:

> "11. In or about August 1998, Adam Rachmat DAMIRI arranged for a pro-Indonesian East Timorese leader to fly from East Timor to Denpasar, Bali, for a meeting. At this meeting, DAMIRI told the East Timorese leader to establish a group to promote integration.
> 12. In or about August 1998, DAMIRI travelled to Dili and met with TNI commanders and pro-integration East Timorese leaders. Suhartono SURATMAN was present at this meeting. DAMIRI told the group that international attention was focused on Timor-Leste and this was a problem for Indonesia. He told them that they needed to come up with a plan for creating organisations that would spread pro-Indonesian sentiment throughout Timor-Leste. He told them they must form a solid civil defence force based on previous TNI-supported models and that this force should be expanded and developed to protect integration.

13. In or about November 1998, DAMIRI travelled to Timor-Leste. During his visit he again met with pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders in Dili, including individuals who later became leaders of militia groups. DAMIRI asked the men to join together and assist TNI to fight the pro-independence group . . . During this meeting with pro-Indonesian leaders, DAMIRI praised future militia leader Eurico Guterres as being a young man eager to fight for integration and said that he was willing to give Guterres fifty million rupiah to begin his work.

14. In or about November 1998, SURATMAN met with pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders at his headquarters in Dili. Yayat SUDRAJAT was present at this meeting. SURATMAN told the group that he wanted future militia leader Eurico Guterres to form a new organisation to defend integration similar to the pro-Indonesian youth organisation Gadapaksi.

15. In early 1999, Zacky Anwar MAKARIM received the founding members of the pro-Indonesian East Timor People's Front [Barisan Rakyat Timor Timur – BRTT] at his office in Jakarta. During the meeting he said that guerrilla warfare would be necessary to overcome independence supporters if the autonomy option lost at the ballot.

16. In or about February 1999, DAMIRI met with pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders at Regional Military Command IX headquarters in Denpasar, Bali. DAMIRI told the men that TNI was ready to give secret support to pro-Indonesian forces. He explained that it must be secret in order to avoid international scrutiny and criticism. DAMIRI asked the men to gather East Timorese who had served in TNI. He told them that they should meet with SURATMAN for further instructions.

17. In or about February 1999, SURATMAN met with a pro-Indonesian East Timorese leader in Dili. He told him that because TNI was under a reformist regime, it could not take part in open operations against the independence movement. SURATMAN asked the pro-Indonesian leader to form a militia group. SURATMAN said that TNI was willing to provide any form of assistance required by the militia groups.

18. In or about February 1999, SUDRAJAT met with TNI personnel and pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders at Intelligence Task Force headquarters in Dili. SUDRAJAT told the group that the Intelligence Task Force had a list of independence supporters that were to be killed. He stated that the Intelligence Task Force and the pro-Indonesian groups would cooperate to carry out these killings. He said that KOPASSUS dressed as thugs would start to carry out murders of pro-independence supporters.

19. In or about March 1999, Kiki SYAHNAKRI met with pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders at TNI headquarters in Jakarta. SYAHNAKRI told the group that TNI would support their pro-Indonesian efforts and that MAKARIM was responsible for coordinating activities leading up to the popular consultation. SYAHNAKRI told them that firearms had been sent to Timor-Leste, and that when the men returned to Dili they should contact SURATMAN to arrange distribution of the firearms."

336. Additional evidence of high-level support for the militias comes from a number of secret documents and radio communications that have come to light since 1999. In the secret Garnadi report dated 3 July 1999, discussed in Chapter 5, a senior official of the Coordinating Ministry of Political and Security Affairs referred to Timor-Leste's militias as "heroes of integration" whose opinions would have to be taken into account in any post-ballot contingency planning.* Likewise, in a secret letter to President Habibie, dated 6 September 1999, the Armed Forces Commander, Gen. Wiranto, explained that TNI forces had found it difficult to control the violence in the post-ballot period because of the "emotional bonds between the security forces and the pro-integration side."†

337. These remarks by senior officials reflected a widely shared sympathy for the militias within the highest official circles, though they stopped short of confirming a direct TNI role in mobilising and coordinating militia activity. Evidence to that effect, however, has reportedly been uncovered in a series of secret radio and telephone communications intercepted by the Australian Defence Signals Directorate (DSD) in 1999. The full transcripts of those intercepts have not yet been made public, but excerpts reported in the media appear to confirm the allegations made in the February 2003 indictment. They also add specificity and detail concerning the nature of official backing for the militias, and the identity of those involved.

* The author of the report, H.R. Garnadi, a retired Major General, was writing in his official capacity as Assistant to the Minister, Lt. Gen. (ret.) Feisal Tanjung, with responsibility for Internal Politics (Pol/Dagri) and as a member of the joint ministerial body on Timor-Leste (the P4-OKTT) over which Tanjung presided. See: Garnadi, "Gambaran umum apabila Opsi I gagal," 3 July 1999 (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #35).

† Letter from Gen. Wiranto to President Habibie (No. R/511/P-01/03/14/Set) concerning "Perkembangan lanjut situasi Timtim dan saran kebijaksanaan penangananannya," 6 September 1999 (HRU Collection, Doc. TNI #7). Expressing a similar view, in October 2000, Maj.Gen. Endriartono Sutarto (Assistant for Operations to the Armed Forces Chief of General Staff in 1999) said: "It is the psychology of our soldiers, because for so long they've had links to work together (with the militias) to secure East Timor as part of Indonesia." Channel News Asia (Singapore), 12 October 2000.

338. For example, a telephone conversation between the Danrem, Col. Tono Suratman, and Eurico Guterres, reportedly intercepted on 5 May 1999 appears to confirm Suratman's direct involvement in militia operations. In that phone call, Suratman asked Guterres where he was massing his militia forces for a show of force in Dili. Guterres reportedly responded that he had some 400 militiamen gathered outside a Dili hotel (the Tropical) which served as Aitarak's headquarters.

339. About one month later, on 1 June 1999, Australia's DSD allegedly intercepted another phone call between the two men. Evidently concerned to conceal his direct involvement with the militias, Col. Suratman is said to have told Guterres "Don't deal with me directly. Contact me via Bambang."* The Bambang to whom Suratman referred was also a senior TNI officer in Timor-Leste, the head of military intelligence at the Korem, Maj. R.M. Bambang Wisnumurty. Along with another intelligence officer, Lt. Masbuku, Maj. Bambang became one key point of contact between the TNI and the militias.

340. Another, more senior, TNI officer who evidently maintained close ties with the militias was Brig. Gen. Mahidin Simbolon, in 1999 Chief of Staff of Kodam IX. A former Timor-Leste military commander (1995-1997), he had long been suspected of involvement in establishing and running militia groups in Timor-Leste. His tie to the militias was apparently confirmed by a 14 February 1999 telephone conversation intercepted by the DSD. The conversation was between militia leader Eurico Guterres and an officer of the Kopassus unit, Satgas Tribuana VIII. Speaking about a Mahidi militia member who had been injured, the Kopassus officer reportedly said: "We know that Brig. Gen. Simbolon is concerned that one of his crew was injured."†

341. Simbolon is reputed to have had especially close ties to Cancio Lopes de Carvalho, the commander of the Ainaro-based Mahidi militia, and overall commander of Sector C of the PPI. Indeed, by some accounts the name of his militia group, Mahidi, was a tribute to the general, Mahidin Simbolon. That special link may help to explain Cancio Carvalho's emergence as one of the most powerful militia leaders in the country, and the peculiarly aggressive character of his militia group.‡

342. The officer most widely suspected as the chief militia coordinator in Timor-Leste – and named in the February 2003 indictment of Gen. Wiranto et al. – was Maj.Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim. Makarim's career history made him an ideal candidate for that position, and his appointment as the senior military member of the government's Task Force in Timor-Leste immediately raised eyebrows among both local and international observers. Until January 1999, he had been head of the Indonesian military intelligence agency, BIA, a body with years of experience in mounting counter-intelligence operations in situations of just this sort.

* Sydney Morning Herald, "Silence over crime against humanity," 14 March 2002.

† Sydney Morning Herald, "Silence over crime against humanity," 14 March 2002.

‡ It is also noteworthy that violent militia groups appeared in West Papua at about the time Mahidin Simbolon, by then a Major General, was appointed Regional Military Commander there.

343. Just as important, in the early 1990s Makarim had served as an intelligence officer in Aceh, in the context of a major counter-insurgency campaign in which thousands of people had been killed. One of the hallmarks of that campaign, though it was little known at the time, was the mobilisation of local militia groups, and their deployment in crushing the armed opposition movement, Aceh Merdeka, now better known as GAM (Gerakan Aceh Merdeka).* Maj. Gen. Makarim was widely believed to have been responsible for that operation, so his arrival in Timor-Leste gave rise to concern that a similar strategy would be adopted there.

344. Makarim's role as militia boss has not been, and may never be, confirmed. DSD intercepts from early September 1999, however, appear to confirm allegations that he served as a coordinator of the pro-autonomy campaign, of which the militia groups were only one part. Those intercepts, as reported, reveal Makarim contacting several of the key military and political players both in Dili and in Jakarta, and discussing with them the outcome of the vote, and post-ballot plans. Among those with whom he is said to have spoken frequently in the days immediately after the vote were the Coordinating Minister for Political and Security Affairs, Lt. Gen. (ret.) Feisal Tanjung, and two other retired Generals who were cabinet ministers at the time, Lt. Gen. Hendropriyono, and Maj.Gen. Yunus Yosfiah. All three of these men were old Timor-Leste hands, with backgrounds in military intelligence or Kopassus, or both.

345. In Dili, Makarim reportedly spoke with Brig. Gen. Glenny Kairupan, another Army officer with Timor-Leste experience, and the pro-autonomy leader Basilio Araújo among others. Those conversations, as they have been reported, revealed a preoccupation with the outcome of the vote and the potential defection of key militia leaders. In a conversation with Basilio Araújo, on 4 September 1999 Makarim apparently threatened to have militia leader Eurico Guterres killed if he switched sides at the eleventh hour. After asking Araújo to keep an eye on Guterres, Makarim is reported to have said: "I'll take care of him if he goes over to the other side."†

346. In short, the available evidence lends strong support to the general allegations made in the February 2003 indictment of Wiranto et al. that:

> "During the period leading up to the popular consultation, Indonesian officials established and strengthened civilian groups to campaign for the autonomy option . . . [and that] such groups were established and maintained by the active conduct of officials within the Armed Forces of Indonesia . . . and the civilian government."‡

Political and legal recognition

347. The militias were effectively given formal political and legal status by the Indonesian authorities. The granting of such recognition brought with it certain practical advantages for the militias, and it gave them access to inner circles of power. More importantly, it meant that Indonesian authorities bear legal and political responsibility for their actions, including violations of human rights and crimes against humanity.

348. Military, police, and civilian authorities initially made no secret of their support for the pro-autonomy groups, and for the militias. Starting in late 1998, and with increasing frequency in early 1999, TNI, Police, and civilian officials took part in numerous ceremonies marking the formation of militia groups, or spurring those already formed to take action against pro-independence forces.* Those documented included inaugural ceremonies in Cassa (12 December 1998), Same (11 March 1999), Viqueque (11 March 1999), Dili (17 April 1999), Maliana (April 1999), Suai (mid-April, 1999), Oecussi (1 May 1999), Manatuto (8 May 1999), Lolotoe (10 May 1999), Laclubar (18 May 1999) and Gleno (April or May 1999). Without exception, the respective Dandim, Kapolres and Bupati were present at all of these ceremonies. In some cases, the ceremonies were attended by higher ranking authorities, including the Timor-Leste military commander, Col. Tono Suratman.†

349. One of the clearest examples of such public support came on 17 April 1999, when key officials – including the Governor of Timor-Leste, the Bupati of Dili, Col. Tono Suratman, and Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri‡ – gathered in front of the Governor's office for a large pro-autonomy rally, attended by hundreds of militiamen from all over the territory.§ According to various accounts of the rally, the militia leader, Eurico Guterres, urged those present to "conduct a cleansing of all those who have betrayed integration. Capture and kill them if you need to."¶ Later that afternoon, an estimated 1,645 militias went on a rampage through Dili, firing their weapons and attacking the home of a prominent pro-independence leader, Manuel Carrascalão, and killing at least 12 people. (See Case Study: Carrascalão House Massacre, par. 803).

350. No official voices were raised in protest against Guterres' inflammatory remarks, and no serious effort was made to prevent the militia violence. On the contrary, powerful

* As UNAMET's head of mission, Ian Martin, has written: ". . . there was no concealment of the degree of official approval of their existence: military, police, and civilian officials attended inaugural and other functions throughout the territory." † The ceremony in Manatuto – led by the Bupati and attended by an estimated 5,000 people – was attended by the Danrem, Col. Tono Suratman. See Kodim 1631/Manatuto, Secret Daily Situation Report, 12 May 1999 (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #23).

‡ According to unconfirmed accounts, Maj.Gen. Adam Damiri and Maj.Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim were also in attendance.

§ A TNI intelligence report on the 17 April ceremony estimated that there were 1,645 militia members present. According to the report, the groups in attendance included: Aitarak (760), BMP (400), Laksaur (750), Mahidi (75), Ahi (80), Naga Merah (75), Morok (80), Alpha (50), and Saka (50). officials studiously avoided taking action, and in so doing effectively facilitated and condoned the violence. Among those who failed to act was the Timor-Leste military commander, Col. Tono Suratman. As the militia rampage began, Manuel Carrascalão came to his office pleading for him to intervene. According to the Irish Foreign Minister, David Andrews, who was there, Colonel Suratman was dismissive, and did nothing.*

351. In addition to such de facto political recognition, the Indonesian authorities also conferred formal legal status on the militias. In the first few months of 1999, officials characterised the militia groups as Wanra, Hansip and Ratih and sometimes Surwan (abbreviation of Sukarelawan or Volunteers) – that is, as the officially sanctioned citizen's auxiliaries that had been in existence for many years. This was not a mere public relations exercise; the same terminology was used in secret TNI reports and memoranda. In a letter of March 1999, for example, a Kopassus officer in Baucau described the militia groups Saka, Sera, and Alfa as 'Ratih.'† The significance of this designation was that it confirmed that militia groups had been granted legal standing by the Indonesian authorities.

352. Such legal standing implied a privileged relationship with official bodies, notably TNI and Kopassus units. The nature of that special relationship is suggested by various documents from 1999. In a letter of March 1999, for example, a Kopassus officer requested the Baucau office of health services to make medicines available to some 600 Ratih members and their families. There was no immediate medical rationale for the request. Rather, the explicit intention was to reward them for supporting TNI operations, and to improve their morale.‡

353. Even the Armed Forces Commander, Gen. Wiranto, evidently regarded the militia groups as an acceptable, and lawful, component of military strategy. In a contingency plan cited by the Indonesian Commission on Human Rights Violations in Timor-Leste, Wiranto described the militias as follows:

> "The armed force is about 1,100 people with 546 weapons of various kinds, including assembled [home-made?] weapons; they are joined in pro-integration organisations. The mass of militant supporters is 11,950 people joined in opposition organisations like Besi Merah Putih, Aitarak, Mahidi, Laksaur Merah Putih, Sakunar, AHI, Jati Merah Putih, Darah Integrasi, Dadarus Merah Putih, Guntur Kailak, Halilintar, Junior, Team Pancasila, Mahadomi, ABLAI and Naga Merah."§

354. Notwithstanding their view that such groups were legitimate, with the prospect of increased international scrutiny, Indonesian authorities made an effort to garb the new militia groups in a veneer of civilian legality. Starting in April 1999, key militia groups were formally designated as voluntary civil security organisations, or Pam Swakarsa. That term had been used to legitimise the gangs of youths mobilised to provide 'security' in other parts of Indonesia in preceding years. In discussions with UNAMET, and in public statements, government officials insisted that the groups in Timor-Leste were not militias but Pam Swakarsa, and that their activities were entirely within the law.

355. The formal status of the militias as Pam Swakarsa is confirmed by two documents. The first is an order from the Governor, Abílio Osório Soares, and the Timor-Leste Commander, Col. Tono Suratman, dated 23 April 1999 calling for the creation of Pam Swakarsa throughout the territory.* The second is an instruction from the District government of Dili, also from April 1999, formally incorporating the Aitarak militia as integral elements of Pam Swakarsa, and listing a range of civilian and military officials as its leaders.†

356. Even after the call to create Pam Swakarsa across the territory, TNI and other officials continued to portray the militias as part of the long-established civil defence apparatus; that is as Wanra, Hansip and Ratih. In a report of 5 August 1999 UNAMET MLOs in the District of Viqueque noted that TNI training with militias "is explained away as legitimate Wanra activity or as civic action on the part of TNI. . . Similar to the PAM-Swakarsaisation of militias in Dili we have seen the militias associate with TNI under the guise of Wanra and Hansips."‡

357. Given the historical connection between these civilian auxiliaries and the new militias, this claim was perhaps somewhat closer to the truth. At the same time, it concealed the fact that, by June 1999, the militias had been formally organised into a single military-type structure, with the explicitly military name of the 'Integration Fighters Force' (Pasukan Pejuang Integrasi – PPI), and were subject to commands and instructions from the leaders of that organisation. That structure, formally acknowledged by Indonesian authorities, adds weight to the claim that the militia groups were officially organised, not spontaneous, and that their actions – including acts of violence – were coordinated.

358. The official status of the militias, and their close relationship to the TNI, is further confirmed by a secret report, dated 21 June 1999, from the Kodim Dili to the Korem. The report is a response to a request from the head of military intelligence for Timor-Leste for clarification on a number of human rights violations reported by the local NGO, Yayasan HAK. By way of checking into these reports, Kodim Dili ran the list past Aitarak, whose members were the principal perpetrators named in the complaint. Not surprisingly, Aitarak's leadership declared that there was no truth to any of the allegations. It was revealing that that claim was accepted without further examination and was conveyed to the Korem as a Kodim finding.*

359. Militia leaders were also granted quasi-official status within state bodies responsible for security and political affairs. Militia leaders were routinely invited to meetings and briefings with TNI, Police and civilian authorities. Some of these meetings were secret affairs, but many were a matter of public record. When asked about such meetings, government and military officials sometimes claimed that they were intended to urge the militias to desist from unlawful activities. However, participants and witnesses consistently reported to UNAMET that a common purpose of the meetings was to convey strategic and tactical plans for deliberate acts of violence – including house burning, beating, and killing – against supporters of independence.

360. In addition to countless low-level meetings, there were numerous meetings in 1999 between high-ranking military officers and militia leaders. In March 1999, for example, Maj. Gen. Damiri reportedly addressed a gathering of pro-autonomy and militia leaders at a luxury hotel in Bali, telling them that Indonesia was "behind them 100% and would never abandon them."† At Korem headquarters on 18 June, Maj.Gen. Kiki Syahnakri, Maj.Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim, Brig.Gen. Glenny Khairupan, Col. Tono Suratman, and several militia leaders reportedly met to discuss detailed contingency plans to influence the vote, and to cause mayhem in the event of a pro-independence victory.‡ A further high-level meeting is said to have taken place in Dili in the immediate aftermath of the vote. Attended by Maj.Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim, Maj.Gen. Sjafrie Sjamsuddin, and several other senior TNI officers, the meeting reportedly discussed plans to destroy vital infrastructure, and to kill key pro-independence leaders, in the event that the ballot result favoured independence.§

361. It should be noted that meetings among key military, police, and civilian authorities were not unique to Timor-Leste. Together, these authorities comprised an institution responsible for security issues that existed at each level of the Indonesian administrative hierarchy. Known as the Muspida at the district level, and by different names at lower levels of the administrative structure, these bodies met on a regular basis, in Timor-Leste and in Indonesia itself. What was unusual about the situation in Timor-Leste in 1999, was that militia leaders were invited to take part in such discussions. In effect, notwithstanding their responsibility for serious human rights violations, the militias were incorporated into the formal decision-making apparatus of the Indonesian state.

362. The official status of the militias, abundantly evident from their participation in such meetings, is further confirmed by a substantial number of official documents that are jointly signed by Indonesian authorities and militia commanders. These include, for example, an order co-signed by a Sub-District Military Commander (Danramil) and a Sub-District militia commander instructing another militia leader and his men to attend a meeting at a designated place and time.* They also include scores of 'travel permits' (surat izin jalan) co-signed by the militia commander Eurico Guterres and various military, police and civilian officials in early September 1999.† Among the most remarkable of these 'travel permits' is one co-signed by Guterres and the Chief of Staff for Kodim Dili, Capt. Manafe.‡ The document is remarkable because it grants travel permission to Capt. Manafe himself, and to his family. In other words, in September 1999, even the Kodim Chief of Staff needed and evidently accepted the legal authority of a militia commander in matters of security.

363. In short, the evidence presented in this chapter offers strong support for the conclusion that the militias were not independent bodies acting outside the purview of the Indonesian state, but were in fact created, supported and directed by Indonesian authorities. It demonstrates, moreover, that support for the militias was not provided simply by a handful of 'rogue elements' in the TNI, but constituted official policy, and had the backing of some of the highest ranking and most powerful officials in the country. These conclusions are based on three main findings.

364. First, the militias that wreaked havoc in 1999 were not new. On the contrary, they were the continuation of a well-established military and political strategy that had been employed by the Indonesian army in Timor-Leste since the invasion in 1975. In fact, some of the militia forces active in 1999 had been mobilised by Indonesian forces at the time of the invasion, while others had been set up by Army officers in the 1980s and 1990s. Throughout the 24-year occupation of Timor-Leste, such groups were trained, supplied and directed by the Indonesian Army, and used tactics virtually identical to those seen in 1999. This historical pattern provides powerful grounds to doubt the Indonesian claim that the militias emerged spontaneously and acted independently in 1999.

365. Second, high ranking military officers, in Dili, Denpasar, and Jakarta, were actively involved in forming the new militia groups, and in coordinating their activities, from mid-1998 through 1999. The evidence of continued official involvement comes from the testimony of former pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders, and from the secret communications between Indonesian civilian and military officials in 1998 and 1999. This evidence points the finger at particular high-ranking officials, including: Gen. Wiranto, Lt. Gen. (ret.) Feisal Tanjung, Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim, Maj. Gen. Damiri, Col. Tono Suratman, and Maj. Bambang Wisnumurty.

* The order (No. 02/HMP/Kec.BB/VII/1999), dated July 30, 1999, is signed by the Danramil for Bobonaro, Sgt. Poniran, and the Commander of the Hametin Merah Putih militia in Bobonaro, Alberto Leite (HRU Collection, Doc. BOB #10).

366. Finally, there is unequivocal evidence that the militias were granted formal political and legal standing by Indonesian government and military authorities. Public statements in support of the militias, made by numerous officials, constituted expressions of formal state recognition and support for those groups. They may also be viewed as having encouraged, and even incited, militia groups to commit grave human rights violations. On those grounds, the case can be made that the militias were a formal arm of the Indonesian political and security apparatus, and that their actions were thereby the direct responsibility of Indonesian authorities. The militia's legal standing, moreover, was not merely theoretical, but was confirmed by the routine inclusion of militia leaders in the security and political deliberations and decisions of Indonesian officials at all levels. Thus, both in law and in practice, the militias acted with the full sanction of Indonesian authorities.

Militias: recruitment, training, operations and weapons

367. The link between the militias and the TNI and other Indonesian officials is also clearly evident in the patterns of militia recruitment, training, operations, and access to weapons. Such patterns are significant because they demonstrate that the militias were not independent entities beyond official control, as Indonesian authorities have claimed, but rather existed and acted in accordance with TNI guidance and procedures. Moreover, they clearly implicate the TNI, including several high-ranking Army officers, in the commission of serious human rights violations by the militias.

Recruitment and membership

368. Direct TNI involvement with the militias is revealed in the patterns of militia recruitment and membership in 1999. TNI soldiers and officers were directly and indirectly involved in the recruitment of militiamen, sometimes under duress. Equally important, TNI soldiers and officers served as militia leaders and falsely posed as militiamen, rendering the distinction between the TNI and the militias virtually meaningless.

369. Militia members were a varied group, and became involved for many different reasons. Some joined a militia group more or less willingly. They included men who had fought on the Indonesian side at some stage since 1975, who had relatives who had been killed by the pro-independence party, Fretilin, or who had done relatively well under Indonesian rule. Others were recruited directly from criminal gangs involved in gambling rings, protection rackets and so on, or they were seduced by the possibility of wielding a gun and exercising raw power over others.

370. A considerable number, however, joined under duress as part of the systematic official recruitment effort set in motion in early 1999 in the context of the pro-autonomy 'socialisation' campaign. In each district a target was established by government and military authorities for the number of militiamen to be recruited. Typically, the target was about ten men per village. It was the responsibility of the respective Village Heads and Sub-District Heads to ensure that the target was met but, in keeping with the historical pattern described in Chapter 6, TNI officers were invariably involved.

371. Speaking to journalists in early 1999, the Korem Chief of Staff, Lt. Col. Supardi, said that the military had already recruited roughly 1,200 militiamen, and that recruitment was scheduled to continue until March.* The former pro-Indonesian figure, Tomás Gonçalves, has alleged that officers of the Kopassus unit Satgas Tribuana played an especially important role in recruitment efforts. Speaking in early 1999, he said:

> "It's these people who are recruiting the militias – they force them. If they don't, they are picked up at night and killed. [Those who join] are given military training, arms, and indoctrinated."†

372. Although it was not the case that all those who refused to join were killed, coercion and threats were common elements of the recruitment effort. At public meetings and in house-to-house campaigns conducted in early 1999, members of existing militias and TNI soldiers pressured men to join. Those who refused or resisted, for whatever reasons, were typically accused of harbouring pro-independence sentiments, and were subjected to reprisals. Many had their homes burned and their families threatened, and some were killed. Where Village Heads or Sub-District Heads were themselves unenthusiastic about forming militia groups, they were subjected to threats and reprisals by militia groups, and TNI soldiers, from neighbouring communities.

373. As one former militiaman testified: "They called us, took our names and said, 'you've got to join this group.' We said, 'what are we joining it for?' They said, 'If you refuse to join, you'll see what happens.' So we were scared and we joined."‡ Similarly, the wife of a man who had fled his village after refusing to join the militias testified that: "They came to our village and destroyed everything. They killed our chickens, they took what they could carry and sold it. And they said, if [they couldn't] find [my] husband they would come back and beat me and my children to death."§

374. In addition to those who were recruited under duress, and those who joined willingly, there were some 'militiamen' who were evidently not East Timorese civilians at all, but Indonesian army soldiers dressed up as local militias. Particularly in the pre-UNAMET and post-ballot periods, there were frequent reports that the militiamen were in fact TNI soldiers in civilian clothing. Drawing on the testimony of rape survivors from 1999, the UN Special Rapporteurs reported in late 1999 that:

> "... on many occasions no distinction could be made between members of the militia and members of the TNI, as often they were one and the same person in different uniforms."*

375. Film footage, shot in 1999, which shows a TNI soldier changing into militia 'costume' and donning a long-haired 'militia' wig, lends support to allegations that at least some of the militia were not what they appeared.

376. In some cases, Indonesian authorities acknowledged that militia members were, in fact, TNI officers. In August 1999, UNAMET officials wrote to Task Force chief, Agus Tarmidzi and to Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim, to complain about the involvement of TNI officers in militia activities. Among the TNI officers they mentioned by name were Sgt. Domingos dos Santos and Sgt. Julião Gomes, both attached to the Kodim in Bobonaro.† In reply, Makarim acknowledged that the two men were indeed TNI officers and members of the DMP militia. In an apparent effort to deflect UNAMET criticism, he claimed, incorrectly, that the two officers had been confined to barracks.‡

377. A number of military and government documents from late 1998 and 1999 confirm that there was considerable overlap in the TNI and militia membership, and that some militia members were in fact enlisted TNI soldiers. For example, a document from late 1998, listing 49 members of the Viqueque-based militia group Makikit, indicates that six of those listed were actually soldiers from TNI Infantry Battalion 328.§8 A letter from militia leader Eurico Guterres to the Dandim of Dili suggests that it was a routine matter for TNI officers to be deployed within militia units. The letter, dated 22 June 1999, requests the Dandim of Dili to permit a TNI intelligence officer (1st Sgt. Elizario da Cruz P.) to serve with Aitarak for an indefinite period.¶

378. Another document confirms these patterns, and also reveals that some 'militia' groups were, in fact, formally constituted special TNI units. An official list of 91 members of the militia group Saka (also known as Pusaka), dated 3 February 1999, shows that all were TNI soldiers, with military ranks and serial numbers, and that the unit was officially designated as a 'special company' of Kodim 1638/Baucau. In other words, Saka was not a volunteer civilian force at all, but a special TNI unit. The same document shows, moreover, that the commander of the company, Joanico Cesario Belo – who was also Commander of PPI Sector A – was in fact a Kopassus officer, with the rank of 1st Sergeant.

379. Finally, several internal documents of the Aitarak militia clearly show that TNI personnel were members of the militia, and that they were paid as such. One such document, prepared by the Aitarak treasurer and dated 24 August 1999, is a summary of wages paid out to the group's members. Among those paid were 96 persons who were either TNI members or government civil servants.[*]

380. The direct involvement of TNI forces and officers in the forcible recruitment of militiamen in 1999, and the significant and formally sanctioned overlap between militia and TNI memberships, leaves little room for doubt about the TNI-militia link. It also underlines the case that the TNI leadership bears responsibility for human rights violations committed by militia forces.

Training

381. Notwithstanding strenuous official denials, there is no doubt that the TNI provided training to the militias on a regular basis.[†] Like the evidence of forced recruitment and overlapping membership with the militias, the evidence of training clearly implicates the TNI in militia violence.

382. In a rare instance of official candour, in early January 1999 the Korem Chief of Staff, Lt. Col. Supadi, reportedly told journalists that the military had indeed given new militias two-week training courses.[‡] His admission of a TNI role was confirmed by numerous reports by contemporary observers, and by substantial testimonial evidence gathered since 1999. The pivotal role of the TNI in militia training, however, is most convincingly demonstrated by the documentary record.

383. Four documents are especially revealing. The first is a secret telegram from the Danrem, Col. Tono Suratman, dated 13 April 1999, which orders all Dandim to exercise greater care and discipline in training Ratih (i.e. militia) units in their districts. In doing so, it confirms that the training of militia groups was routine, and that it was subject to the oversight and control of one of the highest-ranking military officers in the territory, Col. Suratman. In the relevant passages of the 13 April telegram, Suratman orders all Dandim to:

> "Carry out security precautions and activities in the context of each Ratih training session to ensure that such activities proceed smoothly;" and "Insist upon strict order and discipline in order to prevent any losses, physical or non-physical, inside and outside the training unit."[§]

§ Danrem 164/WD to Dandim 1627-1639 and others. Secret Telegram No. STR/44/1999, 13 April 1999 (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #10).

384. Significantly, the Danrem's telegram is based on an order from the Regional Military Commander, Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri (No. STR/90/1999, undated), confirming that such training was done with his knowledge, and under his orders. Moreover, the Danrem's telegram of 13 April 1999 cites for authority a 1996 order of the Army Chief of Staff concerning the appropriate procedures for recruiting and training Ratih. In so doing, the telegram confirms that the militia training in 1999 was regulated by well-established rules and procedures issued at the very highest levels of the TNI. The relevant passages of the Danrem's telegram orders all Dandim to:

> "Stress the preparation of a Security Plan when putting together any Ratih Training Plan, in accordance with Army Chief of Staff directive No. ST/1156/96 of 26 November 1996;" and "Pay due attention to the stipulated requirements for all auxiliaries who are used to ensure that they are consistent with existing requirements/regulations and procedures."*

385. The second document relevant to the issue of training is a secret telegram, dated 16 April 1999, from the Dandim of Dili to all Danramil under his command. Referring to the Danrem's telegram of 13 April 1999, his telegram reminds all Danramil of the existing "regulations and procedures" governing the training of Ratih. In this way, it provides additional confirmation that the training of militias was a routine TNI task, conducted throughout the territory at least down to the Koramil level, in accordance with established regulations and procedures.†

386. The third document of importance is a secret TNI intelligence report from Kodim Liquiçá, dated 18 April 1999. It reports, among other things, on a visit to the towns of Liquiçá and Maubara by the Danrem, Col. Tono Suratman in mid-April. The document confirms not only that the TNI was actively involved in training the BMP militia at that time, but also that Col. Suratman played a direct role in it. The relevant passage of the report reads:

> "On 16 April 1999 at 1400 hours, the Dan Rem 164/WD and his entourage arrived at the Kodim headquarters in Liquiçá. Later he visited Koramil 1638/Maubara in order to offer words of guidance to some 500 BMP members there...."‡

387. It is noteworthy that this address by Suratman to the BMP in Maubara occurred only two weeks after these very militias spearheaded the violent assault on the church in Liquiçá in which dozens of people were killed. It is also worth stressing that Col. Suratman addressed the militiamen while they were gathered at an official TNI post, the Koramil headquarters in Maubara.§

§ It may also be significant that Suratman's visit took place exactly one day before a team from the Army Inspector General's office came to the district to investigate the Liquiçá Church massacre.

388. The fourth document is a daily situation report, dated 20 May 1999, from Kodim 1631/Manatuto to the Korem head of intelligence, Maj. Bambang Wisnumurty, copied to the Commander of Satgas Tribuana.* Among other things, the report states explicitly that, on 17 May 1999 two senior TNI officers had given "guidance" to militiamen at the Morok militia base in Manatuto. The two officers in question were the Commander of Sector A, Col. Sunarko, and the Commander of "Sub-Sector Manatuto," who was not identified by name.† Thus, in addition to confirming that the TNI was involved in training militias, this report points clearly to the role of high-ranking Sectoral commanders in that effort.‡ It also shows that senior intelligence and Kopassus officers, notably Maj. Bambang Wisnumurty at the Korem and the Commander of Satgas Tribuana, Lt. Col. Yayat Sudrajat, were fully aware of the situation.

389. Taken together, these documents confirm abundant testimonial evidence that the training of militias was a standard element of TNI activity in Timor-Leste in 1999. They also show that the training was governed by a set of well-established rules and procedures, and in accordance with orders issued by officers at the highest levels of the military hierarchy, including the Danrem, Col. Tono Suratman, the Pangdam IX, Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri, and the Army Chief-of-Staff.

Operations

390. There is also substantial evidence, both testimonial and documentary, that militia groups received direct operational support from the TNI in 1999. Operational support took a variety of forms. In some cases, especially in the pre-UNAMET and post-ballot periods, TNI soldiers were deployed alongside militias in operations that resulted in serious human rights violations. In other cases, most commonly during the UNAMET period, militias were allowed to use TNI bases and posts as staging areas for their operations.

391. Joint TNI-militia operations had two distinctive features. First, TNI soldiers typically took up positions behind militia forces, firing their weapons only when their militia proxies were in danger. Second, in the case of killings, TNI officers and soldiers generally took the lead in organising the disposal of bodies.

392. One of the clearest examples of this pattern was the 6 April massacre in the church at Liquiçá. In that case, hundreds of BMP and Aitarak militiamen attacked a group of

† This may have been Lt. Col. Nyus Rahasia, a Kopassus officer who was reportedly in Manatuto from mid-May to mid-June coordinating military-style training for the militias there. (See District Summary: Manatuto).

‡ Other documents confirm the role of the Sectoral commands in training the militias. They include an order, dated 27 April 1999, from the Danrem, Col. Tono Suratman, to the Commanders of Sector A and Sector B, instructing them temporarily to cease regular morning drills of pro-integration forces (i.e. militias). people who had taken refuge in a church compound in Liquiçá, killing dozens. Present throughout the attack were well-armed TNI, Police, and Mobile Brigade (Brimob) troops. Not only did those troops do nothing to prevent the attack, or to stop it once it was underway, by most accounts they helped to carry it out. A BMP member involved in the attack later told UNAMET that the dead bodies had been taken away in at least five military trucks. Notably, a secret Police report on the incident noted that the close ties between the TNI and the militias had been an obstacle to Police investigations[*] (See Case Study: Liquiçá Church Massacre, par. 768).

393. With the deployment of UNAMET in June 1999, and the arrival of hundreds of journalists and observers, the TNI made an effort to avoid being seen with militias.[†] The shift in tactics led to a decline in reports of joint TNI-militia operations after early June and, probably not by coincidence, to a decline in the absolute levels of human rights violations in Timor-Leste.

394. Nevertheless, joint TNI-militia operations did continue. For example:

- In mid-June 1999, UNAMET officials directly witnessed TNI and militia forces forcibly displacing the population of certain villages in Liquiçá, and burning the contents of their houses.[‡]
- In late June, officers of the Bobonaro District Military Command were observed coordinating an attack by members the Dadurus Merah Putih militia against the UNAMET headquarters in the town of Maliana (See Case Study: Attack on UNAMET Maliana, par. 835).
- In mid-August, UNAMET personnel in Viqueque witnessed TNI and Police members coordinate and join local militias in an attack on pro-independence youths that left at least two people dead.[§]
- On ballot day, 30 August, a group of militiamen accompanied by TNI soldiers stabbed and killed two UNAMET staff members near the polling booth in Boboe Leten, Ermera District. Later investigations revealed that the Sub-District Military Commander took part in planning and carrying out the attack (See Case Study: Murder of UNAMET Staff Members in Boboe Leten, par. 871).

395. There is also substantial testimonial and documentary evidence that TNI forces allowed militias to use TNI bases and posts as staging areas for their operations. One

† The shift in approach was confirmed by a radio communication, intercepted by Australian intelligence on 1 June 1 1999. In that radio exchange, Korem Commander Col. Tono Suratman reportedly told militia leader, Eurico Guterres: "Don't deal with me directly. piece of evidence is a secret telegram, dated 18 April 1999, from the Dandim Dili, Lt. Col. Endar Priyanto, to the Danrem, Col. Tono Suratman. The telegram reports, in a matter of fact way, that up to 250 Aitarak members had gathered inside the 744 Battalion's Company B headquarters in Dili in the course of a 'cleansing' operation that left at least one pro-independence youth dead. The report reads:

> "At 1315 hours on 18 April 1999 one element of the Aitarak forces finished their cleansing operation and returned to Company B of Battalion 744/SYB where they joined the other Aitarak groups who had gathered there earlier. They then returned to the Tropical Hotel."*

396. It is worth recalling that this degree of TNI cooperation – and acquiescence – occurred just one day after Aitarak had gone on a violent rampage through Dili in which they killed at least 12 civilians who had taken refuge in the home of Manuel Carrascalão (See Case Study: Carrascalão House Massacre, par. 803).

397. The same pattern – of TNI facilities and premises being made available to militias – was evident throughout the territory. In Lautém, for example, Kopassus shared its headquarters with the Team Alfa militia group, and provided it with logistical and transportation support (See District Summary: Lautém). In at least two Sub-Districts of Covalima, the Laksaur militia headquarters were located right inside the Koramil.† In Liquiçá, as we have seen, the Koramil in Maubara Sub-District doubled as the BMP militia headquarters (See District Summary: Liquiçá, par. 663). Such examples could be cited for virtually every District in the country.

398. The pattern of TNI-militia joint operations shifted again in the post-ballot period. With UNAMET under siege in its main headquarters, and virtually all observers and journalists having fled the country, the TNI was free to engage in acts of violence, both directly and jointly with militias. It was in this context that some of the clearest examples of joint TNI-militia operations occurred. These included, among many other cases, the massacre of at least 40 and perhaps as many as 200 people at the church in Suai on September 6; the massacre of at least 14 refugees in the Maliana Police Station on September 8; and the systematic execution of at least 82 people in the Sub-District of Oesilo in Oecussi District between 8 and 10 September. (See Case Studies: Suai Church Massacre, par. 903; Maliana Police Station Massacre, par. 923; and Passabe and Maquelab Massacres, par. 947).

399. Witnesses to the post-ballot violence have also testified that TNI soldiers routinely did nothing to prevent or stop the militias from committing acts of violence. A clear example of that pattern occurred right under UNAMET's nose. On 10 September, three days after the declaration of Martial Law, UNAMET staff watched as a group of armed militia approached the school-yard next to the compound and began to attack the people gathered there. Scores of combat-ready Kostrad soldiers and Indonesian Police who were supposed to be protecting the area not only failed to stop the militias, but actually joined them in smashing the windows of UN vehicles and either looting them or stealing them.*

400. When a UNAMET staff member asked one of the Kostrad soldiers why he and his colleagues did not shoot at, or at least apprehend, the militias, the soldier replied that his unit had no orders to do so. And when Gen. Wiranto was confronted with these facts by the visiting UN Security Council delegation that same day, he denied that there was a problem and insisted that the security situation in Dili was under control.

Weapons: testimonial evidence

401. Some of the clearest evidence of the TNI link to the militias lies in the fact that military officials supplied the militias with modern firearms, and permitted them to carry a range of other weapons in contravention of the law. TNI involvement in distributing weapons to militias, and their refusal to enforce laws against the possession of weapons, constituted a clear case of official complicity in the acts of violence they committed. This is all the more so in view of the knowledge military commanders had – knowledge that is confirmed by documentary evidence – of the use to which the weapons were being put.

402. The earliest evidence that weapons were being distributed to the militias came from the public statements of high-ranking TNI officers, and from two key militia leaders. In early 1999 the Korem Chief of Staff, Lt. Col. Supadi, reportedly told journalists that the military had supplied weapons to the militias. "If we don't arm them," he said, "there will be more victims on our side. It is better for there to be victims on their side."† In February, the Korem Deputy Commander, Col. Mudjiono, told a journalist that firearms had been distributed to pro-integration groups to allow them to resist Falintil forces.‡ The Regional Military Commander, Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri, also told the media that the TNI had supplied arms to the militias, though he denied that the intention was to support the pro-integration side.§ In early February, the Army Chief of Staff, Gen. Subagyo Hadisiswoyo, said that the Army was arming 'Wanra' auxiliaries to help the armed forces secure Timor-Leste.* In mid-February, the Armed Forces spokesman in Jakarta, Gen. Sudradjat, confirmed that guns had been distributed to the militias, but insisted that "we only give weapons to those we trust."†

403. At about the same time the leader of the Mahidi militia, Cancio Carvalho, told journalists that the TNI had given his group 20 Chinese-made SKS automatic weapons in late December 1998, which had then been used to carry out a number of deadly attacks on nearby villages.‡ The attacks reportedly included one in Galitas village, in Zumalai, on 25 January 1999, in which several people were killed, including a pregnant woman and a 15-year-old boy§ (See District Summary: Covalima, par. 579).

404. Speaking to journalists shortly after these events, Cancio Carvalho – who, it may be recalled, had close ties with Mahidin Simbolon, the Chief of Staff of Kodam IX –admitted to his personal involvement in the killings: "The attack was like this. I fired like this. I was leading them and we attacked in two lines. I ordered them to fire in a scissor action, like this. The woman was torn apart. I didn't cut her." He also sought to explain why the woman and other victims had been targeted: "This woman was the wife of a Falintil commander. I'm not sure if the old man was a trouble maker or not."¶

405. Cancio Carvalho's brother, Francisco Carvalho, a former General Secretary of the pro-Indonesian party Apodeti, had little doubt that the TNI had distributed weapons: "Guns have been handed out" he said at the time, "everyone knows that." Likewise, the Aitarak militia leader, Eurico Guterres, confirmed that weapons had been distributed, but insisted that: "I was given guns not just to protect myself and the other integrationists but to protect opponents of integration as well."††

406. The direct involvement of high-ranking TNI authorities in the distribution of weapons in this period has been summarised in the indictment filed against eight senior Indonesian officials by Timor-Leste's Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes.‡‡ The indictment directly implicates Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri, Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim, Col. Tono Suratman, and Lt. Col. Yayat Sudrajat in these acts. The relevant passages read as follows:

> "19. In or about March 1999 Kiki SYAHNAKRI met with pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders at TNI headquarters in Jakarta. SYAHNAKRI told the group that TNI would support their pro-Indonesian efforts and that MAKARIM was responsible for coordinating activities leading up to the popular consultation. SYAHNAKRI told them that firearms had been sent to East Timor, and that when the men returned to Dili they should contact SURATMAN to arrange distribution of the firearms . . .

23. In or about March 1999 SUDRAJAT and other members of the TNI delivered a large number of firearms to a pro-Indonesian East Timorese leader. SUDRAJAT asked the East Timorese leader to give the weapons to pro-Indonesian militia groups.

24. In or about April 1999 MAKARIM told TNI commanders and pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders that they should work hard for autonomy because if autonomy lost, more blood would flow. He offered pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders the use of automatic firearms and ordered SURATMAN to arrange for the collection and distribution of the firearms.

25. In or about April 1999 SURATMAN, after being asked by MAKARIM to provide automatic firearms to pro-Indonesian East Timorese leaders, ordered his subordinate SUDRAJAT to arrange for the collection and distribution of the firearms."

407. Faced with widespread international condemnation for the massacres in Liquiçá and Dili, in April 1999 the Indonesian authorities began to deny that weapons had ever been distributed, and efforts were made to conceal any further distributions.* But a substantial body of evidence indicates that weapons continued to be made available to the militias after April.

408. Perhaps the most obvious evidence was the fact that militiamen throughout the country were seen carrying, and using, modern TNI and Police-issue weapons, including M-16s, SKSs, S-1s, and hand grenades, while a larger number had Portuguese-era Mauser and G-3 rifles. Even if one accepts the implausible claim that these weapons were not distributed by the TNI or Police, the fact remains that the authorities took no measures to take the weapons away, or to bring charges against those in possession of them. The only reasonable explanation is that the authorities wished to ensure that the militias had access to firearms.

409. The same conclusion can be drawn from the actions of officials and militia leaders when the question of disarmament, long a subject of intense discussion, came to a head in mid-August 1999. As noted above (par. 56 ff), in early August 1999 Falintil began to withdraw its armed units into four 'cantonment' areas in different parts of the country. There they remained, in spite of the mounting threat of violence by militias and TNI forces as ballot day approached. UNAMET officials expressed appreciation for Falintil's evident commitment to avoiding armed conflict through cantonment, and called on the militias, and the TNI, to do the same.

* The denials became even more emphatic after the terrible violence of September 1999. Testifying before the Ad Hoc Human RightsTribunal in Jakarta, Col. Tono Suratman categorically denied that the military had supplied weapons to the militias. "We never gave them weapons," he said. See "Tono Bantah Keterlibatan TNI dan Polri," Media Indonesia, 23 October 2002.

410. TNI and militia leaders refused categorically to do so, but in the face of mounting international pressure, in mid-August they organised four public 'cantonment ceremonies,' at which militiamen handed over an assortment of weapons to local military and Police authorities. Most outside observers, including UNAMET Military Liaison Officers (MLOs), expressed deep scepticism that the weapons publicly transferred represented anything more than a small fraction of the arms in militia hands. They also noted that, in view of the fact that militiamen were not in fact in cantonment, there was no guarantee that the weapons returned would not be redistributed to the militias immediately after the ceremonies.

411. By most accounts that is exactly what happened. As ballot day approached, the distribution of weapons to militias increased substantially, and with the departure of most international observers after 4 September, TNI officials were once again free to distribute arms to the militias without inhibition. Credible eye-witness testimony suggests that large numbers – perhaps in the hundreds – of firearms were distributed by the TNI and the Police after the vote. This pattern suggested not only a close relationship between the militia and the TNI, but a degree of planning and co-ordination on the part of the latter, at least at the Korem level and probably higher. That conclusion also accords with evidence that high-ranking TNI officers were involved in the provision of weapons in the pre-ballot period.

412. It would be misleading, however, to suggest that the militias were fully equipped with sophisticated, modern firearms. While some did have access to such weapons, the average militiaman was armed with so-called 'home made' guns (senjata rakitan), as well as machetes, swords, knives, and spears. Fashioned from two or more tubes of steel attached to a wooden grip, a senjata rakitan was fired by holding a match or cigarette lighter to a fuse on top of the weapon, at the base of the steel tubes. The resulting explosion sent a ball or cluster of metal down the tubes and more or less in the direction of the target. To the untrained eye, they resembled 17th or 18th century firearms, and by all accounts they were just as unreliable.

413. At first glance, the militia's reliance on such low-tech weapons does not seem to accord with the claim that they were officially backed by the TNI, or that the violence was carefully planned. If they were serious about using the militias to intimidate the opposition and to create mayhem, surely the TNI would simply have given them all access to sophisticated weapons and let them loose. On closer analysis, however, it is clear that the use of such basic weapons technology is entirely consistent with the evidence of TNI distribution of weapons, and co-ordination of militia violence.

414. From the point of view of TNI strategists, home-made guns, machetes, knives, spears, swords, and rocks had at least three advantages. First, they made it easier to sustain the illusion that the militias had grown spontaneously from the community. Second, there was much less danger that such rudimentary weapons could be turned against the TNI or Police in the event of a mutiny, or of the weapons' loss or sale to the other side.* Finally, despite their simplicity, these weapons were extremely effective in spreading terror. Although senjata rakitan were almost as likely to injure their owners as their intended targets, they could inflict serious wounds, and they had a terrifying effect. The same was true of machetes, knives, spears, swords, and rocks.

* UNAMET MLOs in Viqueque suggested this concern in relation to the militia group 59/75 Junior, in an August 1999 report: "We do not believe that TNI or KOPASSUS trust 59/75 Junior rank and file to issue them with weapons and ammunition." UNAMET, MLO-Viqueque, Sitrep, 5 August 1999, p. 3. This report is reprinted in UNTAET, Political Affairs Office, Briefing Book, Dili, November 1999.

Weapons: documentary evidence

415. In addition to such testimonial evidence, a number of secret documents have come to light since 1999 confirming direct TNI responsibility in distributing weapons to, and tolerating their possession by, militia groups. These documents demonstrate, moreover, that TNI officers exercised careful control over the flow of weapons, handing them out and calling them back in accordance with their military and political objectives.

416. One important piece of evidence is a document from the District Military Command in Baucau (Kodim 1628/Baucau) dated 3 February 1999. The document lists 91 members of the Pusaka Special Company, also known as the Saka militia. Titled "List of Members of the Pusaka Special Company, Kodim 1628/Baucau," the document records the type and registration number of the weapon assigned to all but one member of the group. The weapons listed include: 1 PMI/Pindad, 19 G-3s, 56 SP-IIs, 10 SP-Is, 1 FNC, 1 M16A1, 1 AK, and 1 Mauser. The document is signed by the well-known militia leader, Joanico C. Belo, who is identified as a First Sergeant and Commander of the Pusaka Special Company.[*]

417. A second document relevant to the question of TNI weapons distribution is a list prepared by the Kodim in Viqueque, listing more than 49 members of the Makikit militia. Titled "List of Team Makikit Members Authorised to Carry Weapons," the document specifies the type and registration number of the weapon assigned to each member. The weapons listed include 3 M16A-1s, 35 SP-1s, and 11 Garands. The document is undated, but a marginal note indicates that it was found at Kodim 1630/Viqueque on 28 October 1998.[†]

418. A third piece of documentary evidence bearing on the question of weapons is a secret telegram, dated 2 February 1999, from the Danrem to all Dandim and to the Commander of Satgas Tribuana, issued in anticipation of a visit to Timor-Leste by a UN delegation later that month.[‡] The document makes it clear that the TNI had temporarily withdrawn weapons from the militias and then later returned these weapons to them. The telegram orders all Dandim and the Commander of Satgas Tribuana V to prepare reports on acts of violence committed against militias by the pro-independence side, and instructs them to focus on the "period after weapons were withdrawn from the Ratih and Surwan until the weapons were returned to them." The fact that this order was copied to the Commander of Satgas Tribuana indicates that

Kopassus was integrally – though not exclusively – involved in the distribution and control of weapons.[*]

419. The role of Kopassus in distributing weapons and in training has been confirmed in court proceedings conducted since 1999. In April 2000, a leader of the Sakunar militia group in Oecussi, Laurentino Moko testified in an Indonesian court that he had been given guns in 1999 by two Kopassus officers[†] (See District Summary: Oecussi). Similarly, in the trial of several members of the Team Alfa militia convicted of killing five members of the clergy and four other people on 25 September 1999 the militia leader, Jony Marques, testified that he had been trained by Kopassus since 1986, and had received weapons from Kopassus officers after the 30 August ballot.[‡] In its judgement in the case, the Dili District Court concluded that: "Kopassus Special Forces provided weapons and training to the members of Team Alfa"[§] (See Case Study: Murder of Lospalos Clergy, par. 1002).

420. It is worth noting that, while demonstrating direct TNI and Kopassus involvement in arming the militias, this evidence also confirms that the militias were not given unrestricted access to modern firearms. Rather, the weapons were stored – usually at a military command post – and distributed to militias in advance of particular military operations. After an operation, the weapons would be returned to the military. Speaking to Indonesian investigators in late 1999, Gen. Wiranto made precisely this point: "Sometimes weapons were provided," he said, "but this does not mean that [militias] carried weapons wherever they went. The weapons were stored at Sub-District military headquarters."[¶]

421. This pattern of TNI control over militia access to weapons, often mentioned in witness testimony, is also confirmed by other military documents. One such document is a secret telegram, dated 28 January 1999, from the Danrem, Col. Tono Suratman, to all 13 Dandim in the territory. The telegram orders the Dandims to:

> "Collect all weapons held by Wanra and Ratih members when they are not conducting special tasks or combat operations in their respective areas."[]

422. This order not only demonstrates that TNI officers exercised a significant measure of control over militia access to weapons, it also adds weight to the evidence that military authorities were directly involved in planning and coordinating militia operations, including those that resulted in grave violations of human rights, including murder.

423. On this last point, the 28 January telegram provides important evidence. It refers explicitly to several cases in which militia members had used the firearms given to them by the TNI to kill or seriously injure civilians. The cases noted in the order included: the killing of Julião Gonçalves Sarmento by Saka militia member Norberto Lopes, in the village of Defauasi, Sub-District of Baguia, District of Baucau, on 3 December 1998; the killing of two pro-independence youth, and the wounding of five others, by Mahidi militia members in the village of Manutasi, District of Ainaro, on 3 January 1999; and the killing of Fernando Cardoso by Ratih member Alfredo, in the village of Raiman, Sub-District of Zumalai, District of Covalima, on 23 January 1999.

424. As early as 28 January 1999 then, Timor-Leste's military commander, Col. Tono Suratman, was aware that militia groups were committing serious acts of violence with the weapons provided by the TNI. That knowledge was shared by all Dandims and by several higher ranking TNI commanders to whom the telegram was sent, including: the Commander of Regional Military Command IX; his Assistants for Intelligence, Operations, and Territorial Operations; the Commanders of Sector A and Sector B in Timor-Leste; and the Commander of the Kopassus Task Force Tribuana.* Moreover, in view of the fact that Col. Tono Suratman's order was issued shortly before an expected visit by a UN delegation in February 1999, it also fits the pattern, discussed in Chapter 4, of TNI officials carefully controlling militia violence in accordance with larger political objectives.

425. Taken together, the evidence presented in this chapter points conclusively to a powerful TNI role in the recruitment, training, and operations of the militia forces, and to direct TNI complicity in the grave violations they committed. More specifically, it allows the following conclusions.

426. First, TNI soldiers and officers were integrally involved in recruiting the militias in late 1998 and early 1999, and some actually served as militia members and leaders. The documented overlap between TNI and militia memberships renders meaningless the formal distinction between the two, and directly implicates the TNI in the acts ostensibly committed by independent militia groups.

427. Second, there is no doubt whatsoever that militia groups received training and guidance from TNI officers. That training was not carried out on the sly, or by a handful of 'rogue elements.' On the contrary, the evidence shows conclusively that militia training was a routine affair, carried out in accordance with well-established rules and procedures originating at TNI headquarters in Jakarta. It was done, moreover, with the full knowledge of high-ranking TNI officers, including at a minimum: the Regional Military Commander, Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri; the Danrem Col. Tono Suratman; the Commander of Kopassus Task Force Tribuana; the Commanders of Sectors A and B; and probably all Dandims and Danramils in the territory.

428. Third, the TNI routinely conducted joint operations with militia groups, and provided backing and support for operations ostensibly conducted by the militias.

* 50 See: Danrem 164/WD to Dandim 1627-1639 and others. Secret Telegram No. TR/41/1999, January 28, 1999 (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #7).

High-ranking TNI officers, including Col. Tono Suratman and others, knew very well that those operations were resulting in serious acts of violence. They also understood that such operational cooperation was in breach of the 5 May Agreements. For that reason, once UNAMET began to deploy in June 1999, the TNI sought unsuccessfully to disguise its operational links to the militias.

429. Fourth, the TNI provided sophisticated modern weapons directly to some militiamen, and allowed others to keep and use their own weapons, contrary to the law. High-ranking officers, including Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri, Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri, Col. Tono Suratman, and Lt. Col. Yayat Sudrajat knew that these weapons were being used to commit grave violations of human rights, but failed to take action against the perpetrators, or to end militia access to weapons.

430. Finally, contrary to official claims that the militias were acting on their own, and that the TNI and Police were doing their best to contain the violence, it is clear that the TNI exercised significant control over militia access to weapons. That finding reinforces the argument, made in the section on Patterns and Violations (par. 199, above), that the authorities distributed and withdrew weapons as part of a carefully calibrated effort to influence the rhythm of the violence, in accordance with broader military and political objectives.

Militias: funding and material support

431. Government officials have strenuously denied it,* but the militias in Timor-Leste received substantial financial and material backing from the Indonesian government and military authorities. Indeed, official largesse provided the essential underpinning for the entire militia operation. Ordinary militia members typically received Rp200,000 ($26.66) at the time of enlisting, and between Rp50,000 ($6.66) and Rp150,000 ($20) per month thereafter. In addition to cash payments and access to weapons, they received regular distributions of rice, vehicles, regular meals when on operation, transport, fuel, office space, communications equipment, posters, clothing, and medical supplies. The provision of such funding and material support implicates civilian and military officials in the violations of human rights that were carried out by militiamen to whom it was channelled.

'Socialisation' and militia funding

432. The official funding about which we know most flowed through the civilian government apparatus, mainly under the auspices of the pro-autonomy 'socialisation' campaign. High ranking government officials have acknowledged that government funds were made available for that campaign. Foreign Minister Alatas, for example, has said: "There was money of course for the efforts towards spreading of information . . . We agreed with the UN that there would be a socialisation period."†

* See, for example, Ali Alatas in SBS, Dateline, "Timor Terror Fund," 16 February 2000, transcript, p. 17.

† Cited in SBS, Dateline, "Timor Terror Fund," 16 February 2000, transcript, p. 23.

433. The full extent of that funding for 'socialisation' is not yet known, but Indonesian government documents uncovered to date suggest that roughly Rp3 billion ($400,000) was channelled to each of the 13 districts to support the campaign in 1999, for a total of at least Rp39 billion ($5.2 million).* Although the amount varied somewhat from one district to the next, in every case some part of that total was allocated to pay for the militias.

434. Evidence and details of official funding for the 'socialisation' campaign, and through it the militias, is found in several documents uncovered in the course of 1999 and since. The relevant documents include: (i) a letter of May 1999 from the Governor of East Timor to all Bupatis instructing them to prepare budget proposals for the use of government funds for 'socialisation' activities; (ii) budget proposals for 'socialisation' activities submitted to the Governor by the Bupatis of Manufahi and Bobonaro in May 1999; and (iii) letters from the Governor to the Bupatis of Lautém and Oecussi in May and June respectively, approving similar budget proposals.†

435. These documents clearly indicate that all Districts were instructed to submit requests for funds to cover 'socialisation' activities, that they did so, and that such requests were approved by the Governor. They also demonstrate, beyond any doubt, that some of the money allocated for 'socialisation' in such budgets was explicitly earmarked for the militias, and for a range of activities that might well have provided a cover for militia activities.

436. The clearest piece of evidence in support of these conclusions is the May 1999 letter from the Governor of Timor-Leste to all Bupatis. In it, the Governor instructs each Bupati to prepare a budget proposal, in accordance with an outline that includes expenditures for 'socialisation' and 'Pamswakarsa' (i.e. militias).‡ Later that month, the Bupatis submitted their proposals.

437. The proposals submitted to the Governor by the Bupatis of Manufahi and Bobonaro each requested roughly Rp3 billion in government funding for 'socialisation' activities in their respective districts.§ The letters from the Governor to the Bupatis of Lautém and Oecussi granted official approval for proposals requesting roughly Rp3 billion for the socialisation campaign in each district, making only minor changes to the budget in each case. "We are pleased to inform you," the Governor wrote to both

* The indictment of Wiranto and seven other senior Indonesian officials, issued by East Timor's Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, alleges that the total figure diverted into the 'socialisation' campaign was Rp52 billion, or 60% of East Timor's Regional Development Budget. See Indictment, Wiranto et al., paragraph 28.

§ The exact amounts requested were Rp3.162 billion for Bobonaro, and Rp3.0 billion for Manufahi. See: Bupati Bobonaro, "Proposal Sosialisasi Otonomi Khusus dan Luas Propinsi Timor Timur," 24 March 1999 (HRU Collection, Doc. Bupatis, "that in principle your proposal and funds totaling Rp3,000,000,000, have been approved."[*]

438. The budget proposals and the Governor's letters of approval spelled out clearly how the government money was to be spent. As much as 20% of the total was to be allocated for payments to key government and military officials at the District level, collectively referred to as Kodal (Komando dan Pengendalian, Command and Control).[†] According to the Manufahi budget proposal, Kodal payments would include: Rp100 million ($13,333) for the Bupati, Rp50 million ($6,666) for the Dandim, Rp50 million ($6,666) for the Kapolres, Rp30 million ($4,000) for the TNI Sector Commander, Rp25 million ($3,333) for the Territorial Battalion Commander, Rp25 million ($3,333) for the Commander of the Kopassus Task Force Tribuana, Rp20 million ($2,666) for each of the four Sub-District Heads in the District and Rp10 million ($1,333) for each of the 29 Village Heads.[‡]

439. According to the Manufahi proposal, these 'Kodal' expenditures were intended to cover ". . . expenses associated with the substance of the autonomy plan and other needs linked to socialisation activities." That vague formulation ensured that Kodal allocations could easily be used, among other purposes, to finance and supply militia groups. Although it is difficult to confirm, one former official in the Bobonaro District government (Benjamin Barreto) has alleged that the Dandim there received some Rp800 million ($106,666), and that he used it to pay bounty for the murder of pro-independence people: "For each person you killed you got 3 million Rupiah ($400). That was the District Military Commander's plan."[§]

440. Large portions of the budgets approved by the Governor were also set aside for such amorphous categories as 'socialisation' (20%), 'community assistance' (30%), 'mobilisation' (15%), and 'infrastructure development' (5%).[¶] These broad categories provided ample leeway for funds to be siphoned off by officials and used as they wished. According to the Manufahi proposal, for example, Rp.356 million ($47,466) in 'Socialisation Task Force' funds were "intended to support the work of 150 members of the Socialisation Task Force, including provision of clothing, food, training and salaries." The Bobonaro proposal also referred to a 'Socialisation Task Force' to which it allocated Rp150 million ($20,000).* The precise composition of these 'Socialisation Task Forces' was not specified in either proposal, but judging from the actual conduct of the 'socialisation' campaigns in Manufahi and Bobonaro and elsewhere, it included militia leaders and members. In a similar fashion, some part of the allocations for 'community assistance,' 'mobilisation,' and 'infrastructure development' were almost certainly channelled to the militias.

441. In addition to such indirect appropriations, all of the socialisation budget proposals and the Governor's approvals explicitly allocated funds for militia and para-military organisations. In his May letter of instruction to all Bupatis, and his letters of approval to the Bupatis of Lautém and Oecussi, for example, the Governor ear-marked 5% of the total budget in each District for Pam Swakarsa, the official term for militia groups.†

442. Additional funds were provided to militia groups under various other categories. Under the rubric 'assistance to organisations,' for instance, Manufahi proposed the disbursement of funds to various pro-autonomy groups and militias. As the proposal explained:

> "In educating the public about autonomy, the role of community organisations is very important. In order to boost the capacity of local organisations, such as BRTT, FPDK, Klibur and ABLAI, funding will be provided to each of these groups."‡

443. The first three of these groups were each to receive Rp25 million ($3,333), while ABLAI, the principal armed militia group in the District, was allocated Rp50 million ($6,666). These funds were in addition to the 5% of the total Manufahi budget allocated for Pam Swakarsa.§

444. The Bobonaro proposal also requested funds for pro-autonomy organisations and militias. Under the category 'infrastructure development' the proposal allocated Rp90 million ($12,000) for the FPDK, the BRTT, and the paramilitary militia group Halilintar. In a separate category, it allocated Rp.1 billion, or roughly one third of the entire socialisation budget, to the District's Pam Swakarsa (i.e. militias). That amount, the proposal clarified, would cover the cost of "wages," "food," and "communications equipment" for the militia groups.¶

445. In addition to this evidence that district administrations requested funding for the militias, and that these funds were approved by the Governor, there is evidence that funds and other supplies were actually distributed to the militias. Documents from the militia group Aitarak, for example, provide details of the payments made to militia members in the District of Dili. A document from June 1999, signed by Aitarak Commander Eurico Guterres, indicates that ordinary militia members each received 10 kg of rice and Rp150,000 ($20) per month, while members who were civil servants received 10 kg of rice and Rp50,000 ($6.66) on top of their normal salary. The document lists 1,355 ordinary members, 107 members who were civil servants, and 60 'advisors,' and indicates that the total amounts disbursed for the month of June 1999 were 15,220 kg of rice and Rp22,760,000 ($3,034.66) in wages.[*]

Sources of government funding

446. Government documents and the testimony of former civil servants provide important information about the sources of government funding to the militias and pro-autonomy groups. They show that funds were diverted, with official approval, from the budget lines of various government departments (including Education and Culture, Public Works, and Transmigration) to the 'socialisation' budget from which the militias were paid. They also confirm allegations that some part of the 'socialisation' budget came directly from Jakarta under the auspices of a development plan funded through the Office of the President.

447. Some of the key pieces of evidence come from the District of Bobonaro, and include: (i) a document from the Bobonaro District Budget Office, concerning the Regional and District Development Program;[†] (ii) a ledger from the Bobonaro District Budget Office, dated 5 July 1999;[‡] and (iii) a letter from the Bupati of Bobonaro to the Governor requesting permission to divert funds from other budget lines for use in the 'socialisation' campaign.[§] Together, these documents confirm that funding for the militias, and for the 'socialisation' campaign more generally, was diverted from normal government budgets, and that some if not all of it came directly from Jakarta.

448. The first of these documents, which refers to Bobonaro's 'Regional and District Development Program,' indicates that the total budget for that project was Rp3.162 billion – exactly the amount of the proposed socialisation budget submitted by the Bupati to the Governor in late May 1999. This exact match all but confirms that the appropriation for the 'socialisation' campaign was approved and funded under the name of the 'Regional and District Development Program,' and that the 'socialisation' campaign and this 'development' program were one and the same thing.

* Similarly, an internal Aitarak document shows that the group had a wage budget of Rp356,340,000 ($47,512) of which it had expended Rp221,104,000 ($29,480) as of 23 August 1999. See: Komando Pasukan Aitarak, memorandum from Treasurer to Eurico Guterres, 24 August 1999 (SCU Collection, Doc #79).

§ Bupati Bobonaro to Governor of Timor-Leste.Secret Letter No. 195/UM/VII/1999, 27 July 1999 (HRU Collection, Doc. BOB #5).

449. That conclusion is confirmed by the second key document, the ledger from the Bobonaro District Budget Office dated 5 July 1999 that provides a detailed breakdown of the 'Regional and District Development Program' budget. The items listed in the ledger are precisely the same as those listed in the Bupati's 'socialisation'proposal. The document confirms, moreover, that roughly two thirds of the total project budget (Rp3.162 billion or $421,600) had been received and disbursed by 30 June 1999, while roughly one third was still being awaited by the District.*

450. The third document, a letter from the Bupati of Bobonaro to the Governor, dated 27 July 1999, provides important information about other sources of funding for the 'socialisation' campaign in Bobonaro, and insight into the accounting mechanisms that might have been used in other districts. In this letter, the Bupati explained to the Governor that the District was short of funds to pay for the 'socialisation' campaign, and specifically requested permission to divert some Rp2.5 billion ($333,333) from the District Offices of the Department of Education and Culture and the Department of Public Works into the 'socialisation' campaign.† The language of the Bupati's request is straightforward:

> "In that connection, I am requesting that funds already allocated for various projects under the 1999/2000 budget, be diverted for activities related to the socialisation of autonomy."‡

451. An attachment to the letter clarifies that the money to be diverted from the Department of Education and Culture had originally been allocated for building and repairing elementary schools in the District.

452. Bobonaro was hardly alone, however, in diverting funds from other budget lines to pay for the 'socialisation' campaign. Indeed, the documentary evidence makes it clear that the diversion of funds for socialisation was ordered by the Governor, with the full knowledge of the central government. In a May 1999 letter sent to all provincial Heads of Department (Kakanwil) in Timor-Leste, and copied to key ministers in Jakarta, the Governor explicitly instructed that between 10% and 20% of all departmental budgets should be diverted to fund the socialisation campaign.§ The key passage of the letter reads as follows:

> "With this in mind, all available resources in the province should be mobilised in an optimal fashion to ensure the success of the autonomy

† The precise amounts the Bupati wished to have diverted were: Rp850,790,000 ($113,438) from the Department of Education and Culture and Rp1,165,000,000 ($155,333) from the Department of Public Works. option. All departments are therefore asked to contribute between 10% and 20% of their 1999/2000 budgetary allocations for the socialisation of autonomy."*

453. Testifying before an Indonesian court in June 2002, the East Timor Provincial Secretary, Rajakarina Brahmana, confirmed that between 10% and 20% of the provincial government budget had indeed been diverted to the pro-autonomy socialisation campaign, including the militias.†

454. There is also good evidence that much of the roughly Rp3 billion made available to each District administration in 1999 was drawn from a World Bank-mandated 'Social Safety Net' welfare project (Proyek Dukungan Jaringan Pengamanan Sosial – JPS). The clearest evidence to that effect is the May 1999 letter from the Governor to all Bupatis, noted earlier, in which he instructed them to prepare socialisation budget proposals. That letter referred explicitly to the 'Social Safety Net' project as the source from which funds would be drawn:

> "Further to my letter Number: 915/712/II.BIPRAM/V/1999 of 5 May 1999 concerning the implementation of the Regional and District Development Program, Social Safety Net Project (JPS) in each District, you are hereby requested to prepare a draft outline for the use of these funds, in accordance with the following proposal."‡

455. A number of other documents similarly indicate that 'Social Safety Net' funds were used for the socialisation campaign. One of the 'socialisation' budget proposals (from Manufahi), and both of the Governor's letters of budgetary approval, refer explicitly to that 'Social Safety Net' as the project from which 'socialisation' funds will be drawn.§

456. Testimonial evidence supports the claim that 'Social Safety Net' funds were diverted to pay for the 'socialisation' campaign. In November 1999, a former civil servant told the International Commission of Inquiry on East Timor of a meeting in Lautém at which it had been explained that the funding for socialisation in that District would come from monies originally allocated for 'welfare activities' – very likely 'Social Safety Net' funds. In the words of the Commission:

> "A former government official testified that at an official meeting on 5 May 1999 the question of use of funds allocated for welfare activity to meet the cost of securing support for autonomy had been discussed. It > had been decided to spend 3.5 million Rupiah for the distribution of rice and other gifts to the people, with a view to manipulating the vote in favour of autonomy."*

457. Significantly, the documents show that these funds were not diverted in a clandestine fashion, but in apparent accordance with established bureaucratic procedures.† In his letters of approval to the Bupatis of Lautém and Oecussi, for example, the Governor explained that the 'Control Team' of the 'Social Safety Net' project had vetted and approved both proposals. In his letter to the Bupati of Lautém, dated 21 May 1999, the Governor wrote:

> "I have the pleasure to inform you that the proposal has been studied by the Control Team of the Social Safety Net project . . . administered by the provincial government, and that in principle your proposal . . . has been approved."‡

458. This documentary and testimonial evidence might appear to suggest that the funding of the 'socialisation' campaign, and of the militias, was organised exclusively at the District and Provincial level, and that the parties ultimately responsible were the Governor and the 13 Bupatis. Yet the reality is that, given the highly centralised structure of the Indonesian bureaucracy, these funding arrangements could not have been made without the approval of government officials in Jakarta. On those grounds alone, it is reasonable to conclude that funding for the militias was done with the approval of central government authorities.

459. There is also substantial evidence that central government bodies – including several Ministries, the military intelligence agency, BAIS (before April 1999, BIA), and even the Office of the President – were directly involved in diverting funds to the militias, usually under the auspices of the 'socialisation' campaign. The testimony of former pro-Indonesian leaders and East Timorese government officials suggests that substantial funding was provided, or authorised, among others, by the Ministry of Transmigration, the Ministry of Information, and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. That evidence places responsibility even more squarely with central government officials.

460. One former pro-Indonesian figure, Tomás Gonçalves, has claimed that in early 1999 he met several high ranking TNI officers to discuss the provision of funds and weapons to pro-autonomy groups. The officers he met reportedly included the Regional Military Commander for Kodam IX, Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri; the Assistant for Operations to

† A related allegation regarding the use of 'Social Safety Net' funds has been difficult to confirm. An Australian documentary has claimed that the 'Department of Political Affairs'(sic) [possibly referring to the Coordinating Ministry for Political and Security Affairs] brokered a loan to the Timor-Leste office of the Department of Finance, with an agreement that the loan would be repaid when the 'Social Safety Net' money came through. See SBS, Dateline, "Timor Terror Fund," 16 February 2000, transcript, pp. 25.

the Army Chief of Staff (and later Martial Law Commander), Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri; the Minister of Transmigration, Lt. Gen. (ret.) Hendropriyono, and the Minister of Information, Maj. Gen. (ret.) Yunus Yosfiah. "The point they made," Gonçalves said, "was that if we continue[d] to defend the red and white flag, they were ready to provide any funding and all sorts of guns and all the troops here could help us."[*]

461. According to Gonçalves, the Minster of Transmigration, Lt. Gen. (ret.) Hendropriyono, was especially enthusiastic, and instructed the Head of the Transmigration Department for Timor-Leste to "devote the whole department budget for the use of the militias."[†] The Minister of Information, Maj. Gen. (ret.) Yunus Yosfiah, was also keen on the militias, according to Gonçalves, and offered to introduce the pro-autonomy leaders to key people in Jakarta in order to obtain government support: "In his conversation on preparing the militia he even called [the Danrem, Col.] Tono Suratman a coward because he was taking too long to act. We should act now because we're ready to support you with guns or anything else."[‡]

462. A former official of the Timor-Leste office of the Department of Finance has stated that money was also made available to pro-autonomy groups by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. At least Rp9 billion ($1.2 million), he has said, was given to the FPDK in early 1999. In view of the evidence detailed below that the FPDK channelled funds and supplies to militia groups, that testimony implicates the Foreign Ministry in the financial backing of the militias. In fact, a second installment of funds to the FPDK was reportedly stopped when the Ministry discovered how the first tranche had been used.[§]

463. Perhaps most significantly, there is documentary evidence that funding for 'socialisation,' and therefore also for the militias, came directly from the Office of the President. The evidence lies in two of the documents from Bobonaro already discussed. The first of those documents, which refers to the 'Regional and District Development Program' for Bobonaro, specified that the source of the money for the project, and thus for the socialisation budget, was 'INPRES DATI II.' INPRES means 'Instruksi Presiden' or Presidential Instruction, and DATI II, means Daerah Tingkat II, or District.[¶]

464. What this signifies is that the Rp3.162 billion ($421,600) allocated for Bobonaro's 'socialisation' campaign, including the money allocated for militias, came directly from Jakarta, under the authority of the Office of the President. It is very likely that the 'socialisation' budgets in other Districts came from the same source. If that is the case, it means that responsibility for funding the militias in 1999 extends to the Office of the President.

TNI funding and material support

465. In addition to the substantial resources that flowed directly from, and through, the civilian government apparatus, some funding for 'socialisation' – and therefore also for the militias – came from, or was distributed through, military channels. The TNI also provided ample material and logistical support to the militias in the form of equipment, clothing, transport, lodging, medical supplies, and weapons. The full extent of military involvement in such funding and material support is not yet known, but the testimony of former TNI officers, and recently discovered documents, show conclusively that it took place, and that it was officially sanctioned.

466. A document from Ermera, for example, shows clearly the military's official involvement in the distribution of funds and supplies to the militias. The document is a letter from the Dandim of Ermera to the Bupati, dated April 1999, in which he requests Rp104 million ($13,866) to cover the Rp200,000 ($26.66) monthly salaries of the newly recruited Pam Swakarsa (i.e. militias) in the District. The Dandim also requests 6,405 kg of rice for distribution to the new militia members.[*] As authority for these requests, the Dandim refers explicitly to a 23 April 1999 order from the Governor and the Danrem calling for the creation of Pam Swakarsa.

467. This document confirms that, while 'socialisation' funding was formally channelled through the office of the Bupati, in some instances funding for the militias also flowed through the TNI hierarchy. That evidence is consistent with information from TNI and militia sources obtained by international observers in 1999. The Dandim in Baucau, for example, told officials of the Carter Center in July 1999 that the militias in his area were organised, trained, and supplied by the TNI. Likewise, militia members in Baucau told the Carter Center that they went to the Kodim in Baucau each month to collect their pay.[†]

468. The TNI also supported 'socialisation' and the militias by channelling its own funds back to the civilian government. That process is revealed in a letter dated 23 June 1999, from the Dandim of Dili, Lt. Col. Endar Priyanto, to the Bupati. The letter explains that the Dandim was contributing Rp50 million ($6,666) to the Bupati as "support for Kodal," as agreed at a meeting regarding preparations for the Popular Consultation. The money, it further explains, was intended to help "in the creation of conditions that are conducive, peaceful and orderly" in the District of Dili.[‡]

469. Although still limited, there is growing evidence that some of the funding and material support for the militias originated from military sources in Jakarta, including the military intelligence agency BIA (renamed BAIS in April 1999).

* Only the newly recruited members, of whom there were then 175 in Ermera, would receive Rp200,000/month ($26.66). The rate for old members, of whom there were 136, was set at Rp125,000/month ($16.66). Letter from Lt. Col. Muhamad Nur, District Military Commander 1637/Ermera, to the Bupati of Ermera, "Permohonan Uang Saku PAM Swakarsa," dated June, 1999. A copy of this document is in the author's possession.

‡ Dandim 1627/Dili (Lt. Col. Endar Priyanto) to Bupati Dili. Letter No.B/415/VI/1999, 23 June 1999 (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #32).

470. An Australian DSD intercept of 9 August 1999 reportedly revealed that Brig. Gen. Arifuddin, 'Director A' of BIA/BAIS, had arranged for the production of several thousand pro-autonomy flags and T-shirts to be distributed to militias and others in Timor-Leste.* That evidence confirmed that the military, and especially military intelligence, was directly involved in providing material support to pro-autonomy groups, including the militias. It may be significant, too, that until January 1999, BIA/BAIS had been headed by Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim. Given Makarim's own key role in orchestrating military and militia strategy in Timor-Leste in 1999, it would not be unreasonable to see his hand in these BIA/BAIS militia support operations.

471. Further indications of TNI and BIA/BAIS support for the militias emerged in 2000, when a number of Army officers were accused of producing and distributing millions of dollars of counterfeit money. One of those implicated was Brig. Gen. Soemaryono, a planning officer under Army Chief of Staff, Gen. Subagyo Hadisiswoyo.† According to reports, he had helped to organise the counterfeit scheme in order to fund Timor-Leste's militias. Other testimony in the case suggested that the operation had been run by the military intelligence agency, BIA/BAIS, on orders from Gen. Wiranto. After testifying in the case in late 2000, a retired intelligence officer reportedly said that the head of BIA/BAIS, Lt. Gen. Tyasno Sudarto, had told him "that General Wiranto had picked BIA to run the counterfeit money operation to fund the militias."‡

472. There is some evidence, too, that Gen. Wiranto may have authorised the diversion of real state funds in order to pay for the pro-autonomy campaign. During a court hearing on a corruption case in late 2001, the Head of the National Logistics Agency (Bulog), Rahardi Ramelan, said that he had taken Rp10 billion from Bulog's funds and 'loaned' it to Gen. Wiranto. He said he was told that the funds were to be used to pay for the pro-autonomy groups in Timor-Leste.§

473. Finally, there is evidence that other senior military officers promised to deliver substantial funds to militia groups. The indictment of Gen. Wiranto and seven others, issued by Timor-Leste's Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes alleges, for example, that at a meeting in Dili in November 1998, the Regional Military Commander, Maj.Gen. Adam Damiri offered to give Eurico Guterres Rp50 million to start the work of forming militia groups.¶

474. The TNI also had a number of formally established budget lines that were tapped for pro-autonomy purposes in 1999. One of these was the 'Operation Elections-'99 Security Task Force Fund' (Dana Satuan Ops Pam Pemilu '99). Though its name suggested it was to be used for activities related to the June 1999 Indonesian elections, it was also used for activities related to the Popular Consultation in Timor-Leste. When the Regional Military Commander, Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri, ordered a delegation of several Kodam IX officers to go to Timor-Leste in early June 1999 to check on plans for the elections and the Popular Consultation, he specified that this fund should be used.[*] It is very likely that the same fund – and others about which we do not yet know – were used for other purposes related to the Popular Consultation.

475. Military involvement in funding and supplying the militias took other forms as well, both formal and informal. It is self-evident that the TNI paid for the weapons and other military gear that they distributed to the militias. Some militia units – such as Halilintar in Bobonaro, and Rajawali and Saka in Baucau – were especially well equipped, and could be seen sporting full or near-complete combat gear (fatigues, boots, etc.). But virtually all militia groups were equipped with, or had access to, a range of expensive materials, including sophisticated radio communications equipment normally used only by military and police authorities.

476. Military and police authorities in Timor-Leste also made informal financial and in-kind 'contributions' to militia groups. In a report to the Commander of Aitarak Company B, dated 2 August 1999, a local militia commander provided a list of the contributions that had been secured from various official agencies and businesses in support of festivities to be held at his militia post in Dili. The list contained 14 names with signatures, and the amount contributed by each. The offices and officials on the list included the key civilian, police and military figures in the city: the Office of the Mayor of Dili, the Dili Chief of Police, and Kodim Dili.[†]

477. Finally, military authorities could and did exert their authority over other government agencies to ensure that funds and supplies were directed to militia groups even where there was no formal budgetary provision for such expenditures. A March 1999 letter from a Kopassus officer to the head of the Baucau District health office, offers insight into the process.[‡] The letter requests medical supplies for the explicit purpose of 'mobilising' the population and 'improving the morale' of local militia members and supporters. After mentioning the militia groups Saka, Sera and Alfa, and referring to some 600 family members and "supporters of the operation," the letter requests medical supplies in order to facilitate "the mobilisation of the local population and to improve the morale of militia members and sympathisers."[*] The letter leaves little doubt that the TNI, and in particular Kopassus, exerted its considerable authority to direct material support to the militias.

FPDK as funding channel

478. In addition to the money and resources that flowed through civilian government and military channels, support was provided to the militias through a variety of indirect means. Much of it was channelled through the FPDK, one of the two pro-autonomy organisations set up in early 1999. Indeed, there is reason to believe that, whatever else it did, the FPDK served a covert purpose – as a conduit for the dis-bursement of government and military funds and materials to the militias. There is reason to believe that the BRTT also served as a mechanism of support, and perhaps a conduit of funds, for the militias.

479. Some of the evidence for these claims is circumstantial. For example, by his own account, in early 1999 the FPDK leader, Basilio Araújo, went to Jakarta to ask government and military officials for money and weapons. Interviewed by an Australian journalist at the time, he said that he was quite sure that his request would be positively received.[†] On its own, that does not prove much. However, together with the testimony that the Foreign Ministry provided FPDK with Rp9 billion ($1.2 million), and documentary evidence that the group soon had access to substantial amounts of money and supplies, which it distributed to the militias, it points the finger of responsibility clearly toward officials in Jakarta.

480. Some of the clearest evidence that the FPDK distributed money and supplies to the militias comes from Covalima District. A document prepared by the FPDK district office in Covalima, for example, lists the names of 143 members of the Laksaur militia group (Company 2/Tilomar), each of whom had received Rp800,000 from the FPDK between April and July 1999.[‡] A second document from the same FPDK office lists the names of 16 civil servants, also members of Laksaur, who had each received Rp400,000 from the FPDK in the same four-month period.[§]

481. Documents from Dili point to a similar patronage relationship between FPDK and the militia group, Aitarak. In a letter to the provincial head of the FPDK, dated 18 August 1999, Aitarak leader Eurico Guterres requests Rp117,000,000 to cover the cost of meals for 600 Aitarak members who would be staying at Aitarak head-quarters during the 13-day campaign period. Guterres wrote: "I request the General Chairman of the Governing Council of the FPDK to release operational funds to pay the cost of food to support Aitarak Troop Command member activities." The matter-of-fact tone of this letter, and the fact that it requests the "release of operational funds," strongly suggest that a budget line already existed within the FPDK for such purposes, and that requests from militias were a routine occurrence.*

482. Another letter to the provincial head of the FPDK, dated 21 August 1999, confirms that suspicion. In that letter, Guterres requested 120 "additional" pro-autonomy T-shirts, 70 of them for Aitarak members "who have not already received one" and 50 for people in the village of Motael, Dili. The language in the letter – and specifically the word 'additional' – leaves no doubt that the FPDK had already provided T-shirts to Aitarak members on previous occasions. Moreover, in referring to 70 militia members who had not yet received a shirt, the letter implicitly but clearly indicates that Aitarak's other members – who numbered about 1,500 – had already received shirts from FPDK.†

483. The letter of 21 August takes on even greater significance when it is viewed alongside the evidence already noted that Brig. Gen. Arifuddin, Director A of the military intelligence agency, BAIS, had arranged for the manufacture of some 5,000 pro-autonomy T-shirts in 1999. That evidence could well indicate that the FPDK was a conduit for the disbursement of funds and material from BAIS itself, or from high-ranking TNI officers, like Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim, with close ties to the agency.

Militia budgets

484. Some of the evidence pointing to official funding of the militias is in the form of requests and budget proposals submitted to civilian and military authorities by militia groups. On their own, such requests and proposals do not necessarily prove that official support was forthcoming. However, viewed in the context of the pattern of official funding already described – and noting the routine tone and language that is common to these requests – they offer further support for the claim that the militias received official funding and logistical support. They also provide a sense of the range and character of the funding and other material support that may have been provided.

485. It is noteworthy that many of these requests were addressed to the TNI, and especially the Korem and Kodim commanders. In a letter to the Dandim of Dili, dated 16 August 1999, the Aitarak leader, Eurico Guterres requested that the TNI pay the wages of 76 Aitarak members who had not yet received payment through the normal channels. Only 1,445 of Aitarak's 1,521 members had received their wages, he complained, and the Mayor of Dili had said there was no money left to pay them. In addition to confirming that the militias were normally paid through the civilian administrative apparatus, the letter reveals that the TNI was regarded as a funding source of last resort for the militias.*

486. Other documents suggest that militia leaders were accustomed to having the TNI pick up the tab for their routine operating expenses. In a letter to the head of the state electricity agency in Dili, dated 12 August 1999, Eurico Guterres explained in a matter-of-fact tone that the unpaid electric bills for two houses in Dili should be forwarded to the Korem, because the houses in question were being used as Aitarak posts. We do not have proof that the Korem actually paid these bills, but the tone of the letter – and the fact that it was copied to senior officials including the Governor – strongly suggests that it was a routine matter for the TNI to pick up such expenses.†

487. Militia leaders made similar requests for logistical support from civilian government officials. In late April 1999, for example, the commander of Aitarak Company A and a militia post commander in the village of Vila Verde, Dili, wrote to the head of the Timor-Leste office of the Ministry of Education and Culture requesting office space and a vehicle in order to carry out their pro-autonomy activities. The militia leaders helpfully suggested that the vehicle they received should be seized from a civil servant who, they said, had been using it for pro-independence activities.‡

488. Another example of such a request for support came in a letter of 10 August 1999, from Eurico Guterres to the Mayor of Dili. In the letter, Guterres requested Rp60 million ($8,000) to cover fuel expenses for Aitarak personnel using 50 vehicles and 100 motorcycles during the campaign period. Like the others mentioned here, this appeared to be a routine request for the 'release' of funds, language that again suggested that there was a budget line already available for such expenditures. §

489. By far the largest requests for aid so far discovered are two budget proposals prepared by Aitarak, and signed by Eurico Guterres. One was submitted to the Governor of Timor-Leste on 18 May 1999, and the other to the Governor of East Nusa Tenggara (NTT), the neighboring Indonesian province, on 30 June. The proposal to the Governor of Timor-Leste requested a total of Rp477,490,000 ($63,665), to cover a wide range of needs, including: four vehicles, twenty motorbikes, funds for 'socialisation,' two computers, four typewriters, five cupboards, five desks, five fans, two computer desks, and so on. The proposal submitted to the Governor of NTT, for a total of Rp1,009,990,000 ($134,665), included a similar list, but added to it: salaries for

1,522 Aitarak members, as well as the cost of telephone, water, electricity, transport, and 'miscellaneous' items.*

490. On their own, these large budget proposals do not prove that official funding was forthcoming. However, like the many smaller requests already described, they do tell us that Guterres, and perhaps other militia leaders, had reason to expect that he would get something from government authorities. Moreover, in view of the fact that Aitarak did eventually acquire vehicles, motorcycles, office space, office equipment, and wages for some 1,500 members, it is not unreasonable to conclude that at least some of these requests did lead to funding from official sources.

491. The evidence presented in this chapter leaves little room for doubt that Indonesian civilian and military authorities, up to and including the Office of the President, provided the essential financial and material underpinning for the militias, both directly and indirectly under the auspices of the 'socialisation' campaign. More specifically, the evidence points to the following conclusions.

492. First, much of the official funding – an estimated Rp39 billion or US$ 5.2 million – was channelled through the civilian government bureaucracy in Timor-Leste, with the explicit approval of the Governor and the Bupatis. Some, perhaps most, of those funds were drawn or diverted from existing government budgets and pro-grams, including a World Bank-mandated 'Social Safety Net' project, and the Provincial budgets for Education and Culture, and Public Works. Given the highly centralised structure of the Indonesian bureaucracy, these arrangements could not have been made without the approval of central government officials in Jakarta.

493. Second, there is evidence that several Indonesian government ministries and bodies - including the Ministry of Transmigration, the Ministry of Information, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and the military intelligence agency, BAIS – provided enthusiastic support, and funding, for 'socialisation,' including the militias. There is documentary evidence, moreover, that at least some part of the money used to support the militias in Timor-Leste came directly from Jakarta under the guise of a development program funded through the Office of the President.

494. Third, documentary and testimonial evidence show that some funding for the militias was also channelled, directly and indirectly, through the TNI. In some districts militia members received their monthly wages and rice allotments at the Kodim office. The TNI also provided material support in the form of voluntary 'contributions' to militia groups, by exerting its authority to divert supplies to the militia from other government agencies, and by supplying the militias with weapons, combat gear, clothing, radio equipment, medical supplies, transportation and other logistical assistance.

495. Finally, additional funding and supplies were channelled through the pro-autonomy group, the FPDK. In some districts, such as Covalima, the FPDK paid the monthly wages of local militias. Elsewhere, it provided the militias with T-shirts, flags, and other pro-autonomy paraphernalia. There is evidence to suggest, moreover, that the FPDK served as a covert channel for the distribution of funds and supplies to the militias from various central government agencies, including the Foreign Ministry and the main military intelligence agency, BAIS.

District summaries

496. The examination of the broad patterns of violence in 1999, and of the relationships that underlay them, can create a misleading sense of the uniformity of the situation across the country. This chapter aims to correct that imbalance, and to provide a more nuanced and complex picture of the events of 1999, by examining the human rights situation in 1999 in each of Timor-Leste's 13 administrative districts: Aileu, Ainaro, Baucau, Bobonaro, Covalima, Dili, Ermera, Manufahi, Manatuto, Lautém, Liquiçá, Oecussi, and Viqueque.

497. Each district summary consists of two main sections. The first describes the principal militia groups that operated in the district in 1999, and examines the relationship between those groups and the key military, police and civilian authorities in the district. The second section provides an overview of major human rights events and developments in the district in 1999, highlighting both general themes and specific incidents of violence. While they add complexity to the picture of events in 1999, these summaries also illustrate very clearly the general patterns and relationships discussed in the early part of this report.

498. Aileu (Kodim 1632)

499. Compared to some other districts, Aileu suffered relatively low levels of political violence in 1999.* Twenty-eight people were killed during the year, the vast majority in one Sub-District (Aileu Kota). On the other hand, the district suffered levels of physical destruction comparable to other districts, and several thousands of people were forced to flee their homes, taking refuge in the mountains or in West Timor. The main perpetrators of the violence in Aileu were TNI soldiers and, to a lesser extent, members of the local militia, AHI. Members of the Police Mobile Brigade were also directly responsible for some acts of violence.

* Unless otherwise noted, this account is based on UNTAET, DHRO Aileu, "A Profile of Human Rights Violations in Aileu District During 1999," December 2001.

Militias and authorities

500. The main militia group in the district, AHI, was formally established in April 1999, and it had an estimated strength of approximately 260 members. Like many of the ostensibly new militia groups that emerged at this time in Timor-Leste, AHI was formed on the basis of pre-existing militia and paramilitary organisations. The most important of these in Aileu was Gadapaksi, a quasi-military youth group established in 1995. At the time of AHI's formation, all existing members of those older groups were effectively folded into the new one. Highlighting the continuity, AHI's leaders in 1999 reportedly included the former commanders of the old groups.*

501. Formally, AHI had the support of the leading civilian authorities, including the Bupati, Col. (ret.) Suprapto Tarman and local government officials.† It was allocated office space in Aileu town, and in each of the Sub-Districts. The District authorities also provided AHI with two vehicles, which were used by its key leaders, and like militias everywhere it received funding and rice through the Bupati's office.

502. Despite these signs of official support, the backing of the authorities was not nearly as solid as it was in some other districts. At least some government authorities were evidently ambivalent about the militias. The Dandim, Maj. Maman Rahman, does not appear to have been a strong militia supporter, and the record of the Bupati, Col. Suprapto Tarman, was mixed. Although he threatened grave violence against pro-independence figures in August, and adopted an extremely bellicose posture in the post-ballot period, he was evidently not a quick convert to the idea of a militia force. In fact, he did not authorise the formation of AHI until April, and then evidently only to keep other militias – notably the Dili-based Aitarak – from operating in his district. That ambivalence would appear to have limited AHI's strength, and it may therefore help to explain the relatively small number of killings in the district.

503. Certain aspects of AHI's leadership and composition probably contributed to the same outcome. For example, AHI's commander Tomás Mendonça was said to be reluctant to distribute weapons to militia members. An ex-civil servant and former head of the District legislature, Mendonça was not as aggressive or as inclined to use violence as leaders of militias in other districts. AHI's behavior was probably also constrained by the fact that Aileu was a major CNRT and Falintil base area. In fact, by some accounts CNRT and Falintil members had managed to infiltrate AHI units, and at least one of AHI's commanders (the second-in-command, Julio Oscar Galucho) was said to be a clandestine agent of Falintil.

504. AHI did, however, benefit from the support of some regular TNI officers, including the Kodim Chief of Staff, Capt. Solapidin Dolok Seribu. In certain areas TNI officers and soldiers were directly involved in mobilising and coordinating militia activities.

* They included Horacio de Araújo, a former Gadapaksi leader, who was AHI's third in command.

† Col. Tarman had previously served as Dandim in Manufahi, and as Chief-of-Staff at Korem 164/WD.

The Commander for the Sub-District of Aileu, Sgt. Maj. Alex Cocoleu, was a strong militia supporter. In the Sub-District of Laulara, AHI was unofficially coordinated by a Babinsa, Pte. José Aleixo; while in Seloi Kraik, it was coordinated by TNI officer, Sgt. Pedro Araújo.

505. AHI's strongest base of support in Aileu was arguably from the Kopassus unit stationed there, and from the Dili-based militia group, Aitarak, itself a Kopassus creation. Aitarak had actually begun to operate in the Laulara Sub-District of Aileu in early 1999, apparently prompting the Bupati to accept Kopassus calls for the formation of a local group. Aitarak was also instrumental in setting up AHI, and Aitarak members came to Aileu periodically in 1999 to check up on AHI's operations.

Major human rights events

506. Perhaps owing to AHI's weakness, and the relative strength of Falintil and CNRT in the district, there were no killings reported through the entire pre-ballot period. However, these months were not completely free of violence. There were frequent reports of arrest, beating and torture of suspected CNRT and Falintil members. Sometimes these beatings took place at AHI premises, but just as often they occurred at Kodim heaquarters or in one or another Koramil. Some instances of sexual harassment and sexual violence, especially against women with CNRT sympathies, were also reported.

507. As it was throughout the territory, polling day was relatively peaceful in Aileu, and the calm continued at least until 3 or 4 September. With the announcement of the result, however, the situation changed dramatically. According to some accounts, the violence began that day with the systematic killing of livestock. TNI soldiers began the slaughter, using high-powered weapons, and then gave guns to militiamen to continue the task. From there, the violence escalated quickly.

508. TNI soldiers and Police frequently played a direct role in the violence. TNI officers reportedly ordered militia leader Tomás Mendonça to organise the burning of buildings in Aileu town. UNAMET Civpol officers reported that Indonesian Police had stood idly by while militias had burned down the CNRT office in Aileu town. And on 8 September, Capt. Seribu and Sgt. Maj. Cocoleu called some 20 TNI soldiers together at the Kodim. Once they had gathered, Sgt. Maj. Cocoleu reportedly told them to go out and burn and kill.

509. Between 4 and 14 September, at least 15 people were killed in the district. Eleven of the 15 were killed in the Sub-District of Aileu Kota, and four were killed in the Sub-District of Laulara. Apparently, none were killed in the Sub-Districts of Lequidoe and Remexio. The available information on the reported killings points again to the direct role of the security forces. TNI or Police officers were directly involved in at least 8 of the 15 killings, and they were the sole perpetrators in at least five. On 9 September, for example, Domingos Maukinta was shot and killed near Hohulu village, in Aileu Kota, by a TNI Sergeant, while on operation with several militiamen. The murder took place in the course of a joint TNI-militia campaign of burning and forcible evacuation directed by TNI Sgt. Maj. Alex Cocoleu.

510. As in other districts, the post-ballot period was also marked by massive destruction of property, intimidation, and forced evacuation. In that regard as well, the leading role of the TNI and Police was conspicuous. The burning of Aileu town began on 5 September, and was both deliberate and systematic. TNI soldiers and militiamen arrived at villages with 5-litre cans of petrol or kerosene, which they sprayed on the buildings before lighting them on fire. Villages in the vicinity of Aileu town were burned one-by-one on successive days.

511. Against this background, TNI and AHI militiamen began to round up thousands of villagers and transport them, or exhort them to walk, to Aileu town. As in a number of other districts, those living closest to the main roads were most likely to be rounded up. After waiting in Aileu for several days, on 14 September those who had been rounded up were moved from Aileu to Dili. A few days later, they were loaded on to trucks and transported from Dili to Atambua in West Timor.

512. Ainaro (Kodim 1633)

- Dandim: Lt. Col. Paulus Gatot Rudianto
- Bupati: Evaristo Doutel Sarmento
- Kapolres: Maj. (Pol.) Drs. Rizali, SH
- Militias: Mahidi, Laksaur
- No. killed: 34

513. The District of Ainaro suffered significantly higher levels of violence and destruction than Aileu.* At least 34 people were killed during the year, virtually all of them known or alleged supporters of independence. More than half of these killings (18) occurred in the Sub-District of Ainaro. An estimated 13,000 people were forcibly relocated in the post-ballot period, and some 3,700 buildings were burned or destroyed. Members of the TNI and the local militia group, Mahidi, were responsible for the vast majority of human rights violations in the district, including murder, attempted murder, torture and ill-treatment, intimidation, forcible relocation, and destruction of shelter and property.

Militias and authorities

514. The main militia group in Ainaro district was Mahidi (Mati Hidup Integrasi dengan Indonesia– Live or Die for Integration with Indonesia). Mahidi was formally established at a ceremony in Cassa in December, 1998.† The inauguration ceremony was reportedly attended by a number of government officials, including the national pro-autonomy figure Francisco Lopes da Cruz. The principal organisers, however,

* Unless otherwise noted, this account is based on: UNTAET, DHRO-Ainaro, "Report on Human Rights-Violations in 1999, Ainaro District," May 2001.

† Sources differ on the precise date of the ceremony. Most witnesses say it took place on 17 December, but others say 31 December 1999. A detailed, hand-written memo from July 1999 states that Mahidi was first established in Cassa on 31 December (SCU Collection, Doc #268).

were said to be elements of the Kopassus-led intelligence unit, SGI.* At the time of the inauguration, that group was referred to as 'Halilintar 612' and 'Battalion 612' suggesting a link with the TNI in neighbouring Bobonaro.

515. Over the next few months, Mahidi branches were established in each of Ainaro's sub-districts and villages. By mid-1999, Mahidi had an estimated strength of at least 1,000 men, divided into a military-type structure of Company, Platoon and Cell.† There were four main Companies (A, B, C and D) plus a headquarters company and a women's company.

516. Mahidi was under the overall command of Cancio Lopes de Carvalho.‡ His younger brother, Nemesio de Carvalho, was Deputy commander based in Cassa, and had responsibility for operations in the southern part of the district. A second Deputy Commander, Daniel Pereira, based in Manutassi, was responsible for operations in the north.

517. Like many of the militias that appeared in 1999, Mahidi had deep historical roots, and long established links with the Indonesian military. Its antecedents dated at least to 1991, when a militia organisation called the 'Volunteers' Organisation' (Organisasi Sukarelawan) was formed in the district. The leader of that group was none other than Cancio Carvalho, the Mahidi Commander. Like Mahidi, moreover, the 'Volunteers' Organisation' base area was the village of Cassa, in Ainaro Sub-District. Along with Manutassi, Cassa had also been one of the key strongholds of the pro-Indonesian Apodeti party in 1975-76. In the mid-1990s, the future leaders and members of Mahidi took part in a military training program run by the SGI in Aileu.

518. These strong ties to the military were very much in evidence in 1999. TNI officers demonstrated their support for Mahidi by attending its inaugural meetings, and by conducting joint meetings to 'socialise' the autonomy option. Among those who attended such meetings was the District Military Commander, Lt. Col. Paulus Gatot Rudianto.

519. The TNI was also instrumental in training Mahidi, and in planning and executing its operations. One training session, conducted by Kodim officers, was directly observed by UNAMET officials in June 1999. Militia training is also reported to have been conducted in the district by Kopassus officers attached to Combat Sector B. The TNI was also the main source of supply of weapons to Mahidi. A former Hansip member told UN investigators that, starting in late December 1998, weapons were supplied to Mahidi commanders, who then distributed them to the Sub-Districts (See

* They included Lt. Col. Nyus Rahasia, a Kopassus officer – and Deputy Commander of TNI Sector B – who also trained militias in Manatuto in May and June 1999 (See District Summary: Manatuto).

† In April 1999, some reports estimated Mahidi's strength at 2,000 members with 500 weapons, but local NGOs said the real figures were closer to 1,000 members and 37 firearms. UNTAET Peace Keeping Force, Militia Handbook, Dili, 5 April 2001.

‡ "In the wake of the Santa Cruz massacre, [Cancio Carvalho] collaborated with the SGI (Military Intelligence) in their hunt for the pro-independence activists. Since 1996, he has been living in Kupang where, until the fall of Soeharto, he worked at the Ministry of Justice." UNTAET, Militia Handbook.

Chapter 7). Finally, UNAMET officials and others routinely observed TNI and Mahidi members conducting joint patrols.

520. Mahidi also had the support of the Indonesian Police, or at the very least, they were able to operate without fear of Police interference. As in the rest of Timor-Leste, the Police in Ainaro were conspicuously unwilling to intervene to prevent or stop unlawful actions by the militias, or to investigate them when they were reported. In fact, confirming what had long been suspected, one former Police officer in Ainaro told UN investigators that Police had been given instructions to protect and assist the pro-autonomy groups, and to turn a blind eye to crimes against supporters of independence.

521. Of course, there were exceptions. A number of East Timorese Police officers were themselves supporters of independence, and did what they could to limit or prevent militia violence. But the consequences of such efforts could be fatal. On 6 September 1999, for example, a Police officer in the Sub-Village of Hatu-fae, in Maubisse Sub-District, was shot and killed after he tried to prevent militias from looting and burning the village. Fearing a similar fate, several Police with pro-independence sympathies fled to the hills or to West Timor as the violence descended.

522. In addition to the support it received from the TNI and the Police, Mahidi had the effective backing of key members of the civilian government apparatus, and of the two main pro-autonomy groups, the FPDK and BRTT. In fact, the leaderships of these different groups overlapped so significantly that they arguably constituted a single, tightly-knit entity.

523. The Sub-District Heads of Ainaro and Hatobuilico, for example, were at the same time coordinators of Mahidi in their areas. The two Mahidi deputy commanders, Nemesio de Carvalho and Daniel Pereira, were simultaneously leaders of the FPDK, which had official government backing. The two men, moreover, were respectively President and Deputy President of the District legislature. Finally, the leader of the BRTT in the District was the Bupati, Evaristo Doutel Sarmento.

Major human rights events

524. As in much of Timor-Leste, serious violations of human rights occurred through 1999, but with greatest intensity and frequency in the pre-UNAMET and post-ballot periods. All of the 34 recorded murders occurred in these periods. These periods also witnessed a surge in cases of kidnapping, beating, intimidation, forced dislocation, sexual violence, and destruction of property. The worst of the violence was concentrated in two Sub-Districts – Ainaro and Maubisse – but all Districts suffered serious violations and destruction.

525. The pre-UNAMET period was characterised by a climate of fear and intimidation. At least five people, all of them supporters of independence, were killed during this period. Two of those killed, in the same incident on 3 January 1999 were evidently targeted because they had protested against the formation of the Mahidi militia in Cassa. Three others were deliberately killed after being detained by TNI soldiers and Mahidi members and badly beaten.

526. As in the rest of the country, there were fewer serious human rights incidents during the UNAMET period, but beatings, kidnappings, and intimidation by militia and TNI continued. The main targets of these actions included CNRT leaders, student activists associated with the DSMPTT, and UNAMET staff. On 5 August, for example, Mahidi militias attacked a meeting in Ainaro town organised by the DSMPTT, injuring a UNAMET Civpol. Police failed to intervene, and refused to investigate the assault on the grounds that UNAMET should not have attended the meeting. Later in August, during the period of campaigning, a Mahidi group burned the CNRT headquarters to the ground.

527. Ballot day was more tense in Ainaro than in many other districts. In addition to widespread intimidation, and brandishing of firearms, by TNI and militia, there was an unsuccessful attempt to kill a CNRT figure in Cassa.

528. As in the rest of the territory, however, the worst of the violence and destruction began after the ballot, and took on a special intensity after the announcement of the result on 4 September. The pattern was virtually identical in every Sub-District. Joint teams of TNI and Mahidi moved systematically from village to village, first ordering residents to leave, before looting and then burning all houses and buildings. Most were ordered to go to Ainaro town, from where they were transported by truck to West Timor. In all, an estimated 13,000 were forcibly relocated in this way.

529. The process of dislocation and destruction was accompanied by serious human rights violations, and most notably, by selective or targeted killings. Most of those violations were committed by joint teams of TNI and Mahidi militia. In a handful of cases, mainly in Hato Udo Sub-District, members of the ABLAI militia from neighbouring Manufahi, were also involved.

530. In a number of instances, the killings were committed while the victims were in TNI custody. In one such case, on 6 September, in Aituto-Rina Sub-Village, in Hatubuilico Sub-District, two men were beaten and then killed while detained at the TNI compound. The men had been among a larger group captured by TNI soldiers and militias on 5 September, and detained at a nearby TNI post. The following morning, pro-independence supporters were separated from the others before being beaten severely and killed.

531. As in the case above, those targeted were mainly known supporters of independence, but the victims also included members of their families. On September 10, for example, a two-year-old girl was shot in the head and killed at her home in Sebagalau Sub-Village, by militiamen attempting to murder her father.

532. The worst single case of violence in the District was the massacre at Maununu village, on 23 September. Mahidi and the TNI had left Ainaro on 21 September, but two days later, a force of about sixty armed men returned to Maununu. In a carefully coordinated and executed military-style operation, the armed men – which may have included TNI soldiers – killed at least 11 people, tried to kill 5 more, burned as many as 165 buildings, and forcibly evacuated roughly 75 villagers.

533. Baucau (Kodim 1628)

- Dandim: Lt. Col. Hisar Richard Hutajulu
- Bupati: Virgilio Marçal
- Kapolres: Lt. Col. (Pol.) Drs. Sodak C. Marpaung
- Militias: Saka, Sera, Forum Komunikasi Partisan (FKP)
- No. killed: 43

534. The District of Baucau, the location of Timor-Leste's second largest city, suffered significant violence and destruction in 1999.* At least 43 people were killed during the year, about half of them in the post-ballot period. As in other districts, there was widespread physical destruction in the aftermath of the vote, and an estimated 5,000 people were forced to flee their homes. Nevertheless, given the size and political importance of the district, the violence in Baucau was relatively limited.

535. The vast majority of those killed were supporters of independence, while five were TNI soldiers or supporters of autonomy. The main perpetrators of the violence were the local militia group, Saka, and various TNI units, including Rajawali, and Battalion 745. Other militia groups, including Sera and the Forum Komunikasi Partisan (FKP) also played a role.

Militias and authorities

536. The main militia group in the district was Saka (a.k.a. Team Saka and Team Pusaka). Most of its members had access to weapons, sophisticated communications equipment, and other military gear. Originally formed during the Indonesian army's 'Operasi Kikis' in 1983, Saka had long-established ties with the TNI. An officer at Kodim Baucau, Sgt. António Monis, was directly responsible for Saka liaison and operations.

537. The Saka commander, Joanico Cesario Belo, was a Kopassus officer. A protégé of the notorious Kopassus officer and Suharto's son-in-law, Prabowo Subianto, Belo carried a card that bore the Kopassus emblem and identified him as 'Commander of Special Company Pusaka' (Dan Ki Sus Pusaka).† Commander of Saka since 1996, Cesario was also the overall militia commander for the eastern region (PPI, Sector A), with responsibility for Makikit and 59/57 Junior in Viqueque, Team Alfa in Lautém, Moruk in Manatuto, and both Saka and Sera in Baucau.

538. Although it was the largest and the most active militia in the district, and was indeed responsible for many killings and other acts of violence, Saka was generally less aggressive than militia groups such as BMP in Liquiçá and Aitarak in Dili. One reason seems to have been the lukewarm support it received from the Bupati, Virgilo Marçal (a native of Baucau and well-regarded in the District), and from the Dandim, Lt. Col. Richard Hutadjulu.

* Unless otherwise noted, this account is based on: UNTAET, DHRO-Baucau, "Baucau 1999 Report" [n.d.].

† A copy of Cesario's business card is in the author's possession.

539. Formally, these officials backed Saka. As in other districts, funding flowed to the group from the Bupati's office and through the Kodim. At the same time, both the Bupati and the Dandim expressed to UNAMET their apprehension about the militias, and their desire to ensure a peaceful outcome to the Popular Consultation. Their posture may have been influenced by the views of the Bishop of Baucau, Basilio do Nascimento, a widely respected and influential figure in Baucau, and indeed in the country.

540. There was also ambivalence within Saka itself. Some Saka members, it seems, were sympathetic to independence, and secretly assisted Falintil by passing on money and food they received as militias. Even the Commander, Joanico Cesario Belo, appeared to lack conviction. In the pre-ballot period, his public pronouncements were seldom as bellicose as those of Eurico Guterres, Cancio Carvalho, and other militia leaders. And in the post-ballot period, he reportedly assisted many pro-independence people to flee Dili to Baucau, possibly saving many lives.

541. A second militia group in Baucau was Team Sera. Commanded by Agostino Freitas Boavida (a.k.a. Sera Malik), Team Sera also dated back to the 1980s, and had close ties to the TNI. However, it was much smaller and less active than Saka.

542. The last of the militia groups in Baucau, Forum Komunikasi Partisan (FKP), was not formed until July-August 1999. The name alluded to the first ever militia group created by the TNI in 1975-76, the so-called 'Partisan,' and some of its members were said to be former members of that older group. The FKP was set up on the initiative of the Kodim Baucau Chief of Staff, Capt. Karel Polla, despite efforts by local authorities and UNAMET officials to prevent it. The circumstances of its creation clearly indicate that the FKP was a TNI project designed to augment or replace the existing militia groups that were deemed to be insufficiently active.

543. The controversy over the formation of the FKP – as reported by UNAMET in 1999 –provided further insight into the reasons for the relatively low level of violence in the district. It confirmed, for example, that the Bupati, Virgilio Marçal, the Dandim, Lt. Col. Richard Hutadjulu were far less supportive of militia violence than many of their colleagues in other districts. It also confirmed the Bishop's strong opposition to TNI support for the militias, and his willingness to intervene with Indonesian authorities to limit their activities.

544. All three men expressed to UNAMET their concern that Capt. Polla's efforts would give rise to violence, and they supported efforts to have him removed from the district. All parties expressed relief and satisfaction in mid-July when word was received that Polla had been reassigned. Then, when he reappeared in the District on 2 August, the Bishop reportedly commented that he must have the support of one or more Generals in Jakarta. Immediately after Capt. Polla's return, FKP recruitment efforts resumed, and by the second week in August, units of the new militia existed in all Sub-Districts. Commanded by José Manuel do Reis (a.k.a. José Bife), the FKP brought together a mixed bag of ex-Partisans, civil servants, as well as former members of Saka and Sera. Together with Saka, and with the TNI, they were principally responsible for the human rights violations that occurred in the post-ballot period.

Major human rights events

545. As in many other districts, the most serious violence in Baucau occurred in the pre-UNAMET and post-ballot periods. Virtually all of the killings in 1999 occurred between January and May, or in September, 1999. The UNAMET period was marked by systematic intimidation, including overt threats of future violence, beatings etc., but apparently no killings.

546. Many of the serious human rights violations committed in the pre-UNAMET period, including several killings, were perpetrated by TNI and Kopassus soldiers. A number of these killings appeared to be acts of revenge for Falintil or Clandestine attacks. One such case occurred in the area of Uaibeana and nearby Burburaca on 17 March 1999. Apparently in retaliation for the killing of a TNI soldier that month, five young men were detained by the TNI and killed. The bodies of three of the five were later discovered in a shallow grave at Triloka, near the Baucau airport. The bodies of the other two victims had not been located as of early 2003.

547. Baucau District was calm on polling day, and for the first few days of September. On 3 September, however, militias began to appear on the streets of Baucau town, some of them carrying and firing automatic weapons. On the evenings of 4,5 and 6 September men on motorbikes drove around the town firing their weapons into the air. Others circled or drove past the UNAMET and Civpol houses, throwing rocks, smashing the windows of vehicles, and firing guns.

548. On 7 September, the UNAMET office in Baucau town came under attack. The attack lasted for about an hour, during which time live gunfire rounds entered the building at chest height. MLOs outside reported that shots were being fired by Indonesian Police, possibly Brimob. About two hours after the attack began, a TNI unit appeared on the scene. Later that day, UNAMET evacuated to Dili by helicopter.

549. The worst of the violence then began in earnest, and it continued until the end of September. Over the next three weeks, six people were killed in the Sub-District of Baucau; five in Venilale; four in Laga; three in Quelicai; two in Vemasse; and one in Baguia. A number of these killings were committed by TNI forces, including several by the 745 Battalion as it passed through Baucau on its way from Lospalos to Dili in late September. (See Case Study: Battalion 745 Rampage, par. 981).

550. In addition to these 21 killings, militia and TNI units carried out acts of violence in much of the district, burning or destroying houses, government buildings, livestock, and food supplies. Some areas suffered relatively minor damage, including Baucau town and the Sub-District of Venilale. Other areas suffered major destruction, most notably the Sub-Districts of Quelicai, a center of militia activity, and Laga.

551. In Quelicai, on 7 September, Saka militiamen tried unsuccessfully to arrest a number of CNRT leaders. The following day, 8 September, militiamen and TNI soldiers joined forces to burn down the CNRT office, and all the houses and buildings along the main road. On 9 September, TNI soldiers in Laga together with Saka and Sera militias forced people together at the TNI headquarters for transportation, by boat, to West Timor.

552. In the course of September, at least 5,000 people, and possibly many more, fled their homes either as a result of direct intimidation by militia and TNI forces, or because of a generalised fear of violence. Interfet forces arrived in Baucau at the end of September, and the violence subsided shortly thereafter.

553. Bobonaro (Kodim 1636)

- Dandim: Lt. Col. Burhanuddin Siagian
- Bupati: Guilherme dos Santos
- Kapolres: Maj. (Pol.) Drs. Budi Susilo
- Militias: Halilintar, Dadurus Merah Putih, Firmi Merah Putih, Saka Loromonu, ARMUI Merah Putih, Guntur Merah Putih, Hametin Merah Putih, Harimau Merah Putih, Kaer Metin Merah Putih
- No. killed: 229

554. The District of Bobonaro was a major centre of pro-autonomy violence in 1999.[*] At least 229 people, and possibly as many as 300, were killed during the year. Many others suffered beating, torture, forcible relocation, and property destruction. By one estimate, 8,612 houses were burned, and a further 4,382 were otherwise rendered uninhabitable. Gender-crimes, including rape and sexual slavery, were also commonly reported.

555. The vast majority of the victims were supporters of independence, though an estimated 20 pro-autonomy supporters or TNI soldiers were among the dead. The perpetrators of the violence were generally members of one of the militia groups operating in the district, but also included TNI soldiers and Police. These groups were almost invariably led or directed by members of TNI intelligence units.

Militias and authorities

556. Bobonaro boasted an unusually well-developed network of militia and paramilitary groups in 1999.[†] At least nine different groups existed in late 1998 and early 1999, and all of them had the full support of military and civilian authorities.

557. The principal group was the elite paramilitary unit, Halilintar (Lightning/Thunderbolt), formally led by the supreme militia commander João Tavares. First established at the time of the Indonesian invasion in 1975, Halilintar was dormant for several years and was then resurrected in the mid-1990s. Although the unit's total membership in 1999 was only about 120 men, it operated throughout the district and beyond, and had the full backing of the TNI leadership.* An elite unit, its members received Rp300,000 per month, as well as uniforms and firearms. They were also trusted to join SGI and regular TNI units on combat and counter-insurgency operations.

† Peter Bartu, who served as UNAMET's Political Affairs Officer in Bobonaro, writes that "the militia structure in Bobonaro district was the most developed in terms of organisation and funding." Bartu, "The Militia, the Military, and the People of Bobonaro," in Tanter, Selden and Shalom, eds., Bitter Flowers, Sweet Flowers: East Timor, Indonesia, and the World Community, Rowman & Littlefield, 2001, p. 78.

558. Beneath Halilintar were several militia units of varying size, most of them formed in early 1999. At least one group was established in each of Bobonaro's six Sub-Districts, and some Sub-Districts had two. Among the most active, and most frequently involved in serious acts of violence, was the DMP (Dadurus Merah Putih – Red and White Typhoon) based in Maliana Sub-District. Led by a serving TNI officer, Sgt. Domingos dos Santos, the group played a central role in the attack on UNAMET headquarters in Maliana in late June 1999, the murder of two UNAMET staff on 2 September, and the mass killings at the Maliana Police station on 8 September.

559. As in other districts, much of the militia violence in Bobonaro was coordinated by, and carried out with the acquiescence of, District military and civilian authorities. The key officials in Bobonaro were: the District Military Commander (Dandim), Lt. Col. Burhanuddin Siagian; the Head of military intelligence in the District, Lt. Sutrisno; and the Bupati, Guilherme dos Santos. In addition, the leadership of each of the Sub-District level militia groups was leavened with, and in some cases dominated by, active and retired TNI officers.† These men were assisted in their work by a number of local pro-autonomy figures, including the militia commander, João Tavares; the FPDK deputy chief, Natalino Monteiro; the BRTT leader, Francisco Soares; and the Head of the District legislature, Jorge Tavares.

* On Halilintar's links to the TNI, Bartu writes: "Certainly it had a close relationship with Satgas Intel (Satuan Tugas Intelijen, SGI), the Kopassus intelligence unit that oversaw its reestablishment, tended to its logistic needs, and provided bodyguards to Tavares and training for its senior cadre." Bartu, The Militia, p. 80.

† Bartu writes: "The TNI was heavily involved in all aspects of militia activity in Bobonaro district aimed at ensuring a pro-autonomy vote in the Popular Consultation. At the higher levels the sub-district militia leaders were coordinated and directed by the dandim and his intelligence chief from the kodim and from the bupati's office. At the sub-district level the militia was either directly commanded by TNI personnel or directly supported by koramil staff. At the village level the militia worked hand in hand with military posts and babinsas." Bartu, The Militia, p. 88.

560. Official support for the militias took a variety of forms, including mobilisation, training, the provision of weapons and logistical support, and funding. Evidence of official financing of the militias, and other pro-autonomy groups, is especially rich in Bobonaro. Documents leaked from the District administration in 1999 reveal, for example, that the Bupati requested some Rp3 billion from the Provincial Governor for 'socialisation' activities, and that roughly 35% of that amount was designated for militia groups under various guises. Those documents also indicate that, when finances began to run low in July 1999, the Bupati requested approval from the Governor to divert funds from other budget lines – including education and public works – to cover the costs of the 'socialisation' campaign. These documents are analysed in detail in pars. 431-495.

561. As in other districts, Indonesian Police authorities claimed to be powerless in the face of strong military and government support for the militias. One senior official reportedly described the problem to UNAMET as follows: "If we arrest a militiaman, Dili and Jakarta will tell us to let them go. If we shoot one of them, then we know they will attack our district headquarters."* Whether it was due to their powerlessness, or because of their active support for the pro-autonomy cause, the Police played a supporting role through their failure to intervene to prevent acts of violence, or to take action against those known to have carried out killings and other violations of human rights.

Major human rights events

562. As in some other districts, violence against pro-independence individuals and villages began even before President Habibie's announcement of late January 1999. Nevertheless, it was not until March 1999 that anti-independence violence became systematic and widespread in Bobonaro. In that month, TNI and SGI units carried out several raids on suspected CNRT meetings, and on villages deemed sympathetic to Falintil, in the course of which several people were killed.

563. On 19 March, for example, TNI soldiers and Halilintar members, fully armed and wearing 'Ninja' masks, raided what they thought was a clandestine pro-independence meeting in the village of Moleana in Maliana Sub-District, killing four people, including two children.† A few days later, on 22 March, soldiers severely beat a prominent CNRT leader in public and dragged him through town to the local TNI headquarters. The victim, José Andrade da Cruz, was eventually released but his public beating, and the raids on CNRT meetings, had generated widespread fear among supporters of independence. As a consequence, hundreds of people fled their homes for the relative safety of Dili, or nearby churches. The forcible displacement of the population, and the IDP problem that would continue for the rest of the year, had begun.

564. The situation worsened in April with the inauguration of new militia groups and their mobilisation in the context of the government's 'socialisation' campaign. Just days after the official launch of the campaign, TNI soldiers operating jointly with Halilintar and militia units embarked on one of the most concentrated campaigns of extra-judicial killing in many years. It began with the execution of seven people in a single day in the Sub-District of Cailaco. Witnesses have testified that the executions were ordered by the District Military Commander, Lt. Col. Burhanuddin Siagian, and the District Head of Military Intelligence, Lt. Sutrisno. Over the next two weeks, as many as 20 more people were murdered in the Sub-District. The operation followed the ambush and killing of the District finance chief and pro-autonomy figure, Manuel Gama, on 12 April.[*] (See Case Study: The Cailaco Killings, par. 787).

565. The killings sparked a new wave of internal displacement in Cailaco, as villagers fled to the mountains, or to nearby towns and villages. More than 4,000 people were moved from four villages to rough camps in the Sub-District capital, where they were placed under the 'protection' of militia groups and told they would not be able to return home until after the consultation.[†] Elsewhere in the district, the homes of two prominent CNRT leaders were burned and looted, and the men were forced to take refuge in the Maliana Police station.

566. In May, the focus of TNI and militia operations shifted to the Sub-District of Lolotoe, which like Cailaco was considered a pro-independence stronghold. Over the course of several days in late May, TNI forces together with members of the Kaer Metin Merah Putih (KMP) militia conducted sweeping operations in which hundreds of suspected supporters of independence and CNRT leaders were rounded up. Many of those detained were badly beaten, and some were tortured or mutilated by their captors in an effort to extract confessions about their links to Falintil. Several instances of rape and sexual slavery by TNI and militiamen were also reported in the context of the raids (See Case Study: Arbitrary Detention and Rape in Lolotoe, par. 826).

567. On 1 June, CNRT leaders who had been in protective custody since April were compelled to sign a declaration officially 'dissolving' the CNRT, at a large pro-autonomy rally in Maliana. The declaration was later cited by the pro-autonomy side to prove that the CNRT had ceded its right to campaign for the Popular Consultation. In the face of such tactics, and threats of violence, the CNRT chose not to campaign publicly.

568. As in other districts, the level of killing declined with the deployment of UNAMET and other international observers in June. However, UNAMET's presence did not bring an end to the other activities of pro-autonomy groups or the depradations of the militias. In fact, UNAMET and its local employees became targets of militia

---

* It is unclear who killed Manuel Gama. Some observers have concluded that it was probably a Falintil unit. On the other hand, Bartu says: "The weight of evidence suggests that Gama was killed by a combined Halilintar/SGI/TNI team, as a pretext for a district-wide crackdown against pro-independence supporters." Bartu, The Militia, p. 82.

violence during this period. On 29 June, for example, a gang of militiamen attacked the newly opened UNAMET headquarters in Maliana, seriously injuring several people and causing extensive property damage. A UNAMET investigation into the attack concluded that it had been organised by senior TNI officers in the district, and that the Police response to the attack had been wholly inadequate. (See Case Study: Attack on UNAMET Maliana, par. 835).

569. International protests over that attack, and another against a humanitarian convoy in Liquiçá a few days later, resulted in a temporary improvement in the security situation. Before long, however, armed militias were once more roaming freely throughout the district, threatening supporters of independence and UNAMET staff. To make matters worse, it was clear that they had the full support not only of the Dandim, Lt. Col. Siagian, but also of the Bupati, Guilherme dos Santos. As the ballot approached, both men adopted an increasingly antagonistic attitude toward UNAMET. In mid-July, Guilherme dos Santos threatened to kill Australian UNAMET personnel,[*] and on at least two occasions Lt. Col. Siagian personally told UNAMET local staff members that they would be killed after the Popular Consultation.[†]

570. These tensions came to a head toward the end of the registration period, in early August. Insisting that the registration process was unfair to the pro-autonomy side, the Bupati threatened that UNAMET staff would be detained if a single resident of the district were unable to register. In comments to journalists at about this time, dos Santos seemed also to be threatening UNAMET staff with acts of violence. The immediate crisis was averted through a face-to-face meeting between the Bupati and UNAMET's Head of Mission, Ian Martin, on 3 August, and an extension of the registration deadline.

571. However, the official antagonism toward UNAMET, and overt threats against supporters of independence, continued, and degenerated into serious violence in the final days before the ballot. On 18 August, a young pro-independence activist was hauled off a bus in Maliana town by DMP militia, and hacked to death. On 27 August, militias and Indonesian Police attacked residents in the village of Memo, in the Sub-District of Maliana, killing at least two people, and destroying some twenty houses.

572. In late August, UNAMET's Political Affairs Office reported to UN headquarters in New York that, barring some dramatic turn of events, or the deployment of armed peacekeepers, there would be massive violence in the District of Bobonaro after the vote.[‡] That view was widely shared by the residents of Bobonaro, many of whom fled to the mountains, or other places of sanctuary, within hours of casting their ballots.

573. By 2 September, the widely predicted violence had begun, and when UNAMET evacuated all international staff on 3 September, it escalated further. Backed and coordinated by TNI and Police forces, militiamen then began a systematic campaign of violence in towns and villages throughout the district. Thousands of houses were looted and burned, and tens of thousands of people were loaded onto trucks and transported to West Timor.

574. The total number killed in the district in September 1999 is believed to be at least 111, and some estimates range as a high as 200. Given the strong possibility that as many as 40 bodies were thrown into the sea during this period, however, it is unlikely that the precise number of dead, or their final resting places, will ever be known.

575. As in other districts, pro-independence leaders and supporters were specifically targeted in the post-ballot violence in Bobonaro. So too were UNAMET local staff members. Among the first victims after August 30 were two members of the UNAMET staff in Maliana, Ruben B. Soares and Domingos Pereira, who were killed in front of their homes on 2 September. Their assailants included the chief of military intelligence for the District, Lt. Sutrisno, and a TNI intelligence officer, Assis Fontes, who doubled as a DMP militia commander in Maliana town.* With Lt. Sutrisno and Fontes observing, several militiamen dragged Ruben B. Soares from his house before stabbing him repeatedly and smashing his head with a rock. At about the same time the TNI intelligence officer, Asiz Fontes, shot Domingos Pereira and militiamen stabbed him repeatedly. Both men died from their wounds. Lt. Sutrisno and Asiz Fontes were accused, together with eight other men, of individual criminal responsibility for the murders.†

576. In addition to these and dozens of other deliberate killings of individuals or small groups, Bobonaro witnessed a number of mass killings in September 1999. The most gruesome, and also the most revealing of the links between the militias and the military and Police authorities, was the massacre of refugees at the Maliana Police Station, where an estimated 6,000 people had take refuge in the days after the ballot.

577. At about 5.30pm on 8 September, while Police stood guard, a joint team of armed militiamen and TNI soldiers wearing 'Ninja' masks assaulted the station, and killed as many as 14 refugees with machetes and knives. The dead included a number of prominent CNRT figures who were evidently specifically targeted for execution. Thirteen people who managed to escape the carnage at the Police station were tracked down and executed by TNI and militia forces the next day in the village of Mulau. On 10 September, two Police officers were killed for their alleged pro-independence leanings, and their bodies dumped down a well at the Police station. (See Case Study: Maliana Police Station Massacre, par. 923).

578. The key perpetrators of the post-ballot violence in Bobonaro were members of the district's many militia groups. But, to an even greater degree than in the pre-ballot period, in September the militias had the active backing of the TNI, and the acquiescence or full backing of the Police and civilian authorities. Coordinating the violence at the district level were a number of familiar figures: Lt. Col. Burhanuddin. Siagian who had ostensibly been removed as Dandim in mid-August; Lt. Sutrisno, the chief of military intelligence for the District; Guilherme dos Santos, the Bupati; and João Tavares, the overall commander of the militia forces. As of early 2003, none of these men had been detained or tried.

- Dandim: Lt. Col. Achmad Mas Agus; Lt. Col. Lilik Koeshardianto
- Bupati: Col. Herman Sediyono
- Kapolres: Lt. Col. (Pol.) Gatot Subiaktoro
- Militias: Laksaur, Mahidi
- No. killed: 190

580. The District of Covalima was the scene of widespread human rights violations both before and after the ballot in 1999.* At least 190 people, and possibly more, were killed during the year, and several thousands were forcibly displaced. Numerous cases of beating, torture and intimidation were reported throughout the year, as well as several instances of sexual violence.

Militias and authorities

581. The main militia group in Covalima was Laksaur (a.k.a. Laksaur Merah Putih). The militia group based in the neighbouring Distict of Ainaro, known as Mahidi, also operated in parts of Covalima District, and had a branch in the Sub-District of Zumalai. On at least one occasion, in late June 1999, members of the Dili-based militia group, Aitarak, were also reported to be operating in the District.†

582. Laksaur was set up in January 1999, and formally inaugurated in mid-April. By mid-1999, it was one of the largest militia groups in Timor-Leste, with an estimated strength of between 600 and 1,000 men. As in other districts, Laksaur grew out of earlier paramilitary organisations, and its leadership was closely linked with the military and civilian authorities. Covalima had had a strong 'Partisan' militia group in 1975, and for several years thereafter; and those earlier allegiances were important in the 1999 militia recruitment. The group was formally led by Olivio Mendonça Moruk, a former official in the District administration and a member of the FPDK.‡

583. As in the case of militias in other districts, Laksaur received funding from official sources, and had the strong support of a range of military and civilian officials in Covalima. Formal funding for Laksaur came from the Governor's office through the office of the Bupati. Additional funds and supplies of rice were made available from the unused salaries and allotments of government officials with pro-independence leanings who went into hiding in early 1999. In some sub-districts, moreover, Laksaur salarieswere paid out by the pro-autonomy group, FPDK.*

† Four truckloads of Aitarak militiamen, some of them armed, appeared in the town of Suai on 28 June 1999. Following UNAMET inquiries, the District Chief of Police confirmed that the militias in question were Aitarak. See UNAMET, Political Affairs Office-Covalima, "Report 7/99," 30 June 1999.

‡ Moruk was killed in West Timor, shortly after Indonesia's Attorney General released a list of suspects on 31 August 2001. There was speculation at the time that he was killed to prevent him from testifying in any future trial, and revealing the role of TNI and civilian authorities. Other sources say that he was killed in a private dispute.

584. Among the most ardent backers of Laksaur was the Dandim of Covalima, Lt. Col. Achmad Mas Agus. Indeed, Agus was so closely involved with Laksaur that he was the subject of explicit complaints by UNAMET, as a result of which he was briefly replaced as Dandim in late August 1999.† His replacement, Lt. Col. Lilik Koeshardianto (a.k.a. Lilik Kushadiyanto) was not significantly different in his approach toward the militias. Another stalwart Laksaur supporter was the Bupati of Covalima, Col. Herman Sediyono, a Catholic from East Java who had spent much of his career in Timor-Leste.‡ Other key backers included the Danramil of Suai, Lt. Sugito, the Kodim Chief of Staff, Capt. Achmad Syamsuddin, and the District Chief of Police, Lt. Col. (Pol) Gatot Subiaktoro.

Major human rights events

585. Serious human rights violations were reported in Covalima throughout 1999, with peaks of violence in the pre-UNAMET and post-ballot periods. The vast majority were killed after 30 August.

586. The first of the killings in the district occurred on 22 January, and several other murders followed over the next week. By the end of January at least five people, all of them alleged supporters of independence or their relatives, had been killed. Three of them, including a pregnant woman and a boy aged 15, had been killed in a single incident on 25 January at Galitas village, in Zumalai.

587. An eyewitness to the killings at Galitas told investigators that about a dozen armed Mahidi militiamen arrived in the village in three vehicles at about 9.00pm on the night of 25 January 1999. Some residents tried to hide in nearby bushes, but the militias found Olandino Pereira (60), his pregnant daughter, Angelica de Jesus (18), and her brother, Luís Pereira (15). The three were reportedly shot and then hacked with machetes. According to one account, so far unconfirmed, the assailants cut off the older man's head (or a part of it) and took it with them to Mahidi headquarters in Cassa, Ainaro.

588. In April and May, Laksaur militias launched another major campaign of violence and terror against villagers perceived to be supporters of independence.§ In the wake of

* The details of FPDK funding to Laksaur are discussed above (par. 431 ff).

† Testifying before the Ad Hoc Tribunal in Jakarta in June 2002, the Commander of Kodam IX, Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri said: "It was UNAMET who made Jakarta replace Suai military commander Lt. Col. Achmad Mas Agus for no clear reason, so I appointed Lilik [Koeshardianto] to fill the post." Jakarta Post, 20 June 2002. There remains some uncertainty about the precise date of Lt. Col. Agus' removal and reinstatement. Most sources concur, however, that he was replaced by Lt. Col. Koeshardianto from 29 August to 7 September 1999.

these attacks, which resulted in numerous killings, residents from the targeted villages began to flee to the town of Suai, where they took refuge in the Ave Maria Church. On 12 April, Laksaur militias overtly threatened CNRT members in Suai town, leading CNRT leaders there to close their office and go into hiding.

589. UNAMET's arrival in the district in June 1999 led to a marked reduction in the most egregious human rights violations. Only one person was reported killed between 1 June and 30 August 1999, and some who had gone into hiding in April were able to return to their homes. Nevertheless, the Laksaur militia continued to roam freely throughout the district, intimidating and beating real or alleged supporters of independence. As a consequence, the vast majority of IDPs were reluctant to return to their homes, some were unable to register for the referendum, and the CNRT was effectively unable to campaign.

590. By August, several thousand people had gathered in the Suai church, and it had become a focus of pro-autonomy hostility in the district. On 19 August, the Bupati, Col. (ret.) Herman Sediyono, declared that the refugees would not be permitted to remain in the church, and he ordered that both water and food supplies be cut. Notwithstanding strong protests from UNAMET and a visiting U.S. Congressional delegation, and a promise from Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim to rectify the matter, the blockade was maintained for several days, before the Bupati finally relented. But official hostility to those in the church did not abate.

591. On 29 August, the last day before the ballot, pro-autonomy and pro-independence leaders and members came together in Suai town for a reconciliation mass, a public ceremony, and the issuing of a joint declaration. Some present seem to have had a genuine desire for reconciliation, but that was not enough to prevent the massive violence in the post-ballot period.* In fact, a militia leader from Suai, Rui Lopes, later told journalists that, on the same day, he had taken part in a meeting with the Bupati and the Dandim at which orders were given to burn down Covalima, and to drive the population to West Timor.†

592. As in most other districts, the violence began in earnest after the announcement of the result of the referendum. On 4 and 5 September, the burning began – in the villages of Debos, Tabaco, Leogore, and Kampung Baru in Suai – and thereafter spread to the rest of the district. Forced to flee their homes by the violence, as many as 20,000 people were assembled at three school grounds, and in military and police compounds in Suai town, before being transported accross the border. By 20 September, all Indonesian authorities, including the Police, had also evacuated the district to West Timor. From that point until the deployment of Interfet troops on 6 October the district was thoroughly looted by militias, some of whom had left for West Timor and later returned.

* Jim Fox writes: "At the point in the mass when members of the congregation wish each other 'peace,' the front of the church erupted in an outpouring of emotions as members of the two factions left their seats and embraced each other." † "Indonesia/East Timor: Forced Expulsions to West Timor and the Refugee Crisis," Human Rights Watch, Vol. 11, No. 7.

593. All told, more than 170 people are believed to have been killed in the post-ballot period. Four people were killed in the village of Matai on 9 September; at least 14 were killed at Lactos and nearby Raihun, by a joint TNI-militia team on 12 September; and three others were killed at Kamenasa on 24 and 25 September.*

594. The worst single incident of violence, however, was the massacre at the church in Suai on 6 September. At least 40 people, but possibly as many as 200, were killed when Laksaur and Mahidi militias, backed by TNI and Brimob troops, stormed the church compound. Of the 40 whose identities had been established by early 2003, three were Catholic priests, ten were minors (under 18 years), and several were women or girls (See Case Study: Suai Church Massacre, par. 903).

596. The District of Dili was a major centre of political violence in 1999.† As many as 192 people were murdered during the year. The victims included at least 13 people killed in a single day on 17 April, another 15 killed or disappeared during an attack on the Dili Diocese office on 5 September, and a Dutch journalist killed by TNI soldiers on 21 September. Many others were threatened, beaten, tortured, or seriously wounded in attempted killings. In addition, an estimated 7,165 buildings were burned or destroyed, while tens of thousands of people were forced to flee their homes as violence erupted in the aftermath of the 30 August vote.‡ The perpetrators of these human rights violations included members of the TNI, the Indonesian Police and Mobile Brigades, and militiamen.

Militias and authorities

597. The principal militia group in Dili district was Aitarak (Thorn), led by Eurico Guterres, who was also Deputy Commander of the overall militia force, the PPI. Based in the capital city of Dili, with links to key provincial and district officials, Aitarak was widely regarded as the most powerful and well-connected militia group in the country. It was also among the most violent and, with some 1,500 members, probably the largest. Aitarak was especially active in the vicinity of Hera, the site of a polytechnic college, and strategically located along the main road running east from the town of Dili. The Aitarak unit there, led by the Hera Village Head Mateus de Carvalho, was responsible for numerous grave violations of human rights, including the murder of two college students in May 1999 (See Case Study: The Killing of Two Students at Hera, par. 820).

598. Although based in Dili, armed Aitarak units operated in other districts as well. At one time or another in 1999, there were reports of Aitarak units based or operating in the Districts of Viqueque, Aileu, Liquiçá, Covalima, Ermera, and Oecussi.*

599. Internal Aitarak documents, discovered in late 1999, indicate that the group was organised on the model of an Indonesian army battalion. Beneath the 'Commander' Eurico Guterres, were a 'Deputy Commander' and four staff officers – one each for Intelligence, Operations, Personnel, and Logistics. The main force was divided into four 'Companies' (A, B, C, and D). Each Company was divided into 'Platoons', and these in turn were each comprised of several 'Teams'.

600. Aitarak was formed in early 1999 but like most other militia groups, its roots can be traced back to much earlier paramilitary formations. As described in Chapter 6, Aitarak grew directly out of a pro-Indonesian 'youth' organisation, Gadapaksi (Garda Muda Penegak Integrasi), established in July 1995. Aitarak's commander, Eurico Guterres, had been the leader of Gadapaksi until early 1999. Like Gadapaksi, Aitarak had close ties to military intelligence, and in particular to the Kopassus Intelligence Task Force, commonly known as SGI.

601. Official support for Aitarak was scarcely disguised, at least in the pre-UNAMET period. During the first five months of 1999, senior TNI, Police, and civilian officials openly attended pro-autonomy rallies at which Aitarak groups were established or honoured. These included the large pro-autonomy rally at the Governor's office, on 17 April 1999, that immediately preceded the violent rampage through Dili by Aitarak and other militias, in which 13 people were killed. Two days later the Bupati of Dili, Domingos Soares, appointed the Aitarak Commander, Eurico Guterres, as head of the district's new community defence body, the Pam Swakarsa.

602. Secret documents and communications intercepts indicate that a wide range of TNI and civilian officials regarded Aitarak as an ally, and were closely involved in coordinating its activities. According to these documents, and other evidence, the key officials involved included: the Korem Commander (until mid-August), Col. Tono Suratman; the Korem Assistant for Intelligence, Lt. Col. Bambang Wisnumurty; the Commander of Sector A during the period of Martial Law, Col. Gerhan Lantara; the District Military Commander, Lt. Col. Endar Priyanto, and his successor, Lt. Col. Soedjarwo; the District Chief of Police, Lt. Col. (Pol.) Drs. Hulman Gultom; the Governor of Timor-Leste, Abílio Osório Soares; the Bupati of Dili, Domingos Soares, and the Mayor of the city of Dili, Mateus Maia.

603. As in other districts, the authorities in Dili conspicuously failed to take action against the militias, even when they had flagrantly broken the law. As a resident of Dili

See: "Daftar Nama-Nama Dari Markas Besar Komando Pasukan Aitarak Sektor B," 22 August 1999 (SCU Collection, Doc #20). complained to an international observer, after an execution-style killing by an Aitarak commander named Julio, in early August 1999:

> "Please, I want to emphasise how important it is that the TNI and their guns be pulled out of Timor-Leste. Men such as Julio will continue to shoot people. Maybe today, tomorrow or the day after, Julio will kill again. People are aware that he is armed, is set out to kill and yet no one does anything to prevent it from happening . . . not the army, not the police, not anyone."*

Major human rights events

604. Roughly one quarter of all victims in Dili District were killed before 1 June, while most of the others were killed in the three weeks immediately after the ballot. One explanation for the high concentration of killing in the pre-UNAMET period is that the town of Dili became a place of refuge for people fleeing the mounting militia violence in neighboring villages and districts. Several thousand such refugees, who came to Dili in a search for shelter and safety, in fact became the targets of militia violence.

605. Among the most notorious incidents in the district, and indeed in the whole territory, was the 17 April attack on scores of people who had taken refuge in the home of a prominent pro-independence figure, Manuel Carrascalão. The attack, by Aitarak and BMP militiamen, backed by TNI and Police, left at least 12 people dead, including Carrascalão's teenage son, Manuelito. (See Case Study: Carrascalão House Massacre, par. 803). In the aftermath of the attack, most of the CNRT leadership went into hiding; some CNRT leaders were placed in protective police custody, along with some 100 other supporters of independence.

606. There were many other victims of political violence before and after the 17 April killings. At least three supporters of independence were killed in February and March – and in all three cases, the perpetrators reportedly included members of the TNI and/or Indonesian Police. The victims included: Benedito de Jesus, who was killed by shots fired from within a Mobile Brigade post on 14 February; Joaquim de Jesus who was shot dead on 24 February by several men carrying automatic weapons wearing TNI uniforms; and João Texeira, who was tortured (with lit cigarettes), killed, and beheaded on 11 March by a group allegedly led by a TNI intelligence officer.

607. More pro-independence figures were targeted and killed in late April and May 1999. They included: several people killed in Hera in late April;† a man named Eugenio António Fatima, killed by militias on 9 May; nine people killed by Aitarak and TNI forces in the villages of Quintal Kiik and Quintal Boot on 10 May; and two students at

† According to a resident of Hera who wrote to UNAMET in July 1999, the dead included: a man named Luís Dias Soares, tortured and killed by militias and soldiers on 20 April; two more pro-independence youths killed on 24 April and allegedly buried in front of the TNI post in Hera; a man named Bastian and another named Thomas killed on 25 April and reportedly buried at the Protestant Church in Akanunu-Hera. the Hera Polytechnical Institute killed after being detained and beaten by TNI forces on 20 May (See Case Study: The Killing of Two Students at Hera, par. 820).

608. As in other districts, the rate of killings declined significantly after the arrival and deployment of UNAMET in early June. No killings at all were reported in June, three were reported in July, and two more in the first three weeks of August.* Those statistics, however, do not capture the whole story. For while killings declined, other kinds of human rights violations continued. Scarcely a day passed without reports of militiamen threatening, beating, or burning down the house of a suspected supporter of independence. The CNRT office remained under constant threat of attack, and most CNRT leaders were in hiding. By contrast, armed militiamen roamed the towns and villages of Dili with impunity, erecting roadblocks, checking papers, extorting tolls, burning houses, firing their weapons and so on – all without a hand being raised by the Indonesian Police or the TNI.

609. Any illusion that the violence was under control in Dili – or that the security forces were committed to containing it – was completely dispelled on 26 August, the last day of campaigning by the pro-Indonesian side. For several hours, militias fired weapons, burned houses, and attacked supporters of independence. By the end of the day, at least eight people had been killed, two journalists had been shot and wounded, the CNRT office had been ransacked, and several houses had been burned down.

610. Internal UNAMET reports on the day's events catalogued, and expressed serious concern about, the utter failure of the Indonesian Police to prevent the violence by pro-Indonesian militias, to intervene once it had begun, or to detain or arrest those known to be responsible. One such report noted that the events of the day "highlighted the total inadequacy of the response provided by the Indonesian Police."† Among the many examples cited in the report, the militia attack on the CNRT headquarters stands out:

> "At 15:55 hours, the situation near the CNRT office was volatile. Two truckloads of Brimob were deployed outside the CNRT. Despite this heavy Police presence, a vehicle drove east along 'Jalan 15 October' [name of street], with the occupants continuously discharging gunfire. As the offending vehicle approached the Polri road block, the Brimob members moved to allow the vehicle to pass through their lines. The vehicle continued along 'Jalan 15 October' and stopped less than 100 metres from the Polri officers. The occupants of the vehicle disembarked and were seen to fire at unknown targets over the course of several minutes. The offenders then got back into the vehicle, turned around and drove the wrong way back down the one way street, through the Polri officers and continued out of sight. At no stage did the Polri or

* José Soares was reported killed on 25 July by unidentified men who shot him from a passing vehicle near Fatu-Ahi. Angelino Amaral (a.k.a. Sabino) was shot dead early on the morning of 1 August, just outside UNAMET's district headquarters in Dili. The perpetrators in the second case were identified as Julio do Amaral, an Aitarak Platoon commander, and Zokin, a member of the Mahidi militia from Maubisse. Carter Center, "Killing of Pro-Independence Supporter by Aitarak Militia leader," unpublished report, Dili, 1 August 1999.

Brimob officers attempt to stop the vehicle, or prevent the occupants from discharging numerous and indiscriminate fire. . . There were at least 20 Brimob deployed at the road-block in full riot gear carrying semi-automatic assault rifles. They clearly out-numbered the offenders in the vehicle but took no action against them."*

611. One of the many victims of the day's violence was Bernardino Agusto Guterres (a.k.a. Bernardino da Costa), a university student shot in the back and the neck, and killed by Mobile Brigade troops in the Kuluhun area of Dili. Various eyewitnesses testified that Bernardino had been remonstrating with the Police to stop militias from attacking when he was shot. A photograph of his dead body appeared on the cover of Time magazine in December 1999. In a sworn statement to the independent Electoral Commission that oversaw the ballot process, one eyewitness described the incident:

> "The crowd shouted to the police to stop the militias who were shooting. One of them . . . remonstrated with the police, directing their attention to the militias. A policeman who was not wearing a beret like his comrades . . . told [the youth] that he could shoot him because he was exciting the people. [The youth] turned and ran. The policeman thereupon shot him at a range of about three paces. I subsequently saw a gunshot wound in the middle of his back and one behind the neck. He died there. When the ambulance attendants lifted the body I saw a large gaping wound to the throat.†

612. The situation deteriorated even more dramatically in the days and weeks after the ballot. As in the rest of the territory, militia groups began an orchestrated campaign of violence. Real and alleged supporters of independence were threatened, beaten and sometimes killed; houses were burned, and property was looted or destroyed. As in other districts, too, the TNI and Police either acquiesced in this violence or helped to carry it out. The imposition of Martial Law, on 7 September, made no appreciable difference. By some accounts, in fact, the violence grew steadily worse after that date.

613. Fearing for their lives, thousands of residents sought refuge in the nearby hills, or in a variety of places that were considered to be safe havens within the city. Tens of thousands, however, were soon rounded up by joint teams of militia, TNI, and Police and transported to West Timor.‡ Some were sent by ship from the port of Dili, but the majority were grouped at Police and TNI stations and then transported by truck.

The breakdown by site was given as follows: Koramil East Dili (120), Koramil West Dili (1,000), Museum (3,000), Regional and District Police headquarters (6,000), Dili harbour (3,000), Koramil Metinaro (1,000), and Kodim Dili (3,500). See: Dan Sat Gas Pam Dili to Danrem 164/WD and others. Secret Telegram STR/–/1999, [7] September 1999 (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #44).

614. Within days of the vote, most UNAMET staff were relocated from the outlying offices to the main headquarters in Dili. There they were joined by some 1,500 East Timorese refugees, and the small handful of international observers and journalists who had not already left the territory. For roughly ten days (4-14 September) the UN compound was effectively under siege. Militias threatened violence against those inside, while continuing to burn and loot the city. Eventually, on the early morning of 14 September, all those remaining in the compound – including the refugees – were safely evacuated to Darwin, Australia.

615. But the violence continued. In the space of just three weeks, scores of people were killed in the district. The victims included: a young boy named Marcelino hacked to death and then burned by a group of militiamen on 1 September; as many as 15 people killed or disappeared when militias attacked and burned the Dili Diocese office (Câmara Eclesiástica) on 5 September; a man named Thomas Americo, reportedly tortured and then killed by Aitarak members on 7 September; and an elderly German priest, Carolus Albrecht, shot in his own home by soldiers on 11 September. One of several witnesses to the killing of the young boy Marcelino, gave the following account:

> "The Militia were in the street with a 16 year old boy. His name was Marcelino, but I don't know his last name . . . There were 10 or 20 Militia trying to chop Marcelino's head off. They were chopping at his neck but he didn't die right away. We say that was because it wasn't time for him to die. All of the Militia had knives. The knives were so long. There was lots of blood. It was like killing a cow. . . .Because Marcelino didn't die immediately, the Militia took some kerosene out of the [nearby] deli. The Militia then set [the] deli on fire and then they tipped kerosene on Marcelino's body. The Militia then threw Marcelino on that fire. . . The Indonesian police were behind the Militia, further down the road. They were watching what the Militia were doing. They could see them. They were there the whole time from when the Militia chopped at Marcelino and threw him on the fire."*

616. Among the most widely reported cases of post-ballot violence in Dili was the 6 September attack on the compound of Bishop Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo, where some 5,000 people had taken refuge after the vote. At least one person was killed in the attack and several were injured, including at least one child. However, the attack on the Bishop's compound was less notable for the number killed than for the fact that it was one of four almost identical assaults launched on places of refuge in Dili in the space of 24 hours. These coordinated attacks, which together left at least 17 people dead, typified the methods deployed jointly by the militias, Police, and TNI throughout the territory to force residents to flee to West Timor (See Case Study: Forcible Relocation and Murder of Refugees in Dili, par. 887).

617. While TNI and Police facilitated, and very likely coordinated, these attacks by militia forces, there were other instances in which TNI forces were directly responsible for committing serious human rights violations. One such case was the murder of the Dutch journalist Sander Thoenes on 21 September 1999. There is compelling evidence that Thoenes was killed by members of the TNI's Battalion 745, which had only just reached Dili from its base camp in Lautém District. According to that evidence, Sander Thoenes was killed by a shot in the back. However, his body was badly mutilated; one ear and part of his cheek were cut off with near surgical precision (See Case Study: Battalion 745 Rampage, par. 981).

618. Ermera (Kodim 1637)

- Dandim: Lt. Col. Muhamad Nur
- Bupati: Constantino Soares
- Kapolres: Lt.Col. (Pol.) Ery T.B. Gultom
- Militias: Darah Integrasi, Darah Merah, Naga Merah, Team Pancasila, Aitarak
- No. killed: 82

619. The District of Ermera was the site of very serious human rights violations in 1999.* At least 82 people were killed during the year. The vast majority of the dead were real or alleged supporters of independence and their families, including a mother and five of her small children. The victims also included 11 pro-autonomy supporters said to have been killed by Falintil. Internal displacement of the population began as early as February 1999, and some 17,000 people were forcibly relocated from their homes in September. Several instances of rape and other forms of sexual violence were also reported during the year.

620. As in other districts, the worst of the violence in Ermera occurred in the pre-UNAMET and post-ballot periods. Unlike most others, however, the perpetrators of the violence in Ermera, particularly in the pre-UNAMET phase, were just as often TNI soldiers as militiamen. That pattern seemed to stem from early difficulties with the recruitment of militia forces in the district.

Militias and authorities

621. A number of different militia groups operated in Ermera in 1999, including Darah Integrasi, Team Pancasila, and Aitarak. Of these the largest was Darah Integrasi, with a few hundred members. It operated in three of the five Sub-Districts (Ermera, Letefoho and Hatolia) both independently and through two subsidiary groups, Darah Merah† and Naga Merah. These latter groups were based in Ermera and Hatolia Sub-Districts

* Unless otherwise noted, this account is based on: UNTAET, DHRO-Ermera, "Report on Human Rights Violations During 1999: Ermera District," [March, 2000]; and Helene van Klinken, "Taking the Risk, Paying the Price: East Timorese Vote in Ermera," in Tanter, Selden and Shalom, eds. Bitter Flowers, Sweet Flowers: East Timor, Indonesia, and the World Community, Rowman & Littlefield, 2001, pp. 91-107. Helene van Klinken was the UNAMET Political Affairs Officer posted in Ermera in 1999.

† The leader of Darah Merah was Lafaek Saburai, the author of the 'Operation Clean Sweep' letter of March 1999, discussed above (par. 272). Although much was made of that letter, and he was said to have been a bodyguard of Prabowo Subianto, Lafaek Saburai did not emerge as a major player in 1999.

respectively. The militia group known as Team Pancasila, was based in the Sub-District of Atsabe in the southernmost part of the District, while Aitarak operated in the Sub-Districts of Railako and Atsabe.*

622. As in virtually every district, these militia groups had historical and institutional roots dating at least to the early years of the Indonesian invasion. With the assistance of a number of key figures, such as Tomás Gonçalves, the Indonesians had established an early militia force, known as 'Partisan,' at the time of the 1975 in-vasion. In the mid-1990s, Partisan forces received regular military training from the TNI. Together with the Wanra and Kamra groups that had been established in the 1980s, they formed an essential element in the TNI's counter-insurgency strategy.

623. These older units – Partisan, Wanra, and Kamra – remained in place through 1999, and were armed and deployed by the TNI to carry out intelligence and security operations. Partisan members were observed in 1999 wearing TNI uniforms and carrying standard issue automatic (SKS) weapons; and they continued to receive wages of Rp75,000 and some rice every month. The total Partisan strength in 1999 was estimated at 130 men.

624. Partisan and Wanra groups also provided the foundation upon which new militia groups were mobilized in early 1999. Partisan and Wanra leaders became the leaders of the new militias, and many members followed. The Wanra commander for Ermera, Miguel Babo, became the commander of Darah Integrasi, and a long-time Partisan leader, António dos Santos, became the group's Deputy, and de facto, Commander.

625. All of these groups – Partisan, Wanra, and the new militias – were closely linked to the authorities and particularly to the SGI. António dos Santos, the Deputy Commander of Darah Integrasi, was said to be the leader of an SGI group and simultaneously Village Head in Letefoho. He was also the main conduit for the distribution of wages and rice to militia members; he reportedly came to Hatolia every month in 1999 to distribute Rp100,000 and several kg of rice to militia members. The two main Partisan commanders in Gleno in 1999 were Capt. Abas and Sgt. Heru, both TNI officers attached to SGI. Finally, there is evidence that the Commander of the SGI post in Atsabe Sub-District (SGI Post Kresna 12 Atsabe) was intimately involved in coordinating Aitarak militia groups there.†

626. The militias also received political, financial, and logistical support from the regular TNI command. A document from Ermera, discussed in Chapter 8, shows clearly the military's official involvement in the distribution of funds and supplies to the militias. The document is a letter from the Dandim of Ermera, Lt. Col. Muhamad Nur, to the Bupati, dated April 1999, in which he requests Rp104 million ($13,866) to

* A document dated 22 August 1999 lists 62 Aitarak members in the village of Atudame, in Atsabe Sub-District. See: "Daftar Nama-Nama Dari Markas Besar Komando Pasukan Aitarak Sektor B," 22 August 1999 (SCU Collection, Doc #20).

† The Commander of that SGI, Amran Odhe, was one of the co-signatories of a list of 62 Aitarak members in Atudame village, in Atsabe Sub-District. The list of names was also signed by the Danramil for Atsabe, Lt. M. Roni, and the Kapolsek, Sgt. Maj. I Ketut Suriana. cover the Rp200,000 ($26.66) monthly salaries of the newly recruited Pam Swakarsa (i.e. militias) in the District. In the letter Lt. Col. Nur also requests 6,405 kg of rice for distribution to the new militia members.*

627. The Police in Ermera were somewhat less helpful to the militias than they were in some other districts, at least in the first four or five months of 1999. One of the reasons, it appeared, was that the Chief of Police for the district, Lt. Col. Ery T.B. Gultom was sympathetic to the independence cause and used his authority to protect and assist CNRT members in danger.

628. The Police position changed, however, in May 1999 when Lt. Col. Gultom was transferred, and Brimob forces were deployed to the district. Although there were individual Police officers who acted bravely to save lives, as a rule after May the Police played a more passive role, which gave the militias greater freedom of manoeuvre. Eyewitnesses to the 30 August murder of two UNAMET local staff members at Boboe Leten, for example, noted that armed Brimob forces were in a position to prevent and stop the assault, but did nothing. On the same day, shortly after a UNAMET convoy had come under fire from militias, the Brimob officer in charge told UNAMET electoral staff and Civpols in Atsabe: "We saved you today: Tomorrow we do not know."

629. As in some other districts the pro-autonomy organisation, FPDK, also played a significant role in supporting the militias, primarily by serving as a conduit for official (and perhaps unofficial) funds. Such funds were channeled through the FPDK Security Chief who, conveniently, was the Deputy Commander of the Darah Integrasi, António dos Santos.

630. In contrast to several other Districts, most notably neighbouring Bobonaro and Liquiçá, the militias in Ermera did not have the strong backing of the Bupati, Constantino Soares. On the contrary, Soares frequently lent his assistance to CNRT and Clandestine Front members who were in danger. And while he was formally the chair of the district office of the BRTT, he did little more than was required of him by way of supporting the pro-autonomy cause and militia groups. His position, together with the existence of a strong CNRT and clandestine network in the district, helps to explain the slow growth of the militias in Ermera. It also suggests why Soares continued to be well regarded in the district even after the referendum.

Major human rights events

631. The early months of 1999 in Ermera were marked by the influx of thousands of IDPs from neighbouring districts. A campaign of threats and intimidation by militias in Liquiçá District, for example, prompted thousands to flee to Hatolia Sub-District for safety in January and February 1999. Others fled from neighboring Bobonaro District and from different parts of Ermera itself. By June, when UNAMET arrived, the number of IDPs in the district was estimated at 3,000-4,000.

* Only the newly recruited members, of whom there were 175 in Ermera, would receive Rp200,000/month ($26.66). The rate for old members, of whom there were 136, was set at Rp125,000/month ($16.66). Letter from Lt. Col. Muhamad Nur, District Military Commander1637/Ermera, to the Bupati of Ermera, "Permohonan Uang Saku PAM Swakarsa," June 1999. A copy of this document is in the author's possession.

632. Tensions mounted in February 1999 when TNI and pro-autonomy leaders reported that eleven militiamen – possibly Mahidi from neighboring Ainaro – had been detained in Ermera, transferred to Falintil custody in Hatolia Sub-District, and then killed. The bodies were reportedly discovered in Fatubessi, in May 1999, and a CNRT member was said to have been tried for his role in the abduction. Further details of the alleged killings were difficult to confirm, and Falintil denied involvement, but the reported killings provided added stimulus to pro-autonomy activities, and to the mobilisation of new militia groups. So too did the reported detention of six militiamen by Falintil for about one week in early April.

633. Finally, in early April 1999, the killing of independence supporters began, setting in motion a two-month campaign of intimidation and terror against supporters of independence that left at least 20 people dead. In contrast to the pattern in many other districts, many of these killings were not committed by militiamen but by TNI units – including Kodim and combat troops – acting alone or in concert with militia forces. Moreover, the circumstances in which this wave of killings began strongly suggested that it was part of a campaign coordinated by the TNI.

634. On 9 April 1999, the Dandim Lt. Col. Muhamad Nur met leaders of Darah Integrasi, FPDK and BRTT in the district capital, Gleno. The following day, 10 April, TNI and militiamen together burned down the CNRT headquarters in Gleno, and killed a well-known CNRT supporter and local parliamentarian, António Lima. Further killings followed over the next few weeks, including four people killed in the village of Talimoro in two days. The violence continued unabated through May 1999. Three people were killed by TNI forces in Poerema village, Hatolia Sub-District, on 10 May. Six more were killed by a combined TNI/militia force in the village of Atara, Atsabe Sub-District, on 16 May.

635. With the arrival of UNAMET in the district in June, the overt physical violence subsided, but the atmosphere of intimidation remained, and grew steadily worse as the ballot date drew near. Villagers and humanitarian workers who sought to assist IDPs in the district were a special focus of hostility by pro-autonomy groups. So too were student activists who arrived in the district in July to carry out voter edu-cation and, in reality, to campaign for independence. To an extent seen in only a handful of other districts, UNAMET local staff members were also major targets of anger and intimidation by militia and TNI forces.

636. Within hours of the ballot, this pattern of intimidation erupted again in overt violence. Between 30 August and 22 September, at least 67 people were killed in the district. Of those, at least five were UNAMET local staff members. In addition to those killed, roughly 17,000 people fled or were forcibly displaced from their homes in this period, as a result of a systematic campaign of terror and violence. The homes of those who had left, as well as most public buildings, were looted and burned.

637. As in other districts, the post-ballot campaign of violence in Ermera was conducted jointly by the TNI, Police, and militias. As in other districts, too, the evacuation and destruction was concentrated in certain areas – notably those closest to major roads leading to West Timor. Hardest hit was the Sub-District of Atsabe, from which some 50% of the population was forcibly evacuated. Areas further from the main roads, and with a sizeable Falintil presence, such as parts of Hatolia, were much less seriously affected.

638. The first victims of the post-ballot violence, in Ermera and in the country as a whole, were two UNAMET local staff members. João Lopes and Orlando Gomes were beaten and stabbed to death as they carried ballot boxes from the polling station at Boboe Leten to the UNAMET vehicles. A third local staff member, Alvaro Lopes, was seriously wounded in the same attack, and left for dead, but survived. Later investigations revealed that the attack was carried out with the prior knowledge of the Sub-District military commander for Atsabe, and that TNI and Brimob forces were at the scene but had done nothing to stop the attack. (See Case Study: The Murder of UNAMET Local Staff in Boboe Leten, par. 871).

639. The attack at Boboe Leten was not an isolated incident. In the hours and days after the ballot, militias threatened and attacked UNAMET staff and installations throughout the district. As a result, all UNAMET staff were called back to the regional headquarters in Gleno. Even there, however, their safety could not be guaranteed, as militiamen wandered the streets firing their weapons, setting fire to buildings and pulling suspected independence supporters from their vehicles at road-blocks.

640. In a number of instances, notably at Boboe Leten, armed militias accompanied by TNI and Police prevented UNAMET staff from leaving their polling stations, or sought to keep them from taking the ballot boxes with them. On 31 August, militias threw stones and fired weapons at the UNAMET helicopter that had landed at Gleno to retrieve the ballot boxes for the district. Police did not act to prevent the attack. In fact, an MLO reported seeing a policeman handing a weapon to a militiaman at the scene shortly before the attack.

641. In the face of the mounting violence, UNAMET staff evacuated to the relative safety of Dili. With UNAMET's departure, the situation in Ermera deteriorated further, and the targeted killings began in earnest. One of those singled out was Ana Xavier da Conceição Lemos. An active member of the pro-independence women's organisation, OMT, she had served as a UNAMET queue-controller on polling day. With the assistance of a Brimob officer, she had made her way to Gleno shortly after the close of balloting. Later that night, she was accosted and beaten in her home by a TNI officer, Sgt. Melky and several other men. She eventually made it to UNAMET headquarters in Gleno and she accompanied the UNAMET convoy to Dili. A few days later, however, she returned to Gleno to see that her children were safe. Upon her return she was detained first at the Kodim, and then handed over to militiamen, who raped and killed her (See Case Study: Rape and Murder of Ana Lemos, par. 964).

642. These were only some of the better-known examples of the terrible violence that gripped Ermera in September. Less well known is the case of Georgina Imaculada Tilman Ribeiro, who was killed together with five of her children (ages 2 to 12), after she had fled to the apparent safety of West Timor. Like Ana Lemos, Georgina Tilman was a member of the OMT (Organização da Mulher Timor – Organisation of Timorese Women), and her husband was an active member of the Clandestine Front. Having made it to the other side of the border, on 18 September she and her children crossed back into Timor-Leste with men who said they had been sent by her husband. All six of them subsequently disappeared. Georgina's remains, and those of her five children, were discovered in February 2000, rudely buried in a dry creek bed, in Kampung Mahir about 13 km from the town of Atabae in Maliana district. Among the suspected perpetrators of this crime was Sgt. Melky, the TNI officer also accused of raping and killing Ana Lemos.

643. Lautém (Kodim 1629)

- Dandim: Lt. Col. Sudrajat A.S.
- Bupati: Edmundo da Conceição Silva
- Kapolres: Lt. Col. (Pol.) Drs. Irsan Wijaya
- Militias: Team Alfa
- No. killed: 53

644. Lautém suffered serious human rights violations in 1999, the vast majority of them in the post-ballot period.* At least 53 people were killed during the year, and of that number 51 died during a three week period in September. In that same period, an estimated 6,000 people fled to West Timor, and thousands of others to the hills, in the face of mounting violence and destruction.

Militias and authorities

645. The main perpetrators of human rights violations in Lautém district were members of the local militia group, Team Alfa, and soldiers from various TNI units, notably Kopassus and Battalion 745, which had its headquarters in Lospalos. Team Alfa had especially close ties to Kopassus, and operated under its command. Battalion 745 was less well connected to Team Alfa, and more often committed human rights violations independently.

646. Team Alfa had been set up by Kopassus in the mid-1980s, to infiltrate the clandestine movement and to assist in combat operations. That institutional tie remained in 1999. Team Alfa operated out of the Kopassus headquarters in Laurara in Lospalos town, and shared logistical support and transportation with Kopassus personnel. Team Alfa was directly controlled by the Kopassus officer Sgt. Syaful Anwar and by the Kopassus commander for Lautém District, Lt. Rahman (a.k.a. Rahmat) Zulkarnaen.

647. The direct link between Team Alfa and Kopassus was confirmed by a former Team Alfa leader, Jony Marques, during his trial in 2001. Testifying under oath, Marques said he had been trained by Kopassus, and that he had been invited in 1993 to take part in military training with Australian forces in Bandung, Indonesia, under the guise of being a TNI soldier.* He also told the court that, in 1999, Team Alfa reported to the Kopassus headquarters in Lospalos: "As a Team Alfa member," he said, "I had to go there."†

* Unless otherwise noted, this account is based on UNTAET, DHRO-Lautém, "Lautém District Events of 1999 Report," March, 2002; Dili District Court, Special Panel for Special Crimes, "Judgement" in the case of Jony Marques et al., 11 December 2001; and General Prosecutor of the Democratic Republic of East Timor, Indictment against Edmundo da Conceição Silva et al. 15 November 2002.

648. Team Alfa also had the strong backing of the Bupati of Lautém, Edmundo da Conceição Silva. The Bupati's support was unsurprising given his own close tie with Kopassus, of which he was an honorary member. As in other districts, the funding for the militia was channelled first through the Bupati's office, but then passed on to other agencies, including the TNI, for distribution to the militias. The Bupati was also the General Chairman of the BRTT, and its members provided security at his residence. There are unconfirmed allegations that the Bupati distributed 117 guns to militias and/or the BRTT in early 1999.

649. Operating independently from Kopassus, and sometimes in conflict with it, was Battalion 745, based in Fuiloro village. Members of Battalion 745 were directly involved in widespread violations of human rights in 1999, including house burning, intimidation, beatings, and at least 21 arbitrary killings. Many of those killings were committed as the Battalion withdrew from Lautém to Dili and on to West Timor in late September. Most notoriously, members of the Battalion were responsible for the murder in Dili of Dutch journalist Sander Thoenes on 21 September 1999 (See Case Study: Battalion 745 Rampage, par. 981).

650. Established in 1976, Battalion 745 was one of two so-called 'organic' combat battalions in Timor-Leste. A substantial proportion of its soldiers were East Timorese, while most of its commanding officers were Indonesian. In the lead-up to the 1999 referendum, there were indications that some of the East Timorese soldiers were sympathetic to independence. The unit's commanders therefore took measures to ensure that those soldiers were not included in military operations, and were kept out of the loop with regard to planning. In the post-ballot period, some of those soldiers were targeted and killed. At the same time, the Battalion cooperated with Team Alfa members, even permitting them to review the Battalion's lists of displaced persons to check for possible supporters of independence.

651. Other military units and officers in the district were also involved in violence, though somewhat less conspicuously. The Kodim headquarters, under the command of Lt. Col. Sudrajat, was reportedly used as a site for the detention and beating of suspected supporters of independence. Witnesses, including the militia leader Jony Marques, have testified under oath at trial that a number of people were tortured and killed there, and that their bodies were discovered nearby.‡ Two 'non-organic' combat battalions, Battalion 621 and Battalion 623, based temporarily in Lautém, appear less frequently in testimonies of violence.

Major human rights events

652. Apart from two killings in April 1999, there were relatively few serious human rights incidents in the pre-UNAMET and UNAMET periods.* However, as in other districts, there was a great deal of intimidation in connection with the government's pro-autonomy 'socialisation' campaign.

633. Public 'socialisation' meetings were commonly addressed by TNI officers, the Bupati and by BRTT and militia leaders. In the course of these meetings the speakers, some of whom carried weapons, issued threats. A common threat was: "UNAMET will leave on 30 August 1999 and then we will kill you." UNAMET staff, both international and local, were also subjected to threats and intimidation, including pelting with rocks.

654. The most conspicuous incident of violence in the pre-ballot period was the murder of the Liurai of Lautém, Verissimo Dias Quintas, on 27 August 1999. Having portrayed himself to Indonesians as a supporter of Indonesian rule, he seems nevertheless to have been a secret supporter of independence. In early August, he allowed the CNRT to establish their district office in his residential compound. That decision seems to have made him a particular target of the pro-autonomy camp.

655. Reports at the time strongly suggested official complicity in the murder. Indonesian Police established a roadblock prior to the incident, and neither Police nor TNI troops nearby moved to halt the attack once it was underway. Kopassus forces reportedly provided transport for the attackers. As in virtually every killing in 1999, Indonesian Police conducted only perfunctory investigations, and brought no charges against the alleged perpetrators.

656. Later investigations into Quintas' murder confirmed that the assailants had included members of the BRTT and the Team Alfa militia group. They also demonstrated that the attackers had been directed and assisted by Kopassus, Police, and civilian authorities. An indictment issued by Timor-Leste's Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes in November 2002 explicitly implicated the Kopassus commander for Lautém, Lt. Rahman Zulkarnaen, Kopassus officer Sgt. Syaful Anwar, the Bupati, Edmundo da Conceição da Silva, as well as members of Team Alfa and the BRTT.†

657. Ballot day was tense in Lautém, and armed militias moved freely about the district. As in the rest of the territory, however, there were no serious acts of violence during balloting. While tensions continued to rise in the immediate post-ballot period, and the church in Lospalos was burned on 5 September, the violence did not begin in earnest until after UNAMET and other international observers left the district on 7 September.

* One important exception was the torture and murder of Evaristo Lopes in April 1999. Witnesses, including militia leader Jony Marques, have testified that Lopes' was tortured and executed while in custody, and under the direct supervision of local Kopassus officer, Sgt. Syaful Anwar. See Dili District Court, "Judgement," Jony Marques et al., pp. 53-57.

† General Prosecutor of the Democratic Republic of East Timor, Indictment against Edmundo da Conceição Silva et al. 15 November 2002.

658. Over the next three weeks more than 50 people were killed by Team Alfa and TNI soldiers. The killings occurred almost entirely in the Sub-Districts of Lospalos and Muro. No killings were reported in the Sub-Districts of Iliomar, Tutuala, and Luro, although these latter areas were extensively burned. Virtually all of the victims were well-known supporters of independence.

659. The worst single incident in the post-ballot period occurred on 25 September, near Verokoco village, on the main road from Lautém to Baucau. There, Team Alfa members ambushed and executed a group of five clergy and four lay people.* The victims included a nun who was hacked with a machete as she knelt praying by the roadside, then thrown into a river and shot dead.† Although the immediate perpetrators were members of Team Alfa, the local Kopassus officer, Sgt. Syaful Anwar, was also implicated in the massacre (See Case Study: Murder of Lospalos Clergy, par. 1002).

660. Members of Battalion 745, including the Battalion commander, Maj. Jacob Sarosa, and a Platoon commander, Lt. Camilo dos Santos, were also directly implicated in serious human rights violations in the post-ballot period, including as many as 21 extrajudicial executions. Several of those killings took place in the immediate vicinity of the Battalion's compound (e.g. in Asalaino, Home Baru and Motolari). The bodies of some of the dead were found in wells inside the compound.

661. On 20 September, after most of the battalion had left by ship for Indonesia, some 120 soldiers and officers, including Maj. Sarosa and Lt. Camilo, formed a convoy and prepared to depart for Dili and onward to West Timor. Before leaving, Lt. Camilo reportedly briefed the soldiers. An East Timorese officer who was there, later told UN investigators that Lt. Camilo had told the soldiers: "If you find anything on the way ... just shoot it."‡ That order, the witness said, was issued within earshot of the Battalion Commander, Maj. Sarosa. The same day TNI soldiers beat and then killed three men near a rice warehouse in Lautém. Maj. Sarosa and Lt. Camilo were reportedly at the scene, but did not intervene. The next day, the convoy moved out of Lautém toward West Timor, leaving a path of killing and destruction in its wake. By the time it reached Dili, two days later, at least 13 more people had been killed by members of the Battalion (See Case Study: Battalion 745 Rampage, par. 981).

662. In addition to killing, in the post-ballot period members of Team Alfa, Kopassus, and Battalion 745 conducted a systematic campaign to destroy the infrastructure of the territory, and to deport a large part of the population. Although there was some variation in the extent of destruction – with the Sub-District of Luro being worst hit – most buildings in the district, including government buildings, shops and private homes, were burned or destroyed. Livestock was killed and communications systems

664. The District of Liquiçá was a notorious centre of militia and TNI violence in 1999.* As many as 183 civilians were reportedly killed there during the year, the vast majority of them leaders or supporters of independence, and their relatives. In addition, some 20,000 residents were forced to flee their homes, both before the vote and afterward, in the face of systematic intimidation and violence.

Militias and authorities

665. The main militia group in the district was the BMP (Besi Merah Putih – Red and White Iron).† First formed in January 1999 in the Sub-District of Maubara, the BMP soon established command posts ('pos komando') throughout the district. By June 1999, it had an estimated strength of 600 men. Most were armed with so-called 'traditional' weapons, such as machetes and knives, but some carried firearms including high-powered automatic weapons of the sort used by the TNI.

666. Like the Aitarak militia in Dili, the BMP did not confine its operations to one district. With the evident approval of district and provincial authorities it took part in serious acts of violence in Dili, including the attack on the home of Manuel Carrascalão in April that left at least 12 people dead. Members of the BMP also traveled as far as Oecussi, where they are reported to have operated alongside the Sakunar militia in September 1999.

667. Although nominally led by Manuel Sousa, the BMP was created, trained, and coordinated by the highest-ranking military and civilian authorities in the district and the province. The group was formed in late 1998 following a meeting called by the Bupati, Leoneto Martins. An honorary member of Kopassus, Martins remained one of the BMP's principal backers throughout 1999. Before becoming Bupati in 1995, Martins had served as Sub-District Head in Maubara, which was also the location of his home village. It was probably not a coincidence that the first BMP posts were established in that sub-district, and that it remained the group's main base area through 1999.

* Unless otherwise noted, this account is based on the following sources: UNTAET, UNMO-Liquiçá, "History of Liquiçá District Through 1999," December 1999; UNTAET, DHRO-Liquiçá, "Narrative Report on Events in Liquiçá District During 1999"; and UNTAET, General Prosecutor, Indictment against Leoneto Martins et al., Dili, [n.d.].

† A much smaller group, called Pana, was formed in the village of Vatuboro, the home village of Bupati, Leoneto Martins.

668. The BMP, like other militias, also had the solid backing of the TNI and Kopassus at the district level. In fact, the BMP grew directly out of an earlier group, Gadapaksi, established, funded, and trained by Kopassus beginning in 1995. With the formation of the BMP in early 1999, many of the roughly 200 members of Gadapaksi in Liquiçá simply moved into the new group. Likewise, TNI and Kopassus backing continued, albeit under a new name and with renewed vigour.

669. TNI and Kopassus backing for the BMP in 1999 took a variety of forms, including public expressions of support, the provision of military training, the conduct of joint operations, and official inaction in the face of unlawful militia conduct. As discussed previously (par. 431, above), internal TNI documents demonstrate that the provision of militia training and guidance were a routine matter, carried out with the full knowledge of TNI commanders. One such document, from the Liquiçá Kodim, reveals that the Sub-Regional Military Commander, Col. Tono Suratman visited Maubara on 16 April 1999, to address and give 'guidance' to a group of 500 BMP militias at the Koramil headquarters there.*

670. TNI officers also routinely conducted joint military operations with the BMP, or acquiesced in their operations. As described below, several high-ranking TNI officers, including Kopassus personnel, were on the scene when BMP militias massacred as many as 60 refugees at the church in Liquiçá in April 1999. Although such joint operations were more common in the pre-UNAMET period, they continued in some form throughout the rest of the year. A UNTAET report from 14 December 1999 describes the situation in late June 1999:

> "At this stage the militia clearly had the run of the town. Large groups of men, armed with machetes and home-made weapons were a common sight throughout the district. It was not uncommon to come across groups of militia, accompanied by TNI, moving through villages and burning houses in broad daylight."†

671. In addition to providing training and operational support, TNI officers were effectively integrated into the BMP's leadership and command structure. The most notorious BMP commander was the TNI Sgt. Tome Diogo. A local man who had served in the TNI for many years, Sgt. Diogo had a fearsome reputation in the district, and was an intelligence officer.‡ The Sub-District Military Commander (Danramil) for Maubara, the center of BMP operations, was a Kopassus officer, Sgt. Maj. Carlos Amaral.§

§ According to a list prepared by UNTAET Civpol, there were seven Kopassus SGI members in Maubara alone. See UNTAET, "Roster of Troops: Kopassus SGI Maubara," Liquiçá, [n.d.]

672. The importance of the link between the TNI and the militias was also evident in the geographical distribution of the main BMP command posts in the district. One of the first posts was established in Vatuboro village, where Battalion 143 was based.* Three more BMP command posts were set up in the villages of Vaviquinia, Dato, and Fatumasi, where three more Sub-District Military Commands were located. A fifth post was created in Maumeta village, in Bazartete Sub-District, which was also the location of a Kopassus base.†

673. Finally, the BMP had at least the tacit support of district Police authorities. As in other Districts, the Police in Liquiçá routinely turned a blind eye to militia activities including serious acts of violence. In some cases, such as the Liquiçá church massacre, Police officers and troops played a more directly supportive role. The most conspicuous police ally of the BMP was Lt. Col. (Pol.) Adios Salosa, who was Liquiçá Chief of Police until July 1999. His successor, Maj. (Pol.) Joko Irianto, played a somewhat less active role in support of the militia.

674. In sum, the key authorities involved in organising and supporting the BMP included, at a minimum the Bupati of Liquiçá, Leoneto Martins; the Commander of the Kopassus 'Satgas Tribuana,' Lt. Col. Yayat Sudrajat; the District Military Commander, Lt. Col. Asep Kuswandi; the Kodim Chief of Staff, Capt. Purwanto; the Kodim intelligence officer, Sgt. Tome Diogo; the Maubara Sub-District Mili¬tary Commander, Sgt. Maj. Carlos Amaral; and the District Chief of Police, Lt. Col. Adios Salosa.

Major human rights events

675. Serious acts of violence – including beating, house burning, and murder – began in Liquiçá as early as January 1999, forcing thousands of residents to flee their homes. Villages deemed to be sympathetic to Falintil bore the brunt of these attacks. The village of Guiço in Maubara Sub-District, for example, was attacked on four separate occasions in January and February. The perpetrators of those attacks included BMP militiamen and soldiers of Battalions 143 and 144 based in nearby Caicassa and Vatuboro.

676. The violence escalated further in early April, as a result of which thousands more fled to the mountains or to the Catholic church in Liquiçá town. By some estimates there were now as many as 6,000 internally displaced people in the district, in a total population of only 50,000. A large number of IDPs gathered in the vicinity of Loes, in Maubara Sub-District, an area with a strong Falintil presence, and therefore considered relatively safe. Nevertheless, the people there remained vulnerable to attack, and lacked access to sufficient food, housing, and medical care.

677. Against this background, BMP militias and TNI soldiers began a concerted campaign of violence against the IDPs. The campaign, which reached its peak in early April 1999, revealed the intimate links between the BMP and both military and civilian authorities.

* The BMP camp commander at Vatuboro and his brother were often seen in the Battalion 143 compound, and rice was delivered to the local BMP from the Battalion 143 camp.

† Kopassus had additional posts in Dato (in the official residence of a government official), in Maumete, and in Lunturi.

678. One of the victims of this wave of violence, Ilidio dos Santos, was killed by militiamen near the Liquiçá Sub-District Military Command on 5 April 1999.* Dos Santos had sought refuge there but rather than finding protection, he was confronted by six militiamen who announced their intention to kill him. He attempted to flee but was soon captured, and killed with a machete. TNI and SGI officers at the Koramil post reportedly made no attempt to stop his assailants.

679. Another victim, Fernando da Costa, was arrested on 5 April, and killed in TNI custody two days later.† Da Costa, a CNRT supporter, was detained in Liquiçá town by a group of TNI, BMP militiamen and Police who had been moving house to house in search of known CNRT leaders. Outside his house, he was badly beaten by TNI soldiers. He was then taken to the Liquiçá District Police Station, where he was detained for two days, during which time he reportedly suffered further beatings by a TNI soldier. On 7 April, he was taken from his cell to the Liquiçá Sub-District Military Command (Koramil) by TNI soldiers. From there he was transported to the Maubara Sub-District Military Command, accompanied by TNI Sgt. Tome Diogo and BMP leader, Zacarias Alves. Shortly after arriving there, he was stabbed repeatedly and killed.

680. The violent events of early April culminated in the massacre of as many as 60 people in Liquiçá church on 6 April 1999. Those killed had taken refuge in the church in the face of the escalating militia violence. Although the attack was carried out mainly by BMP militiamen, eyewitnesses have testified that TNI (including Kopassus) and Brimob troops backed up the militias and fired their weapons during the attack. Those involved were said to include soldiers from Kopassus 'Satgas Tribuana;' Battalion 143; the Liquiçá District Military Command (Kodim); the Maubara Sub-District Military Command (Koramil); and the Police Mobile Brigades (Brimob).

681. Several eyewitnesses have testified that senior TNI officers and civilian officials were in the immediate vicinity at the time of the attack. They included: the Dandim, Lt. Col. Asep Kuswandi; the Commander of the Kopassus unit Satgas Tribuana, Lt. Col. Yayat Sudrajat; the Bupati, Leoneto Martins; and the Chief of Police, Lt. Col. (Pol.) Adios Salosa. Those authorities took no effective measures to prevent the attack, to stop it once it had begun, to investigate the incident, or to bring the suspected perpetrators to justice. Indeed, there was circumstantial evidence that these authorities had prior knowledge of, and may even have planned, the attack (See Case Study: Liquiçá Church Massacre, par. 768).

682. In the days and weeks after the massacre, the attacks on independence supporters spread throughout Liquiçá. At least six more people were killed in different parts of the district in April, and houses were burned and looted. In the face of the mounting violence, thousands more residents fled to the forest around Loes, Hatuquesi, and Dare. Some also went to Dili, and environs, bringing the total estimated number of people dislocated from their homes in the district to more than 10,000. In Dili, some 150 IDPs took refuge in the home of the respected pro-independence figure Manuel Carrascalão. Less than two weeks later, on 17 April, the IDPs in that house were also attacked by militias and TNI, and at least 12 were killed (See Case Study: Carrascalão House Massacre, par. 803).

683. Overt violence diminished somewhat with the deployment of UNAMET to the district in late June, but systematic intimidation continued and BMP militias, often bearing arms, continued to roam freely about the district. The main difference was that the targets of militia and TNI intimidation now included UNAMET staff and humanitarian workers. Local UNAMET staff in particular were repeatedly threatened, and on occasion assaulted, by BMP militiamen. There were also several incidents in which militiamen pointed weapons at UN vehicles and personnel as they drove by in trucks and minibuses. No action was taken against the perpetrators, indicating that their behaviour was officially condoned.

684. The complicity of TNI and Police officials in the pattern of intimidation and violence was highlighted by an attack on a humanitarian convoy on 4 July. The convoy, which was accompanied by UNAMET's Humanitarian Affairs Officer and escorted by UNAMET MLOs, had stopped in Liquiçá town after delivering food and medicine to IDPs in the vicinity of Loes. Shortly after the convoy stopped, it was attacked by about a dozen BMP militiamen, swinging machetes and firing home-made guns. One person was seriously injured in the attack and the vehicles were badly damaged. Indonesian Police and TNI in the immediate vicinity did nothing to stop the attack. Their inaction contributed to UNAMET's decision to conduct an emergency evacuation of all personnel later the same day. Suspicions of official complicity were confirmed by later events, most notably by the wholly inadequate Police investigation of the incident (See Case Study: Attack on Humanitarian Convoy, par. 852).

685. The intimidation and low-level violence intensified during the campaign period in August and continued until ballot day. On 8 August, a UNAMET employee named Mariano da Costa was detained and beaten by BMP militiamen who suspected him of being a CNRT member. On the order of TNI Sgt. Tome Diogo and BMP commander Zacharia Alves, he was driven away, and never seen again. Militiamen later reported that Mariano da Costa had been stabbed to death.* Also in August, a group of six CNRT activists was arrested by Police and militia as they entered Liquiçá. They were beaten and held in custody for six days 'for their own protection.'

686. The violence and intimidation made it virtually impossible for the CNRT to campaign openly. It also inhibited the return of IDPs to their home villages. Despite these problems, and a legitimate fear of further violence, voter turn-out on 30 August was high; a special polling centre established near one of the main IDP concentrations ensured that most IDPs were able to cast a vote.

687. As in other districts, polling day was relatively quiet. However, tension mounted in the days after the vote and, with the announcement of the result on 4 September, a systematic campaign of violence began. Within hours of the announcement, houses in Liquiçá town started to burn, automatic weapons fire could be heard, and armed militias began to roam freely around the towns and villages. Over the next three weeks, thousands of people were placed on trucks and driven across the border, and an unknown number were killed. An UNTAET report from December 1999, noted that 77 bodies had already been recovered in the district, and that another 61 inquiries were still under investigation.* By early 2003, the number of reported killings in the district had reached 183.

688. The dead included three men, all suspected supporters of the CNRT, who were detained by TNI soldiers and BMP militiamen in Metagou village on 3 September. The three men were severely beaten and then killed the following day, 4 September, immediately after the results of the ballot were announced.† Other victims included three men, all suspected CNRT members, who were deliberately killed on 7 September in the village of Buka Mera by a combined team of TNI soldiers and BMP militiamen.‡ In each case, the soldiers and militiamen went to the homes of the victims and asked for them by name before killing them.

689. The operation to forcibly relocate the population reportedly began in Fatumasi village, in Bazartete Sub-District. People were taken from their homes to the church compound in Liquiçá and the beach in Dato. From there, they were loaded onto several vessels bound for West Timor. After the forcible evacuation of its residents, Fatumasi was burned to the ground. The same process was then repeated in Mataulun, Ipelu, and Liquiçá town. A similar pattern of forcible evacuation and destruction was observed in Maubara Sub-District, except that the bulk of the population there was loaded onto trucks and transported overland. Highland villages were less seriously affected, perhaps because access was difficult, and perhaps because the militia and TNI were reluctant to venture into areas traditionally controlled by Falintil forces.

690. All told, an estimated 20,000 people were forcibly relocated from their homes in Liquiçá and up to 80% of the buildings were destroyed or damaged.§ In every known instance, the relocation operation and destruction were carried out jointly by TNI soldiers, Police, and BMP militias, assisted in some cases by Aitarak members sent from Dili. In short, the general pattern of post-ballot violence in Liquiçá provided strong evidence that the campaign was conducted with the knowledge and approval of Police and TNI authorities.

691. One particularly revealing incident was the armed attack on UNAMET staff as they attempted to evacuate Liquiçá town on 4 September. As the convoy left the UN compound, it came under sustained weapons fire from several attackers, including some who were identified as Indonesian Police and TNI officers. Each of the six vehicles

‡ The three killed in Buka Mera were: Paulo Gonçalves, Guilhermo Alves, and Clementino Gonçalves. See UNTAET, General Prosecutor, Indictment against Leoneto Martins et al., paragraphs 158-166.

§ These are approximate figures. UNTAET's DHRO-Liquiçá estimated that 25,000 were displaced, while an UNTAET report of December 1999 said that roughly one third of the population (i.e. c.18,000) were forced to flee.

was hit an average of 15 times, with single and automatic shots. One Civpol officer, Earl Candler, was gravely wounded in the attack, receiving two rounds in the stomach and one under the arm. At the Liquiçá District Police station, in the immediate aftermath of the attack, militia leaders were seen together with TNI liaison officers and Police. The militia leaders, moreover, were holding two-way radios and were judged to be coordinating militia activity. As the UN helicopter came in to evacuate the wounded Civpol officer, the Police, and TNI officers present also allowed militiamen to fire their weapons at it.

692. The BMP militia and TNI began to leave Liquiçá on about 20 September. By the time Interfet forces arrived there on 28 September, there were only a handful of militiamen remaining, and they departed the same day.

693. Manatuto (Kodim 1631)

- Dandim: Lt. Col. Sulastiyo; Lt. Col. Gerson Ponto
- Bupati: Vidal Doutel Sarmento
- Kapolres: Lt. Col. (Pol.) Drs. Johan A. Sumampow
- Militias: Morok, Mahadomi
- No. killed: 32

694. At least 32 people, and probably more, were arbitrarily executed in Manatuto in 1999.* As in other districts, most of the victims were real or alleged supporters of independence, and most were killed in April-May, or in the immediate aftermath of the 30 August ballot. In the pre-UNAMET period, the main perpetrators of serious human rights violations were TNI soldiers, while in the post-ballot period, militia members played an equally prominent role. The district also suffered extensive property destruction, looting and forcible evacuation in the post-ballot period.

Militias and authorities

695. The two principal militia groups in Manatuto were Morok and Mahadomi (Manatuto Hadomi Otonomi – Manatuto Loves Autonomy). Morok was the older of the two, having been established several years earlier. Based in the central-western Sub-Districts of Laclubar and Soibada, Morok was led in early 1999 by TNI officer Filomeno Lopes da Cruz. With his murder in mid-April, allegedly by Falintil forces, the field leadership of Morok passed to Domingos Metan.† Mahadomi was a newer group, created in early 1999 as part of the government's plan to 'socialise' the autonomy option. Based in the Sub-District of Manatuto, Mahadomi's main field commanders were Aleixo de Carvalho and Filomeno Barreto.

696. Despite differences in age and base of operations, Morok and Mahadomi worked closely together in 1999. In fact, according to some observers, the two groups were formally amalgamated as a single unit, under the name Mahadomi in May 1999.

697. The principal backer of the militias in the Manatuto district, and formally their overall commander, was the Bupati, Vidal Doutel Sarmento. Witnesses who attended official meetings with him in 1999 said that he frequently remarked that, if the autonomy option did not win, Manatuto would burn. Although a civilian official, the Bupati was known to have close ties with the TNI and particularly with Kopassus. Indeed, like a number of senior East Timorese government officials, he had been designated an honorary Kopassus officer. As tensions rose in the aftermath of the vote, Sarmento is reported to have donned his Kopassus officer's uniform.

698. Mahadomi and Morok also had the backing of virtually the entire military and civilian apparatus at the district and provincial level. That backing was openly expressed in a series of official ceremonies for the inauguration of the militias, and the disbanding of the CNRT, that took place throughout the district in May 1999.

699. One such ceremony, held in Manatuto town on 8 May 1999 was led by the Bupati, and attended by the District Military Commander, Lt. Col. Sulastiyo, the Sub-Regional Military Commander, Col. Tono Suratman, and a variety of pro-autonomy figures from Baucau, Dili and Lautém. The keynote speaker at the ceremony was Indonesia's Ambassador at large for Timor-Leste, Francisco Lopes da Cruz, who happened also to be the brother of the recently killed militia leader, Filomeno Lopes da Cruz. A secret military intelligence report, dated 12 May 1999, reporting on the event, claimed that some 5,000 local people attended.[*]

700. A similar ceremony was held in the Sub-District of Laclubar on 17 May. According to a situation report from the Military Intelligence staff of the Manatuto Kodim to the Korem Head of Intelligence, that ceremony was attended by the District Military Commander, by officers and soldiers of Infantry Battalion 301/PKS, and Brimob troops.[†]

701. In addition to such public displays of official support, the militias in Manatuto also had practical backing from TNI officers and soldiers. The public face of TNI support for the militias was the District Military Commander, Lt. Col. Sulastiyo. With his transfer in July or August 1999, that role was assumed by his successor, Lt Col. Gerson Ponto.[‡] By most accounts, however, Lt. Col. Ponto was not a strong supporter of the militias, and indeed may have helped to limit militia violence during his brief tenure.

† Kodim/1631 Manatuto, Perwira Seksi Intelijen to Kasi Intel Korem 164/WD and others. Secret Daily Situation Report, 20 May 1999 (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #24).

‡ According to some sources, Lt. Col. Sulastiyo was replaced in July 1999 by Lt. Col. Gerson Ponto (a.k.a. Lexi Herson Ponto). Other sources suggest that Sulastiyo remained as Dandim until mid-August 1999.

702. In any case, the District Commanders were not acting alone. Testimony from a former TNI member in Manatuto indicates that officers and soldiers associated with Kopassus and military intelligence played a crucial role in the mobilisation and training of the militias there. A central Kopassus figure in the district was Lt. Col. Nyus Rahasia, the Deputy Commander of Combat Sector B, who was reportedly in Manatuto from mid-May to mid-June coordinating military-style training for militias.

703. At least four other Kopassus officers remained in the district, training and operating with militias in Manatuto in 1999. Three of these officers – identified only as Wayan, Ipon, and Agus – reportedly delivered weapons to the Bupati's residence on 4 September 1999. Those weapons were subsequently distributed to Mahadomi militia members and used in committing serious human rights violations, including arbitrary killings in the ensuing weeks.

704. The claim that Kopassus and intelligence officers played a central role in Manatuto is supported by documentary evidence. A crucial piece of evidence comes from the military intelligence report of 20 May mentioned above. Prepared by a Military Intelligence officer at the Kodim for the Korem Head of Intelligence, Maj. Bambang Wisnumurty, and copied to the Commander of Kopassus Satgas Tribuana, the report states explicitly that on 17 May 1999 two senior TNI officers had given "guidance" to militiamen at the Morok militia base in Manatuto. Although not mentioned by name, the two officers in question were described as the "Commander of Sector A" and the "Commander of Sub-Sector Manatuto." The Commander of Sector A was Col. Sunarko, and the Commander of Sub-Sector Manatuto was probably Lt. Col. Nyus Rahasia.

705. These men, both Kopassus officers, were among the highest ranking and most powerful TNI officers in the territory. The fact that their actions were reported routinely, and without censure, in an intelligence report to the Korem Head of Intelligence, indicates that they were not considered 'rogue elements' and that their actions were in fact consistent with established TNI norms and procedures.

Major human rights events

706. The first victim to fall in Manatuto District in 1999 was not a pro-independence figure but the Morok militia leader, Filomeno Lopes da Cruz. He was shot and killed in mid-April, allegedly by Falintil forces, in Seur Tulan village, Laclubar Sub-District. In the following days, at least three pro-independence activists were killed by TNI troops, and a village was burned, in apparent retaliation for his murder.

707. Among those killed were Marcelino Soares and Mateus. The two were reportedly killed on the night of 24 April by Rajawali troops and soldiers of the Koramil Laclubar in the vicinity of Orlalan village. According to witnesses, the two men were decapitated, and their heads were placed atop their makeshift graves. The same night, Rajawali and Koramil troops reportedly burned the neighbouring village of Manelima, and killed a young man named Manuel Almeida, also in retaliation for the death of the militia leader Filomeno Lopes da Cruz. Manuel Almeida had been the driver for the Catholic priest in Soibada, Father Julio, but TNI soldiers evidently suspected him of involvement in Filomeno's murder.

708. At least one more killing and a number of instances of serious ill-treatment or torture were reported in mid-May. This time the chief perpetrators were Morok and Mahadomi militia members, though they were clearly acting with the acquiescence of the highest civilian and military authorities. On 13 May, for example, militiamen seized two men (João da Costa and Paulino Soares) and took them to the Bupati's residence, which also served as a militia headquarters and detention centre.* The two men, who were suspected of supplying food to Falintil, were held for two weeks and severely beaten before the Catholic Church and the Red Cross intervened and secured their release.

709. Militia harassment and intimidation continued through the UNAMET period. In mid-August, militiamen and TNI soldiers roamed through the town of Manatuto tearing down CNRT posters. On 19 August, again assisted by soldiers, militias destroyed the CNRT office. UNAMET officials lodged formal protests with the Bupati and other officials over their support for the militias, and about the patently unfair political climate in the district. Those protests appeared to keep the most extreme forms of violence in check, but they did not change the underlying relationship between the authorities and the militias.

710. With the announcement of the vote on 4 September, and the departure of UNAMET staff a few days later, the stage was set for open violence to resume. Over the next two weeks, at least 18 people were killed, thousands of people were forcibly displaced from their homes, and much of the physical infrastructure in the district was destroyed.†

711. Efforts by the Catholic Church and by leaders on both sides went some way toward delaying the violence, thereby giving the population an opportunity to flee to safety. In the days immediately after the result was announced, for example, pro-independence and pro-autonomy leaders seemed to reach an agreement to avoid acts of violence. According to one account, there was even an agreement to disband the militia, in exchange for a promise that Falintil would not attack.

712. There were key figures, however, who chose to ignore those agreements. One was the Bupati, Vidal Doutel Sarmento, who refused to allow the militia to be disbanded, and played a critical role in distributing weapons to them after 4 September. As noted above, those weapons were reportedly brought to Sarmento's house by Kopassus officers on 4 September, and then distributed to Mahadomi militia members.

713. On 6 September, the burning began in the town of Manatuto. According to residents watching from the hills behind the town, the first buildings targeted appeared to be the homes of known CNRT leaders, such as the First Deputy Secretary for Manatuto, Boaventura Soares. Within a few days, virtually every structure in the town had been burned or otherwise destroyed. As in the rest of the country, TNI soldiers played an active role in organising and carrying out the burning. On 7 September, UNAMET MLOs in Manatuto directly witnessed TNI soldiers spraying buildings with petrol and then lighting them on fire.

* One account of these events suggests that the two men were handed over to SGI.

† The severity of the dislocation varied among Sub-Districts. In the Sub-District of Manatuto, virtually the entire population fled or was displaced. In Laclubar, roughly half fled, while in Soibada very few were forced from their homes. Personal communication with former UNAMET Manatuto staff, João Pequinho, October 2002.

714. The killings followed soon after. Among those killed was Abílio Amaral, a university student and independence supporter who had worked with the District administration. Amaral was reportedly killed at or near a TNI base in the village of Ailili in Manatuto Sub-District, some time after being detained by soldiers on 10 September. Two witnesses who saw him at the TNI base some time after 10 September, said his face was severely bruised and swollen, apparently as a result of being beaten. On 4 October 1999 another witness saw a dead body lying behind the TNI base camp, and believed that it was the body of Abílio Amaral.[*] In September 2000, UNTAET Civpol officers reportedly discovered one grave, and possibly more, behind a TNI barracks in the same vicinity.[†]

715. Another victim of the post-ballot violence was António (Pinto) Soares, a member of a clandestine youth group, shot and killed by soldiers of Kodim Manatuto on 11 September. Immediately after the announcement of the ballot result, Soares had fled to the hills outside Manatuto with his wife and small child. Early on the morning of 11 September, he had returned to the town with a group of clandestine youth to find food for those hiding in the hills. Returning later that day Soares and two others (João Pequinho and Marito Lay), all carrying large sacks of rice, were ambushed from behind by three soldiers of Kodim Manatuto. António Soares was felled with a single bullet to his head.[‡]

716. Manatuto also suffered the wrath of members of TNI Battalion 745, as they headed in convoy from their base in Lautém toward Dili on 20-21 September. (See Case Study: Battalion 745 Rampage, par. 981). In the first weeks of September members of the Battalion killed at least 21 people. Several of those killings took place near the village of Laleia, in the District of Manatuto.

717. The dead included three men, apparently unarmed, who were killed in the course of an assault on the eastern side of Laleia bridge, and one man, an alleged Falintil fighter, who was stabbed and shot by soldiers who then cut off one of his ears. Three other people, including one woman, were reportedly detained near Laleia, beaten then handed over to soldiers of the Manatuto Kodim. They were not seen again and it is thought that they were killed.[§]

718. Manufahi (Kodim 1634)

- Dandim: Maj. Drs. H.M. Sinaga
- Bupati: Nazario José Tilman de Andrade
- Kapolres: Lt. Col. (Pol.) Drs. Abdul Rachim
- Militias: ABLAI
- No. killed: 27

719. Manufahi suffered somewhat less than many other districts in 1999, but the violations of human rights there were still significant.* At least 27 people were killed during the year, thousands were forcibly relocated to West Timor, and there was major destruction of property.

Militias and authorities

720. The perpetrators of the violence in Manufahi were predominantly members of the local militia group, ABLAI, formed in March 1999. However, TNI forces were directly responsible for at least three killings and they were indirectly involved in other grave violations of human rights. Most of those killed were known supporters of independence, but two were pro-autonomy militiamen. All but three of the known killings happened in Same Sub-District, so much of the District was not subject to the most severe forms of violence.

721. Serious violence was reported in Manufahi as early as November 1998, some time before it began in the rest of the territory. The trouble began in Alas Sub-District when Falintil fighters killed seven TNI soldiers in a two-week period. In an operation that foreshadowed the violence of 1999, TNI forces (including elements of Battalion 744, Kodim, and Koramils) joined militia forces and auxiliaries in launching a major retaliation campaign against the alleged perpetrators, and on the communities deemed to be supporting them. In the course of the initial operation, roughly two dozen people were arrested, nine were beaten or tortured, two were beaten to death, and about 1,000 residents were displaced. In the following weeks, a further 13 people are believed to have been killed, all of them known members of the Resistance.

722. The groups that joined the TNI in the November 1998 operation were the forerunners of ABLAI, the militia formed in early 1999. Many of ABLAI's key leaders had been members of Gadapaksi, formed in 1995, or of army auxiliary units that had been in existence for many years. These auxiliaries were known colloquially as the 'Three-Week Army' (Tentara Tiga Minggu), a reference to the fact that its members had undergone a three-week training course led by Kopassus at the Battalion 744 base in Aileu in 1995.

723. Like other militias in the country, ABLAI had close links with Indonesian military and civilian authorities. The upper echelon of the ABLAI leadership had long-established ties with Kopassus and other TNI units and officers. The overall ABLAI Commander, Nazario Corte Real, for example, had worked for Kopassus for years, and had undergone 'Three-Week Army' training in 1995. ABLAI's second-in-command, Francisco Capella Ferrão, had worked with the TNI even longer, by some accounts since the late 1970s.

724. In 1999, the key link between ABLAI and Kopassus was said to be a militiaman (possibly a Kopassus officer) named Nelson de Araújo. Apart from his involvement in numerous acts of violence in 1999, de Araújo was accused of involvement in the killing of a Nepali peacekeeper in Suai in August 2000.* A key figure on the TNI side was the Sub-District Military Commander (Danramil) in Alas, Antonio Pereira.

725. ABLAI also had links with militias in other parts of the country, and through them with other military officials. The ABLAI inauguration ceremony held in March 1999, in Same, was addressed by the notorious Aitarak (and ex-Gadapaksi) leader Eurico Guterres well known to have close ties to the military leadership.

726. ABLAI also had the active support of some local civilian authorities, including Mattius da Silva, the Village Head of Taitudak, and Baltazar Doutel Sarmento, the Village Head of Mahaquidan, both in Alas Sub-District. But the link between ABLAI and the authorities was not a seamless one. In particular, there were signs of a rift between the Bupati, Nazario José Tilman de Andrade on the one hand, and the ABLAI leadership on the other.

727. Despite working for the Indonesians, de Andrade was considered to be a moderate, or even pro-independence, and opposed to the militia's use of violence. By some accounts, ABLAI commanders wanted to kill him and the BRTT head Jaime da Costa; and it is almost certain that the head of the FPDK hid a Fretilin leader, thereby saving his life. Whatever the reasons for the rift, it seems to have imposed some limits on ABLAI's strength and freedom of operation. That may help to explain why the violence in 1999 was relatively less serious in Manufahi than in some other districts. The interventions of other local officials, such as the Sub-District Head of Same, Filomeno Tilman, may also have helped to limit the violence.

Major human rights events

728. The violence in Manufahi occurred in two distinct waves, and in different parts of the district. The first wave, in April 1999, was in the Orema area. The second, in September, was concentrated in the Datino and Betano areas.

729. The first serious violations in the district, in 1999, came on 21 February when three men disappeared after being taken to a TNI post near the market in the town of Same. Tension mounted in March, especially after Eurico Guterres visited the area on 11 March. From that point on, militiamen as well as TNI officers and some civilian

* As of March 2003, Serious Crimes investigators had found little evidence to support these allegations, and had released Nelson de Araújo from custody. However, the failure to find evidence may have been related to the fact that investigations in the Manufahi District, to that date, had been extremely limited.

officials frequently addressed community meetings, and issued threats and warnings against voting for independence. A threat commonly voiced throughout the run-up to the vote was that if the vote favours independence "blood will flow from west to east."

730. On 10 April, a student leader was detained by ABLAI members and badly beaten.* About one week later, two ABLAI militiamen from Orema were killed while in Dili. The precise circumstances of their deaths are unclear, but militia leaders in Manufahi accused the pro-independence side of killing them. Their bodies were returned to Same by the TNI and buried at the TNI cemetery in mid-April.

731. The killings and burial occurred just days before Eurico Guterres addressed a large pro-autonomy crowd in front of the Governor's office in Dili, and urged the crowd to take action against supporters of independence. Guterres' speech, on 17 April, was followed not only by a violent militia rampage in Dili, but by an escalation of militia violence in Manufahi District. The homes of most pro-independence figures in the district were burned. Terrified, many residents fled to the church in Same, to the hills or to the relative safety of Dili.

732. At least five people were killed in the course of this wave of violence (17-25 April). Residents of Orema, the main area of the militia activity, also reported that ABLAI members forced them under threat of violence to hand over pigs, horses, and women. One man was reportedly killed when his daughter refused to go with the militiamen. After killing him, the militias took the woman against her will. She subsequently reported that she had been forced to serve as a militia slave, and that she had been raped by militiamen.

733. The second major wave of violence in Manufahi began on the day of the ballot, 30 August, and continued for roughly three weeks. During this period, at least 15 people were killed, and thousands were forcibly displaced. The violence began with the torture, murder, and decapitation of two men on 30 August. The severed heads of the two men were displayed in public, with the evident intention of terrorising others into leaving for West Timor.

734. That tactic, together with the systematic burning of houses and public buildings by militia, Police, and TNI forces (including Battalion 301), drove many villagers to flee their homes. The pattern varied slightly from one area to the next, but one pattern common throughout the district was that the worst destruction, and the greatest number of displacements, occurred along the main roads linking the district to the border. The most remote villages in the district were spared major destruction, either because the militia could not be bothered to go there, or because they were Falintil strongholds.

735. The violence ended with one final killing spree. Near Betano, just before their departure from Manufahi, ABLAI militia killed up to ten people in a single day, 24 September. By the time Interfet forces arrived, the militias had left, as had the TNI, the Police, and most civilian authorities.

* By some accounts he was hacked with machetes.

736. Oecussi (Kodim 1639)

- Dandim: Lt. Col. Kamiso Miran; Lt. Col. Bambang Sungesti
- Bupati: Filomeno Mesquita da Costa
- Kapolres: Lt. Col. (Pol.) Drs. Wilmar Marpaung
- Militias: Sakunar
- No. killed: 170

737. The District of Oecussi suffered among the most serious human rights violations of any district in East Timor in 1999.* At least 170 people were killed during the year, the vast majority of them in the weeks after the ballot. As in other districts, thousands of people fled their homes during this period in the face of systematic intimidation and violence.

Militias and authorities

738. The district's main militia force, Sakunar (Scorpion), was created and strongly supported by TNI, Police, and civilian authorities. It was formed in April 1999 with the full backing of the Governor of Timor-Leste, Abílio Osório Soares, the Bupati of Dili, Domingos Soares, and the two principal militia commanders for Timor-Leste, João Tavares and Eurico Guterres.

739. From the time of its formation, moreover, it received the full political and financial backing of the Bupati of Oecussi, Filomeno Misquito da Costa, the Kapolres, Lt. Col. (Pol.) Drs. Wilmar Marpaung and, most importantly, the Dandim (until August 1999), Lt. Col. Kamiso Miran and his successor, Lt. Col. Bambang Sungesti.† All of these officials attended a ceremony on 1 May 1999 at which Sakunar was formally inaugurated, and at which supporters of independence were publicly threatened and beaten by militiamen.

740. Sakunar's links with officialdom did not stop there. Testifying before a Jakarta court in April 2000, a former Sakunar leader said he had received weapons from two senior Kopassus officers, whom he identified as 'Bambang' and 'Tatang.'‡ Although the court did not seek to clarify the officers' identity, it is likely that they were Maj. Bambang Wisnumurty, the Korem Head of Intelligence, and Col. Tatang Zaenuddin, Commander of Combat Sector B. Both men were involved in mobilising and coordinating militias elsewhere in Timor-Leste.

741. Moreover, the principal organisers and leaders of Sakunar, and the key instigators of the post-ballot violence, were themselves active military and Police officers and civil servants. They included the Danramil of Passabe, Anton(io) Sabraca; the Babinsa and militia trainer in Passabe village, Sgt. Andre Ulan; the civil servant and overall Sakunar commander, Simão Lopes; the Head of Passabe Village and Police officer, Gabriel Kolo; and the Head of Cunha Village, Laurentino Soares (a.k.a. Moko).

742. This web of official linkages, and overlapping memberships between the militias and state agencies, allowed Sakunar to operate with impunity, and ensured that its members had the operational and logistical means to commit systematic violations of human rights.

Major human rights events

743. At least 12 people, and possibly more, were killed in Oecussi in the pre-ballot period, and numerous instances of physical assault, intimidation, and property destruction were reported. As in other districts, CNRT leaders and activists were subjected to acts of intimidation and violence by pro-autonomy forces, and they numbered among the dead.* Compared to some other districts, however, Oecussi was not a major centre of military or militia activity in the pre-UNAMET and UNAMET periods.

744. That situation changed dramatically in the final days before the ballot and in the immediate post-ballot period, especially after the departure of UNAMET personnel and other international observers in early September 1999. Over the next several weeks more than 150 civilians were murdered, some in very gruesome fashion, bringing the total number killed in the District in 1999 to at least 170. In addition, thousands of people fled their homes in the face of systematic intimidation and violence.

745. The so-called Passabe massacre of September 1999 was among the most systematic of all the acts of violence committed in the post-ballot period in Timor-Leste. In the course of three days, from 8 to 10 September, at least 82 people were killed. All of the victims were residents of four villages in the Sub-District of Oesilo, in the southeastern part of the district. At least another 12 people were killed en masse in the village of Maquelab, on the north coast, in October. Virtually all of the targeted villages were known as pro-independence strongholds, and the victims were over-whelmingly independence leaders or supporters (See Case Study: The Passabe and Maquelab Massacres, par. 947).

746. The very large numbers of victims and the systematic nature of the killings at Passabe and Maquelab would appear to be attributable to three main factors. First, as already noted, the militia force was strongly supported by all military, police, and civilian authorities in the district.

747. A second factor was the early departure of UNAMET and other international personnel, and the relatively late arrival of the multinational force. As in other districts, UNAMET personnel came under threat in the early days of September, leading to a decision to evacuate to Dili. That left Oecussi entirely without international observers, a situation in which TNI, Police, and Sakunar militias were free to act with complete impunity. Interfet troops began to arrive in Dili as early as 20 September and deployed to other districts in the following days, but they did not reach Oecussi until 22 October, by which time scores of civilians had already been killed.

* At a public ceremony in early May, CNRT leaders were forced to 'voluntarily' dissolve their organisation, and to renounce their support for independence.

748. A third and related factor was Oecussi's proximity to Indonesian territory, and its geographical isolation from the rest of Timor-Leste. As an enclave surrounded to the east, west, and south by Indonesian West Timor, and bounded by the sea to the north, Oecussi was essentially cut off from the rest of Timor-Leste. Its geographical position meant that TNI and militia forces could move with relative ease across the border into Indonesia, as they did in the course of the so-called Passabe massacre.

749. Viqueque (Kodim 1630)

- Dandim: Lt. Col. Djoko Sukarsono; Lt. Col. Gustaf Heru
- Bupati: Martinho Fernandes
- Kapolres: Lt. Col. (Pol.) Drs. Abdul Rahman
- Militias: Makikit, 59/75 Junior
- No. killed: 8-30

750. The District of Viqueque experienced a lower incidence of serious human rights violations than most other districts, but it did not escape the violence entirely.* At least 8 people, but possibly as many as 30, were killed during the year, and an estimated 10,000 were forcibly displaced from their homes. In a reversal of the pattern elsewhere in the country, most of the killing in Viqueque occurred before the ballot. Physical destruction varied widely within the district. In some areas, 90% of all buildings were destroyed, while in other areas there was almost no destruction at all.

Militias and authorities

751. The two main militia groups in Viqueque were Makikit (Eagle) and 59/75 Junior. Compared to militia groups in the western districts, neither was especially strong. In three of the five Sub-Districts – Ossu, Uato Lari and Uato Carabau – they were virtually absent. By one estimate there were fewer than 100 militiamen in the entire district in mid-1999.

752. The relative weakness of the militias in Viqueque may have been related to the strong Falintil presence there, and the reluctance of Sub-District and Village Heads, as well as ordinary citizens, to take part in them. One of Falintil's four cantonment sites was in Uai Mori on the Viqueque border, and several sub-districts were considered to be Falintil strongholds. There were also indications that some TNI officers in the District – with the notable exception of Kopassus and Military Intelligence officers – provided only limited support to the militias, and that both the TNI and the Police had been infiltrated by supporters of independence.* The second Dandim, Lt. Col. Gustaf Heru, adopted a notably moderate posture in the post-ballot period.

* Unless otherwise noted, this account is based on the following sources: UNTAET, DHRO-Viqueque, "Human Rights Violations: Viqueque District," [n.d.]; and UNAMET, MLO-Viqueque, "Outline of Pro-Integration Militias in Viqueque Area," 6 August 1999, reprinted in UNTAET, Political Affairs Office, Briefing Book, Dili, November 1999.

753. Makikit was especially active in the Sub-District of Lacluta, where it was based. In August, for example, it conducted operations against IDPs attempting to return to their homes in the area. The militia group 59/75 Junior – which took its name from the year of an abortive anti-Portuguese uprising in the district (1959), and the year of Indonesia's invasion of Timor-Leste (1975) – was based in Beobe village, in the town of Viqueque. Although active in the pre-UNAMET period, for most of the UNAMET period it kept a low profile. In mid-August it became more aggressive, intimidating local residents, and attacking recently opened CNRT and DSMPTT offices in Viqueque town.

754. By all accounts, Viqueque's militias were strongly supported by the Bupati, Martinho Fernandes, who was said to be a former associate of Prabowo Subianto, and an honorary member of Kopassus. Indeed, Fernandes told an international observer delegation in 1999 that he considered the militias to be a legitimate element of the pro-autonomy effort, despite the fact that they were armed. As in other districts, funding for the militias was channeled through the Bupati's office.

755. The militias also received training and logistical support from the TNI, and especially Kopassus. According to UNAMET MLOs posted in the district, a small number of Kopassus soldiers operated with each militia unit, serving an essential command and control function, and allowing coordination among militia sub-units and with other militias. Kopassus elements were also reported to have routinely conducted training sessions with 59/75 Junior militias at the militia base in Beobe village, Viqueque town. An MLO report of 5 August 1999 concluded that "59/75 Junior are an instrument of political repression backed and probably controlled by Kopassus."†

756. Several TNI officers within the territorial command structure, especially those in Kodim Intelligence, were also directly involved in coordinating militia activities. The most prominent and high ranking among them included: the Kodim Intelligence Chief, Lt. Yusuf Tandi; three Kodim Intelligence staff officers, Sgt. Andreas Prawin, Sgt. Abdul Mansyur, and Sgt. Gabriel Tahu; and the Danramil in Lacluta, Sgt. Maj. Nicodemus Y. Y., who had served for seven years with Kopassus before becoming Danramil.

757. In addition to official funding and training, there is strong evidence that militias in Viqueque received weapons from Indonesian military authorities. UNAMET MLOs observed militias in Viqueque carrying a variety of modern firearms, including SP-1 self-loading rifles, and handguns. The Bupati admitted to international observers (IFET) that 59/75 Junior had weapons. A former member of the 59/75 Junior militia told investigators that two of the Kodim Intelligence officers named above (Sgt. Gabriel Tahu and Sgt. Andreas Prawin) had arranged for 12 cases of weapons to be delivered to the militias in Beobe on March 8, 1999. Another witness claimed that 60 weapons had been stored at the Koramil headquarters in Dilor, and had been distributed at night by the Danramil, Sgt. Maj. Nicodemus Y.Y.

758. Finally, the militias in Viqueque had the tacit support of Battalion 406, the combat battalion stationed in the district. While there was little direct evidence of a link between Battalion 406 and the militias, in early August UNAMET MLOs concluded that the unit had probably formed a 'friendly' relationship with them. At the very least, the report concluded, "it is inconceivable that the CO 406 BTT Lt. Col. Sonny does not at least have visibility of 59/75 Junior activities given his high profile in local affairs."*

Major human rights events

759. There were a limited number of human rights incidents in Viqueque in the first few months of 1999, but they became more frequent and more serious with the start of militia recruitment in March. On 20 March, after gathering at the TNI post in Dilor, in Lacluta Sub-District, newly recruited militias attacked people in surrounding villages, beating and threatening alleged supporters of independence. Roughly 160 people were briefly detained at the Koramil in Dilor by TNI and Makikit militia, and an estimated 500 people from the area fled their homes in fear, taking refuge some 20 km away. The violence escalated further in April, as militiamen carried out campaigns of intimidation against alleged pro-independence figures in Lacluta and Viqueque Sub-Districts. In one incident in Viqueque Sub-District, on 18 April, members of 57/75 Junior kidnapped 18 youths whom they suspected of supporting Falintil.

760. The worst of the violence, however, occurred in May. According to a former militia member, at least 14 people were killed by militias in two separate incidents, on 2 and 13 May, and their bodies buried in the Beobe cemetery, in Viqueque town. UN investigators later found as many as 18 gravesites in that cemetery, which they believed to contain the bodies of those killed in May 1999. Examination of their remains revealed that some had been killed in a distinctive, and especially gruesome, way – an animal bone had been driven through the roof of their mouth into their brain.

761. On 30 May, 13 men from Lacluta were detained on allegations of supporting Falintil, then beaten with lengths of pipe and sticks. The beatings were reportedly carried out in the Koramil headquarters, under the supervision of the Danramil of Lacluta, Sgt. Maj. Nicodemus Y.Y.

762. Militia activities subsided significantly with the deployment of UNAMET and international observers in June, and there was relative calm for most of the next three months. The most serious exception to that rule came on 10-11 August in the town of Viqueque. On 10 August, the Student Solidarity Council of Timor-Leste (DSMPTT) formally opened an office in the town. Later that evening, a group of militiamen arrived at the office on motorbikes and trucks and began to fire shots into the building; as many as 14 bullet holes were later found in the ceiling. On the same day, two student members of the CNRT were accused of stealing a motorcycle and detained by the TNI.

763. The following day, 11 August, the offices of both the CNRT and the DSMPTT were attacked by armed militias. TNI and Police officials failed to intervene. In fact, witnesses reported seeing several TNI soldiers walking with three militiamen in the vicinity of the DSMPTT office. Later the same day a group of armed militiamen, backed by TNI soldiers, took up positions across the river from a group of students. The militiamen (and possibly the soldiers) opened fire, killing one student. Two more young people were killed later that day by militias, and three were wounded.*

764. As a result of these events, most DSMPTT and CNRT members fled the town of Viqueque; many residents in nearby villages also fled their homes. The next two weeks saw a further increase in militia intimidation in certain sub-districts, with threats of dire consequences should the pro-autonomy side lose. By one estimate, the campaign of terror prompted the displacement of as many as 1,700 people before the end of August.

765. Despite these threats, and the serious attacks of mid-August, the post-ballot period in Viqueque was unusually free of violence, with only two people reported killed. That unique situation may be attributable to the relative weakness of the militias in the district, and the strength of Falintil. The moderate position taken by the new Dandim, Lt. Col. Gustaf Heru, may also have been a factor. In a meeting held before the announcement of the result, Lt. Col. Heru is reported to have called on both sides to respect the outcome of the ballot, and not to resort to violence. He is also said to have made some effort to prevent violence in the post-ballot period. Nevertheless, militia and TNI forces did carry out acts of destruction in some areas, and as many as 10,000 residents fled the district in fear.

Case studies: major human rights incidents

766. The terrible reality of the violence in 1999 is almost impossible to grasp. In a report issued shortly after visiting Timor-Leste in late 1999, the International Commission of Inquiry on East Timor noted that its members had been “confronted with testimonies surpassing their imagination.”† This section aims to provide some limited sense of that reality, by recounting in some detail fifteen major human rights incidents from 1999.

767. Some of the cases examined here – such as the Liquiçá Church massacre and the Suai Church massacre – are relatively well known, and have been the focus of legal proceedings. Others are somewhat less well-known, at least outside of Timor-Leste. They are included here because they are part of the fabric of violence and suffering and, like the better-known cases, they provide valuable insights into the general patterns of violence and responsibility discussed elsewhere in this report.

* The three dead were identified as: Rogério Soares (a.k.a. Rogério Amaral), Carlos Sarmento, and Mariano Soares Pinto (a.k.a. Mariano Gusmão).

Liquiçá church massacre (6 April 1999)

768. One of the earliest and most shocking incidents of violence in 1999 was the massacre of as many as 60 refugees at the Catholic church in the town of Liquiçá on 6 April.* The attack also provides some of the most powerful evidence of the intimate links between militias and military and civilian authorities.

769. The Liquiçá Church massacre occurred against the backdrop of escalating militia violence in the district. In the days before the massacre, members of the BMP, together with TNI soldiers and Police had assaulted and arrested a number of known CNRT leaders in the Sub-Districts of Liquiçá and Maubara, where the BMP was based. In the course of those attacks, on 4 and 5 April, dozens of houses were burned and several civilians were killed.

770. Terrified by the mounting violence, residents of Liquiçá and Maubara began to seek refuge in places they considered safe, including the Catholic church compound. The sound of automatic weapons fire for about an hour in the afternoon of 5 April, followed by the arrival of hundreds of BMP militiamen, added urgency to their flight. By late afternoon, an estimated 2,000 people, many of them women and small children, had taken refuge in the church compound. Some were in the church itself while others were in the residence of the local priest, Pastor Rafael dos Santos, adjacent to the church.

771. Outside, BMP militiamen and TNI soldiers roamed the streets of Liquiçá, in search of pro-independence leaders and youths. Some militiamen and soldiers gathered outside the church and fired their weapons menacingly in the air. Terrified to return to their homes, the refugees stayed in the church overnight.

772. Early the following morning, 6 April, BMP militiamen armed with machetes, knives, spears, and an assortment of firearms gathered outside the church. Also present at the scene were TNI troops from the Liquiçá Kodim, the Maubara Koramil, the Kopasssus 'Satgas Tribuana,' and Battalion 143. Throughout the morning the BMP militiamen, and some soldiers, taunted and threatened the IDPs, calling on them to 'surrender.' According to the parish priest, Pastor Rafael, BMP members threatened the IDPs that two more militia groups (Mahidi and Halilintar) would be joining them at 10.00 am, at which point they would all attack the church. In addition to such threats, some militiamen hurled rocks, causing injury and damaging vehicles in the yard. Some also fired their home-made guns in the air. The TNI troops did not intervene in any way.

773. Roughly 15 Police officers from Polres Liquiçá and one platoon of Mobile Brigades (Brimob) from Dili were also deployed to the scene, ostensibly to protect the IDPs. However, in the hours before the attack the Police were seen chatting amicably with the armed militia members, who now numbered in the hundreds. Like the TNI, the Police and Brimob troops made no effort to detain or disarm the militiamen, or to prevent them from threatening those inside the church.

774. Rather than seeking to disband the militias, Police officers at the scene requested that Pastor Rafael surrender two pro-independence leaders – the Village Head of Dato, Jacinto da Costa Pereira,* and one other man. Pastor Rafael explained that one of the men was not there, and he refused to hand Jacinto da Costa Pereira to the Police because he feared that he would be killed. He also denied suggestions, made by the Brimob officers and the militias, that Jacinto da Costa Pereira had brought a weapon with him into the church.

775. Inaction by the Police and the TNI in the face of mounting militia violence was hardly surprising. A substantial body of evidence points to the conclusion that the massing of the militias in Liquiçá, and the attack on the refugees, were part of a well-organised plan, set in motion by high-ranking civilian and military officials. As events unfolded, the Dandim, Lt. Col. Asep Kuswandi and the Bupati, Leoneto Martins, met frequently with key TNI, Kopassus, Police, and BMP commanders.

776. At one such briefing, led by the Dandim on the morning of 6 April, TNI soldiers were reportedly forewarned of an imminent militia attack on the IDPs, but were given no orders to prevent it, or to protect those in the compound. In another meeting on the same day, the Bupati and the BMP Commander, Manuel de Sousa, reportedly told militia leaders that they must prepare to attack the church and be ready to kill any IDPs who tried to escape.

777. A final meeting at the Liquiçá Kodim, held just before the attack, was attended by the most important civilian and military leaders in the district and the province. They included: the Deputy Danrem for Timor-Leste, Col. Mudjiono; the Commander of the Kopassus Satgas Tribuana VIII, Lt. Col. Yayat Sudrajat; the Liquiçá Dandim, Lt. Col. Asep Kuswandi; the Bupati, Leoneto Martins; and the District Chief of Police, Lt. Col. Adios Salosa.

778. Shortly after that meeting ended, between 12 noon and 1.00 pm, a shot rang out in the vicinity of the church.† Brimob troops and BMP militias started to fire their weapons in the direction of the compound, and the attack began. The militias took the lead, but TNI and Brimob forces were close behind.‡ Most eyewitnesses concur that some TNI

* The KPP-HAM report gives his name as Jacinto da Costa Conceição.

† According to one source, the shot was fired in the direction of Brimob troops by a TNI Babinsa from Fatumasi, as a deliberate provocation intended to trigger the assault.

‡ Allegations of direct involvement by TNI troops in the assault at Liquiçá may find further confirmation in a memorandum to General Wiranto, from the Chief of Staff for Kodam IX, Brig. Gen. Mahidin Simbolon. In that memo, reportedly submitted as evidence in one of the ad hoc trials in Jakarta, Simbolon is said to have confirmed that Kopassus and Kodim troops backed the pro-autonomy forces and fired their weapons in the course of the incident. See Suara Timor Lorosae, 11 September 2002.

and Brimob troops stood by and allowed the militias to attack, while others actively joined in.

779. The indictment issued in this case by the UNTAET General Prosecutor states that "TNI members went on shooting into the crowd indiscriminately killing several people."* Pastor Rafael dos Santos, the Liquiçá parish priest, gave this account of the opening moments of the massacre:

> "... I heard shooting by the Besi Merah Putih (BMP) and Brimob group in front of the Parish house. They were firing into the air. After this the Besi Merah Putih and Kodim members entered and surrounded the community in the Church complex. They started to shoot everyone. Men whom they found outside the Parish house were hacked down . . . The militia members were accompanied by Kodim troops and the Brimob elements. They entered the residence of the church and they started to kill people with machetes and shoot people in the house. At the time there were still women, children and men in the complex. They started to kill the men first because they were closer to the door. The men had pushed the women and children to the back."†

780. Brimob troops assisted in the attack by throwing tear gas into the parish house, forcing the refugees to come out. As they ran from the church, they were hacked with machetes and knives, or shot. Pastor Rafael's account continues:

> "I saw the Brimob members break the parish house window and throw tear gas repeatedly into the Parish house until those who were sheltering inside ran out because they could not stand their eyes hurting. As the community ran out of the Parish house the Militia started to kill the men, but they did not kill the women and children. The children and women were allowed to leave the complex, whereas the men were hacked down."‡

781. When most of the refugees had left the church and the parish house, BMP members, Police, and TNI soldiers, including TNI Sgt. Tome Diogo, came in looking for stragglers. Those they found were killed. Pastor Rafael described the scene:

> "After we came out of the Parish house the Besi Merah Putih and Polres members and the Kodim members went from room to room in the Parish house destroying things, seeking and killing people. A number of young community leaders of the Liquiçá pro-independents [sic] had tried to hide in the roof of the house. The militia pulled down the roof of the Parish house. They pulled the young people down and executed them."[*]

782. Pastor Rafael's account, and specifically his claim that soldiers and police joined in the attack, has been confirmed by other witnesses. Testifying in the Jakarta trial of Lt. Col. Asep Kuswandi, Lt. Col. (Pol.) Adios Salosa, and Leoneto Martins, in July 2002, a survivor of the massacre said he had seen uniformed soldiers and Police fire shots into the church compound: "The shots were all directed towards the church," he said, and those firing were "not only police but also soldiers."[†]

783. The official Police report on the Liquiçá Church massacre claimed that only five people were killed in the attack.[‡] Independent investigations suggest that the true figure is at least 30, and possibly as many 60 killed.[§] The exact number of victims is not known, however, because the bodies of the dead were taken away and disposed of shortly after the massacre. In statements to investigators, witnesses have indicated that dozens of bodies were taken in trucks by TNI soldiers and militiamen and dumped or buried in various locations.

784. One witness has testified, for example, that he and six other men received an order from the Danramil and the Sub-District Head of Maubara (Sgt. Maj. Carlos Amaral and José Afat respectively) to assist in burying five of the bodies.[¶] According to his statement, the bodies were brought to Maubara in a truck by officers of Kodim Liquiçá on the evening of 6 April, and buried later the same night, near the home of a member of Koramil Maubara.[] That account is consistent with a separate report that a truck containing five bodies was driven from Koramil Maubara to a BMP post on the road between Liquiçá and Maubara, and that militiamen at the post were then ordered to dig graves about 200 meters away and bury the corpses.[††]

‡ The report was prepared by the Timor-Leste Regional Police (Polda) Research Directorate, and submitted to national police headquarters on 15 April 1999. The report is: Polda Timor Timur, Direktorat Reserse, "Laporan Penanganan Kasus Liquisa," (No. R/355/IV/1999/Ditserse) Dili, 15 April 1999.

§ An UNTAET report from December indicated that Civpol held a list of 61 people allegedly killed in the incident, and noted that "it is generally accepted that the total is probably somewhere around the 50-60 mark." See UNTAET, UNMO-Liquiçá, "History of Liquiçá District Through 1999," December, 1999, p. 3. In its January 2000 report, Indonesia's KPP-HAM concluded more cautiously that "at least 30 people" had been killed. An indictment issued by the UNTAET General Prosecutor said that "more than a hundred people were killed or injured" in this incident. Pastor Rafael believed that more than 100 may have died.

¶ Cited in KPP-HAM, "Report of the Indonesian Commission on Human Rights Violations in East Timor," (internal), Jakarta, January 2000, p. 17.

 The officers who allegedly brought the bodies to Maubara were Sgt. Tome Diogo and Sgt. Jacob. KPP-HAM, "Report of the Indonesian Commission on Human Rights Violations in East Timor," (internal), Jakarta, January 2000, p.17.

†† It is also consistent with testimony that TNI Sgt. Tome Diogo drove a truck containing five bodies to the hospital in Liquiçá on the evening of 6 April 1999, before driving it away again, with the bodies still in it. See UNTAET, General Prosecutor, Indictment against Leoneto Martins et al., Dili [n.d.], paragraph 120.

785. Another witness, a former BMP militia member, told Indonesia's Human Rights Commission that he had been ordered by a TNI officer to bring a military truck to transport 15 corpses from Liquiçá to Masin Lake, a marshy body of water just off the road between Liquiçá and Maubara. After dumping the bodies, the witness said, he was ordered to return with the truck to Koramil Maubara.[*] Indonesia's Human Rights Commission also found that some corpses had been thrown into the sea in the Sub-District of Maubara, using as many as seven trucks and four jeeps.[†]

786. The systematic disposal of corpses described in these testimonies is markedly similar to the pattern of corpse disposal that followed the massacres at Suai Church on 6 September, and at the Maliana Police Station on 8 September. Together with the substantial evidence of TNI and Police involvement in the massacre itself, the presence of key officials at the scene of the crime, and the responsibility of those officials for creating and coordinating the BMP, this evidence makes it a virtual certainty that the Liquiçá Church massacre was planned by high-ranking TNI and civilian authorities.

Cailaco Killings (12 April 1999)

787. Some of the most notorious violations of human rights in 1999 occurred in the District of Bobonaro, where at least 229 civilians were killed in political violence, and many others suffered torture (including rape), beatings, destruction of property, and forcible relocation. All but a handful of the victims were supporters of independence. The perpetrators were generally members of one of the several militia groups operating in the district, but in many cases, the principal perpetrators were TNI soldiers and officers.

788. One of the clearest examples of this general pattern occurred in the Sub-District of Cailaco on 12 April 1999.[‡] In two separate incidents on the same day, TNI soldiers and militiamen rounded up and deliberately executed seven people. The dead have been identified as: Carlito Mau Leto (32), Domingos Resi Mau (29), João Evangelista Lima Vidal (40), Paulino Soares (34), José Pau Lelo (37), António Soares (45), and Manuel Maulelo Araújo.

789. According to an indictment filed by Timor-Leste's Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes[§] these seven killings were committed with the knowledge and acquiescence of several senior military and civilian officials, including: the District Military Commander (Dandim), Lt. Col. Burhanuddin Siagian; the District Head of Military Intelligence (Kasi Intel), Lt. Sutrisno; the Bupati, Guilherme dos Santos; the militia commander, João Tavares; and the District head of the FPDK, Jorge Tavares. The indictment also names Lt. Sutrisno as one of the direct perpetrators of the seven murders.

‡ Unless otherwise noted, this account is based on UNTAET, DHRO-Bobonaro, "Bobonaro District 1999 report," September 2002.

§ The indictment was filed on 3 February 2003.

790. By some accounts, the Cailaco killings were an act of official retaliation for the murder of a local pro-autonomy figure, Manuel Gama, and at least one TNI soldier, in an ambush near Poegoa village, Cailaco Sub-District, early on the morning of 12 April. Gama, who was Finance Head of the District administration and had recently been named deputy leader of the FPDK in Maliana, was driving from Cailaco to Maliana with an escort of TNI soldiers when the attack occurred. He and one of the TNI soldiers were both shot and killed at close range, while a second TNI soldier reportedly survived the ambush.

791. As of early 2003, the identity of Manuel Gama's killers had not been established. Some residents claimed that the attack was carried out by a member of the Halilintar militia, as a deliberate pretext for the crackdown on pro-independence supporters that was to follow. Others believe that the ambush and killings were the work of Falintil fighters, who had been operating in the area in preceding months. Whoever the perpetrators were, the attack did indeed set in motion a campaign of retribution in which local residents were detained, beaten, forcibly relocated and killed by TNI soldiers and Halilintar militiamen.

792. After learning of Manuel Gama's death, the commander of the SGI post at Marco, Mahalan Agus Salim, ordered TNI and Halilintar militiamen to track down those responsible.* Teams of soldiers and militiamen then fanned out to villages in the immediate vicinity, looking for suspects.† In the course of this initial sweep some 30 residents, including women and children, were detained and forcibly marched to the Sub-District Military Command (Koramil) headquarters at Marco. The women and children were held separately for up to four days, before being released. Several of the detained men – including Carlito Mau Leto and Domingos Resi Mau who would later be killed – were badly beaten while in detention. The beatings reportedly began after orders were received from the Kodim in Maliana and from militia commander João Tavares.‡ In the words of the indictment issued by the Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes:

> "The detainees were told to lie on the floor and the TNI and militia-men present hit them with their fists and boots. They were also beaten with rifle butts while being questioned about the murder of Manuel Gama."§

793. A number of the detainees were released, but some remained in custody in Marco. Two others – Carlito Mau Leto and Domingos Resi Mau – were taken to the site of Manuel Gama's murder, near the village of Poegoa. TNI soldiers and militiamen had already brought three other villagers to that spot, and had begun to beat and interrogate

† The Cailaco indictment characterises the operation as follows: "On 12 April 1999, TNI and Halilintar militia members attacked the civilian population of the Sub-District of Cailaco perceived to be supporters of independence. This attack was an integral part of the ongoing campaign of violence against the civilian population of East Timor." Cailaco Indictment, paragraph 42.

them about the killing of Manuel Gama.* The soldiers and militiamen at the site were under the authority of TNI Lt. Sutrisno, the District Military head of intelligence. Lt. Sutrisno was present when soldiers and militiamen beat the detainees. According to witnesses, he also kicked one of the detainees in the face and the body as he lay on the ground, with his hands tied.†

794. Having received word of Manuel Gama's death, senior TNI and civilian figures in Maliana gathered at the office of the Bupati to plan their response. Those present included: the Dandim, Lt. Col. Burhanuddin Siagian, the Bupati, Guilherme dos Santos, the militia commander, João Tavares, and the district FPDK leader, Jorge Tavares. According to the Serious Crimes indictment, the men discussed plans to kill CNRT members and pro-independence civil servants.‡

795. After the meeting, the group travelled in a convoy to the site near Poegoa village where Manuel Gama had been killed, and where at least five men were being held by TNI soldiers and militiamen. There, according to witnesses, three of the men who had earlier been beaten were shot dead by TNI soldiers. The circumstances of their killing leave no doubt that the men were deliberately executed while in custody, and strongly suggest the direct responsibility of senior TNI officers and the militia commander, João Tavares.

796. Shortly after they arrived at the site the militia commander, João Tavares, reportedly walked up to one of the detainees and said: "These are the people that receive money from the government, and they feed the Falintil. These people we have to kill."§ Following this order, several TNI soldiers dragged three of the detainees – Carlito Mau Leto, Domingos Resi Mau, and João Evangelista Lima Vidal – to the top of a nearby hill. They were followed by Lt. Sutrisno, who was carrying a 5.56 calibre rifle. A few minutes later several gunshots were heard coming from the place where the detainees had been taken. Witnesses said that the gunshots sounded like those of a 5.56 caliber rifle. The three men were not seen alive again.¶

797. From the site of the killings, a convoy of officials, soldiers, and militiamen returned to Marco, where residents and civil servants had been ordered to gather at the home of Manuel Gama. There, according to witnesses, Lt. Col. Burhanuddin Siagian directly threatened district civil servants, indicating that if they were independence supporters they would suffer the same fate as the three men just killed in Poegoa. Then, Lt. Sutrisno gave the order to arrest four men, all of them known independence supporters: Paulino Soares, José Pau Lelo, António Soares, and Manuel Maulelo Araújo.

798. The four men were singled out of the crowd and led away to the SGI compound next to the Koramil. Later that afternoon, 12 April, they were shot dead by TNI soldiers and Halilintar militiamen. As in the case of the three killed earlier in Poegoa, there is little doubt that the four were killed in custody, and that their murders were ordered by senior TNI officers, including Lt. Col. Burhanuddin Siagian and Lt. Sutrisno.

799. Some time after the four men were taken to the Koramil, Lt. Col. Siagian, João Tavares and Jorge Tavares went there and talked with Lt. Sutrisno.* After their conversation, TNI soldiers and Halilintar militiamen were instructed to seal off the area, and Lt. Sutrisno gave the order for the four detainees to be taken outside. Once outside, the detainees were told to run. Paulino Soares, the youngest of the four, started to do so and was immediately shot and killed. The other three men were then killed by shots fired by TNI soldiers and militiamen surrounding the compound. The bodies of the four men were gathered in a single pile and guarded by TNI soldiers.†

800. Lt. Sutrisno has been identified as one of the direct perpetrators of all four of the killings. Lt. Col Burhanuddin Siagian, João Tavares, and Jorge Tavares were present and took no action to stop the killings.‡

801. As of early 2003, the bodies of the seven victims of the Cailaco killings had not been found. Relatives believe that the bodies were taken by militiamen and soldiers to a beach at Atabae, early in the morning hours of 13 April, and dumped at sea. The site of their probable disposal is marked by a stone monument and some clothes discovered on the beach on the morning after the killings, and believed to be those of the deceased. In early 2000, several fishermen told UN Civpol investigators that on the morning after the killings they had discovered that their boats, which had been left on the beach overnight, were spattered with blood and that they had been moved. One fisherman claimed that, earlier that morning, he had seen several men, whom he described as militia, pushing a dump truck that had got stuck in the sand.§

802. The seven murders on 12 April 1999 marked the start of a systematic campaign of officially sanctioned violence against villagers in the Cailaco Sub-District who were believed to be supporters of independence (See District Summary: Bobonaro). Over the next two weeks, soldiers and armed militiamen conducted joint patrols in which they burned and looted houses, detained and beat hundreds of villagers, raped an unknown number of women and girls, and killed as many as 20 people. No action was ever taken by Indonesian authorities against those alleged or known to have carried out these acts.

Carrascalão House Massacre (17 April 1999)

803. At least 12 people were killed in Dili on 17 April 1999 when militiamen and TNI soldiers attacked the home of a prominent citizen, Manuel Carrascalão.¶ The dead were among some 150 people who had sought refuge there from mounting militia violence elsewhere in the territory. The attack highlights the close cooperation between the militias and military and civilian authorities in committing acts of violence in 1999. It also offers evidence of the direct involvement of TNI soldiers in the violation of human rights, and of the complicity of high-ranking TNI officers in those acts.

804. The attack took place in the early afternoon, shortly after a large pro-autonomy rally in front of the Governor's office. Attended by some 5,000 people, including key government officials and as many as 1,645 militiamen,* the rally marked the formal inauguration of the militia group Aitarak, under the leadership of Eurico Guterres. In his keynote address, Guterres openly incited those present to 'cleanse' and kill supporters of independence and 'traitors,' and in particular members of the Carrascalão family. According to one account of the event, Guterres urged them to "conduct a cleansing of all those who have betrayed integration. Capture and kill them if you need to."†

805. A secret TNI report on the events of 17 April provided a fuller account of Guterres' remarks. According to that document, Guterres said:

> "Aitarak forces are going to carry out a cleansing operation (operasi sisir) against civil servants who have used official facilities while being traitors to the integration struggle. Aitarak forces are going to crush (memberantas) anyone – be they government officials, community leaders or businessmen – who has assisted the anti-integration camp. Aitarak forces will not hesitate to kill (menghabisi) Mário Viegas Carrascalão and his circle, who have been traitors."‡

806. The rally ended at about 11.15 am with a volley of gunfire from some two dozen militiamen. Immediately thereafter, the militias and others began a mass procession through the streets of Dili.§ The procession quickly degenerated into a violent rampage, in which the homes, vehicles, and offices of alleged supporters of independence were attacked and destroyed. Among the first targets of the violence was the office of Timor-Leste's only newspaper, the Suara Timor Timur. Although it was owned by a supporter of integration, the militias were evidently angry with the paper's reporting on the Liquiçá Church massacre of 6 April. For that reason, a group of the Liquiçá-based militia, BMP, attacked the office, threatening local staff and foreign journalists, and destroying much of the equipment. Elsewhere in the city, militias burned or destroyed houses, shops and vehicles.¶

Mário Viegas Carrascalão is Manuel Carrascalão's brother and a former Governor of Timor-Leste.The reference in this document to Mário rather than Manuel may be an error, or it may reflect Guterres' view that Mário Viegas Carrascalão was also a traitor.

§ The exact route of the procession is detailed in the secret TNI report of 17 (18?) April 1999 (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #16).

¶ The secret TNI report on these events noted the destruction of seven houses or shops, four vehicles, and one motorcycle (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #16).

807. The rampage through Dili culminated in the attack on the home of Manuel Carrascalão. Carrascalão's home was targeted, in part, because the pro-integration side considered him a traitor. Once a supporter of integration with Indonesia, and the brother of a former Governor of Timor-Leste, in recent years Manuel Carrascalão had become more critical of the Indonesian authorities, and had formed a moderate pro-independence organisation called the Movement for the Reconciliation and Unification of the People of Timor-Leste (Gerakan Rekonsiliasi dan Persatuan Rakyat Timor Timur – GRPRTT).

808. Carrascalão's home was also targeted because he had offered it as a place of refuge for people who had fled from mounting violence in Turiscai, Maubara, Liquiçá, and Alas. In the weeks after refugees had begun to take shelter there, he had received numerous threats. Carrascalão later told Amnesty International he believed those threats had been "prompted by the fact that many of the people he was sheltering were witnesses to human rights violations elsewhere in Timor-Leste."*

809. Sometime early in the afternoon of 17 April, a group of Aitarak and BMP militiamen began to gather outside the Carrascalão house. Some came on foot, while others arrived in large trucks. One of the trucks was used to break down a large iron gate in front of the house. With the gate down, militiamen rushed into the house compound and, after smashing the windows, into the house itself. The militiamen were carrying an assortment of homemade and automatic weapons and reportedly shouting threats, including "Kill Manuel Carrascalão!"†

810. Inside the house, Manuel Carrascalão's teenage son, Manuelito, tried to prevent the militias from attacking the refugees. Shortly thereafter, he was stabbed and shot to death. Others were killed or severely injured by militias wielding machetes and knives. One militiaman, Armando dos Santos, was accused of stabbing a man named Antónino to death in the course of the attack. The prosecution alleged that dos Santos' knife had bent in the midst of the stabbing and that he had stopped to straighten his knife before finishing the job.‡ Some of the refugees tried to climb over the fence to escape but could not because the house was surrounded by armed men. Testifying in the Jakarta trial of Dili District Military Commander, Lt. Col. Endar Priyanto, in late 2002, one survivor said: "I tried to jump the fence and run but some men came after me and I was wounded by a machete slash on my back."§

811. The attack finally ended with the arrival of a Police Mobile Brigade unit. Roughly 50 survivors of the massacre were then taken to the Dili Police headquarters (Polres), where they remained in 'protective' custody for some time. They were joined there by Manuel Carrascalão, his daughter Christina, and the outspoken CNRT figure Leandro

Isaac.[*] Some of the wounded were loaded into ambulances, but even then they were not safe. One survivor testified that the ambulance in which he was riding stopped in front of the Aitarak headquarters, where militias rocked it shouting "Just kill them! Just kill them!"[†]

812. The exact number of people killed in the attack is not known. The secret military report cited earlier said that five people had been seriously wounded and 13 people killed – 12 of them at the Carrascalão house and one elsewhere in the city. Human rights organisations have put the total figure slightly higher, while others (including Manuel Carrascalão himself) have suggested that the figure might be as high as 60.[‡] Nor is it known where the bodies were disposed. One witness reported seeing bodies loaded onto a large unmarked truck shortly after the attack, and driven away to an unknown destination.[§] In late 1999, a different witness told the International Commission of Inquiry on East Timor that eleven bodies had been driven by truck to a lake near Maubara, in Liquiçá District, where they were dumped.[¶]

813. As in many other cases of serious militia violence in 1999, Indonesian military and Police authorities sought to portray the attack and the killings as a 'clash' between pro-integration and pro-independence groups. But there was no evidence that the refugees in the house had engaged in any violence. By contrast, there was substantial evidence of direct TNI involvement in the attack, and also of culpable acquiescence in the violence by high ranking TNI and Police authorities.

814. A number of people who survived the attack have testified that TNI soldiers in plainclothes were among the attackers. One witness, a student from Maubara named Florindo de Jesus, testified in court: "I am certain that the TNI launched the attack because I recognised several people among the attackers as being TNI members from Maubara."[] Asked for more detail, he gave the names of six soldiers, all of them posted in Maubara Sub-District. One of those, he said, was his own uncle. Another witness, Victor dos Santos, told investigators in July 2000 that behind the militias dressed in black t-shirts and red and white bandanas he had seen dozens of well-built men with ‡ Those reported dead included: Adelino dos Santos (18), Afonso Ribeiro (25), Alberto dos Santos (30), Eduardo dos Santos (25), Januario Pereira (40), João da Silva (25), Manuel Gama Intan Carrascalão (16 or 18), Marlito Correira, Rafael dos Santos (25), Raul dos Santos (30). Another man, Manuel Pinto (50 or 67) was reportedly killed at the Becora bus terminal (or Terminal Camea) on the same day. From UNTAET, DHRO-Dili, "Dili Chronology," Dili, 2002, p. 2. The killing of Manuel Pinto is confirmed in the TNI report of 17 (18?) April, which describes him as a retired civil servant who had worked in the Baucau Kodim (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #16).

short haircuts: "I know them as TNI soldiers from the Koramil in Maubara."* Testifying in the Jakarta trial of Dili District Police Chief, Lt. Col. Hulman Gultom, in mid-2002, Manuel Carrascalão said that TNI soldiers out of uniform had joined in the attack.†

815. High-ranking TNI and Police officers also facilitated the killings through their failure to intervene in the mounting violence until it was too late. The pre-massacre rally was attended by some of the most senior government officials in the territory, including the provincial Governor, the Bupati of Dili, and the Timor-Leste military commander, Col. Tono Suratman. Video footage obtained by UN investigators, moreover, shows Col. Suratman standing on the first floor balcony of the Governor's office, together with Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri (Assistant for Operations to the Army Chief of Staff), and four other senior military officers.‡

816. None of those officials expressed any public opposition to, or concern about, Guterres' remarks or about the presence of armed militias. Nor did any military or Police authority seek to disarm the several hundred militia men who paraded around Dili in defiance of legal restrictions on carrying firearms. The secret military report on the events of 17 April, cited above, provided a thorough account of Guterres' remarks, and of the destruction and killing that followed, but revealed no concern nor any intention to take action. The report concluded simply that the matter would be handled by the Dili District Police.§

817. Most damning is the evidence of willful inaction on the part of the commanding TNI officer for Timor-Leste, Col. Tono Suratman. When Manuel Carrascalão went to Suratman's home early in the afternoon of 17 April to request urgently that he intervene to stop the imminent attack on the refugees, Suratman flatly refused to do so.¶ Suratman's refusal has been confirmed by the then Irish Foreign Minister, David Andrews, and the pro-autonomy figure, Basilio Araújo, both of whom were with Suratman at the time.

818. In view of his political sympathies, Basilio Araújo's account is especially telling. Testifying before a Jakarta court in August 2002, he said that the TNI did nothing whatsoever to prevent the attack on the Carrascalão house. Asked to comment on the claim that Suratman had in fact insisted on helping Carrascalão, he told the court: "I didn't see that Pak Danrem [Suratman] insisted on helping him. I didn't see it."†† Also revealing were the remarks of the presiding Indonesian judge in the Jakarta trial of Eurico Guterres, in November 2002. The judge said: "Tono [Suratman] ignored a report from Manuel that his house would be attacked by pro-Jakarta militiamen. He did not take any action until the incident occurred."[*]

819. Police authorities also share responsibility for the killings at the Carrascalão home, both through their failure to intervene effectively to prevent them, and through their wholly inadequate, and perhaps deliberately misleading, investigation work. Police investigators reportedly urged witnesses to say that the violence had been provoked by a shot fired from within the Carrascalão home.[†] It is worth noting that the Police had advanced precisely the same 'provocation' scenario in the case of the Liquiçá Church massacre, and they did it once again in early July when militias attacked a humanitarian convoy (See Case Study: Attack on Humanitarian Convoy). In all three cases, the claim of provocation was patently false, and seemed designed primarily to divert attention away from the real culprits.

The killing of two students at Hera (20 May 1999)

820. Young people and students were among those deliberately targeted by the militias and the Indonesian security forces. Members of pro-independence organisations, such as the Student Solidarity Council of Timor-Leste (Dewan Solidaritas Mahasiswa dan Pelajar Timor Timur – DSMPTT), were especially vulnerable, and many of their members were threatened, beaten, and killed.

821. Of the incidents in which students were targeted, among the most notorious was the detention and killing of two young men, Augustino de Carvalho (24) and Estevão Xavier Pereira (20), in Hera on 20 May 1999.[‡] The Hera Polytechnical Institute, where they studied, had been the focus of joint TNI and militia operations for some time, in part because many students there belonged to the pro-independence DSMPTT.

822. On 10 May, TNI and Aitarak militiamen arrested roughly 100 students and residents of Hera, just east of Dili, and took them for questioning at the Regional Police headquarters (Polda) in Dili. Most were subsequently released, but that was not the end of the story. After the round-up, the Polytechnic was occupied by some 50 soldiers of a Timor-Leste-based TNI paramilitary force known as Rajawali.[§]

823. On 20 May, the two students who were killed returned to the campus at Hera, with seven others, to collect their belongings. On the way back to their vehicle, they were detained for questioning by TNI soldiers.[¶] A woman who lived nearby and witnessed the questioning gave the following account of their encounter with the soldiers:

¶ According the Amnesty International, the soldiers were members of Rajawali and Battalion 744 units. AI Doc. ASA 21/43/99.

> "I could see from my yard that the students were across the road near the security room with the military. The military were emptying the students' bags of their contents onto the ground. [The two students] were also on the ground and the soldiers were kicking and hitting them badly. I watched this for about ten minutes. I then went inside and took my daughter with me as I did not want to be seen watching this take place. I was also very scared and I was crying. . .*

824. After being questioned and searched, the two students (Carvalho and Pereira) were taken away. In response to inquiries into their whereabouts by a local human rights organisation, Yayasan HAK, the authorities said that the two men had escaped from custody. However, there was reason to believe that they had in fact been beaten and killed. The story of the witness just cited, continued:

> "At about 3pm I was still worried about [the two students] and I wanted to find out what was happening to them. I went across to the Polytechnic pretending that I needed to do some laundry. This is where we normally got our water from. I was able to see inside the security room. There were about 25 soldiers in there and also [the two students], who were tied up with their hands behind their back in a corner on the floor. They had something in their mouths which prevented them from yelling out. There were two or four soldiers taking turns hitting them repeatedly with the large stick taken from the tree in my yard. . . At about 9 pm, when the light in my house was still on, one of the soldiers again came to my house and told me that I should not be awake. I then turned off the light and pretended to go to sleep. Soon after that I heard two shooting sounds seconds apart coming from across the road in the direction of the security room. The shots sounded very close by. About five minutes later I also heard a car drive off very fast from outside the same area. In my heart I knew that those gunshot sounds meant that the students had been killed."†

825. In an exhumation, performed on 30 August 2000, investigators found what were believed to be the bodies of the two men, buried together with their hands tied.

Arbitrary detention and rape in Lolotoe (May-June 1999)

826. The victims of serious human rights violations in 1999 included many ordinary villagers living in areas considered to be pro-independence strongholds. In such areas, TNI units and militias conducted joint sweeping operations that led to a wide range of abuses, including arbitrary detention, murder, and rape.

* Testimony of an East Timorese woman [name withheld], recorded and compiled in Australia by the "East Timor Documentation Project," 3 December 1999.

† Testimony of an East Timorese woman [name withheld], recorded and compiled in Australia by the "East Timor Documentation Project," 3 December 1999.

827. An operation of this kind was conducted in the Sub-District of Lolotoe, Bobonaro District in late May 1999. Over the course of several days, TNI forces together with members of the Kaer Metin Merah Putih (KMP) militia rounded up hundreds of suspected supporters of independence and CNRT leaders. Many of those detained were badly beaten, and some were tortured or mutilated by their captors in an effort to extract confessions about their links to Falintil. Several instances of rape and sexual slavery by TNI and militiamen were also reported in the context of the raids.

828. The victims of the Lolotoe operation included a CNRT leader from Guda village, Mário Gonçalves. He was detained on 24 May, and tortured by a large group of KMP militia, in the presence of the Village Head. An indictment for crimes against humanity filed by the General Prosecutor of UNTAET in May 2001, described his ordeal as follows:

> "When Mário Gonçalves came out of the church he was beaten by the KMP militia members whilst being dragged to the field outside the CNRT office. At the field, Sabino Gouveia Leite [the Village Head], José Cardoso Ferreira alias Mouzinho [the KMP deputy commander] and João Franca da Silva alias Jhoni Franca [the KMP commander] ordered members of the KMP militia to beat Mário Gonçalves in turns. Approximately thirty-seven KMP militia members beat Mário Gonçalves. João Franca da Silva alias Jhoni Franca also attacked Mário Gonçalves with a machete, cutting him on his right arm and stabbing him in the left shoulder.
> "Sabino Gouveia Leite incited José Cardoso Fereira alias Mouzinho and João Franca da Silva alias Jhoni Franca to cut off Mário Gonçalves' ear. . . His ear was thrown on the ground and Sabino Gouveia Leite and João Franca da Silva alias Jhoni Franca forced Mário Gonçalves to eat it. Mário Gonçalves feared for his life and did as he was ordered by eating his right ear."*

829. Dozens of those detained in the sweep were also held without charge at the Lolotoe Sub-District Military Command (Koramil) until some time in July 1999. Testimony and documentation of their arbitrary detention, and of their eventual release, highlight the close and routine cooperation between the militias and both military and civilian authorities in the commission of human rights violations in Bobonaro.

830. A document confirming the return of six people to Guda village on 8 July is especially revealing. The document explains that the six people listed had been held for 'guidance' since 22 May, that they were now being returned to their village "in a safe and healthy condition," but that they might be called for further questioning at some time in the future. The document is co-signed by the Lolotoe Sub-District military commander, Lt. Bambang Indra, the Guda Village Head, Sabino Gouveia Leite, and the Commander of the KMP, José Cardoso Ferreira (alias Mouzhino).* These three men were all indicted in 2001 for crimes against humanity committed in 1999.

* UNTAET, General Prosecutor, Indictment of João Franca da Silva et al. (Case No: BO-06.1-99-SC), 25 May 2001.

831. Military officers and militia members also conspired to abduct and to rape women in the context of the Lolotoe operations. In one notorious case, three men abducted and repeatedly raped three young women whom they alleged had been assisting Falintil. Two of the rapists named by the victims were familiar figures: the Sub-District Military Commander, Lt. Bambang Indra, and the KMP militia commander, José Cardoso Ferreira (alias Mouzhino). The third man was a TNI intelligence officer, Francisco Noronha.

832. The rapes in question took place over several days at the end of June 1999 in a hotel in the town of Atambua, in West Timor. According to one of the women, the TNI intelligence officer Noronha and the militia leader Fereira told them that if they refused to have intercourse with the three of them, they would be killed, and their bodies thrown into the ocean. Two of the men (Lt. Indra and Fereira) were carrying automatic weapons, and at least one was equipped with contraceptive technology.

833. One of the victims later described her ordeal. She said that Francisco Noronha came into her room and gave her an injection in the buttock, telling her that it was to prevent her from getting pregnant. According to her account, Noronha then told the woman that he had heard that her name was on a list of people working for Falintil and that she must therefore service him. Then he pushed her down on the bed and raped her.

834. After two nights of repeated rape, and four more days in detention, the women were eventually brought to the Sub-District Military Command in Lolotoe. There, one of the three rapists, Lt. Bambang Indra, in his capacity as Sub-District commander, prepared a letter granting them permission to return to their homes.

Attack on UNAMET Maliana (29 June 1999)

835. At about 10.00 am on 29 June 1999, a group of roughly 100 members of the local militia group, Dadurus Merah Putih (DMP), converged rapidly on the UNAMET compound in the town of Maliana, Bobonaro District, and attacked it with stones. The available evidence indicates clearly that the incident was orchestrated by District military officers, and that it was directed against the UN compound and those who took refuge there.†

836. Early on the morning of 29 June, some 30 pro-independence supporters had gathered at the front gate of the UNAMET headquarters to report assaults by militia

* See: "Surat Pengembalian," 8 July 1999 (HRU Collection, Doc. BOB #9). Fereira's name appears in this document as "José Mauzino Cardoso," but it is clear that this is the same man as José Cardoso Fereira (alias Mouzhino) named in the indictment.

† Unless otherwise noted, this account is based on the report prepared by UNAMET shortly after the event, and submitted to Indonesian Government authorities. members against their friends and families the previous night. By 10.00 am the crowd outside the compound and in the large field across the street was estimated to number at least 600. While most of the crowd were believed to be casual bystanders, a distinct group of roughly 100 people wearing red and white scarves, some of them carrying machetes, were identified as members of the DMP. Their identity was later confirmed by a DMP leader, Paulus Fereira, in an interview with a UNAMET Political Affairs Officer.

837. Shortly before 10.00 am, members of the DMP group were observed beneath a tree at the south end of the field, close to a Sub-District Military Command post. From there, they moved quickly in the direction of the UNAMET compound, rocks in hand. Film footage shows that, as they reached the road, the militia members broke into a run and began to throw stones in the direction of the UNAMET building. The footage also shows a man in a red jacket and baseball cap on the near side of the road, directing the group and pointing emphatically in the direction of the UNAMET building.

838. Large stones were hurled first through the windows facing the main street, and then over the high walls surrounding the compound, smashing windows on the south and east sides of the building. Rocks continued to rain into the compound for 10 to 15 minutes. The shouts of the attackers continued for some time after the rock-throwing had subsided, and militia members were observed in the large field directly opposite the UNAMET compound for several hours thereafter.

839. As many as twelve people were injured in the incident, including one UN Volunteer, and several of the estimated 26 local people who had fled into the compound when the attack began. The injuries sustained included concussion, a compound fracture, laceration, and severe bruising; and at least two local people were rendered temporarily unconscious as a result of severe blows to the head. The hail of stones also resulted in property damage, both to the UN building itself and to UN vehicles.

840. The response of the Police to this incident was seriously inadequate and suggested either an unwillingness, or an inability, to take effective action against the militia even though they had clearly committed a crime. In the face of strong international pressure, Police did arrest and charge five militiamen for their alleged role in the attack. However, the cases were not vigorously pursued and, after receiving brief suspended sentences, the accused were all released.

841. The weakness of the Police response could not reasonably be attributed to a lack of advance information about the possibility of an attack. In the days before the incident, UNAMET personnel and others had relayed to Police authorities several reported threats against UN facilities and personnel. On 28 June, UN Civpol officers conveyed a credible report that a militia attack against UNAMET was planned for the morning of 29 June.

842. Despite such advance reports, there were no more than six ordinary policemen on duty in front of the UNAMET headquarters when the attack occurred. Two of these six may have been members of the Police auxiliary unit, known as Kamra. As the assault on the compound began, one Police officer made a brief but ineffectual attempt to intercede, but he and his colleagues soon turned and ran for cover. Film footage from inside the compound confirms that a number of Indonesian Police officers were there during and shortly after the attack. At least one of these was reported to have provided assistance to UN staff and others taking cover there.

843. In addition to the six policemen posted in front of the UNAMET office, some 24 police were said to be deployed to assist crowd control in the field across the road, while a Mobile Brigade (Brimob) contingent of roughly 20 men was reportedly deployed to guard the UN helicopter that had landed there at about 9.30 am that morning. None of these forces, however, took any action to prevent the violence and intimidation, which was allowed to continue unimpeded for some 15 to 20 minutes. About 20 Mobile Brigade (Brimob) Police finally arrived on the scene after the violence had subsided.

844. The inadequacy of the Police response was especially troubling in view of the proximity of the UNAMET headquarters to various Police stations in Maliana and the relative speed with which the incident was reported to them. The District Police headquarters (Polres) was only about 500 metres from the UNAMET office, and there was a Police post (Polsek) about 150 metres away. In addition, there was a Sub-District Military Command (Koramil) about 100 metres from the UNAMET office. An emergency call was placed from UNAMET to the Police switchboard within a minute of the start of the attack, and a journalist personally alerted authorities at the Polres a few minutes later.

845. Just as troubling as the slow response were the actions of the Police once they finally arrived on the scene. Despite clear evidence that a crime had been committed, neither the regular Police nor the Brimob made any arrests. Indeed, as noted above, militia members were seen and heard in the immediate vicinity of the UNAMET compound for several hours after the attack. For several days thereafter, the DMP appeared free to operate, and to commit acts of intimidation and violence, with impunity.

846. A series of developments on the day and night prior to the incident, and elements of the attack itself, confirmed the alleged links between the militia group, Dadurus Merah Putih, and TNI officers in Maliana. Those links, described in detail below, help to explain why the Police were unwilling or unable to restrain the militia group.

847. On 28 June, the day before the incident, a full meeting of the DMP militia was reportedly convened at 7.30 am at the sports building across the playing field from the UNAMET office. Present at the meeting, according to reports, were the Maliana District Military Commander (Dandim), Lt. Col. Burhanuddin Siagian; the Head of Military Intelligence (Pasi Intel), First Lt. Sutrisno; the DMP commander, Domingos dos Santos; and two other DMP leaders, Mau Buti and Julião Gomes. The last three named were active or retired TNI officers or soldiers.

848. At the meeting the Dandim, Lt. Col. Siagian, reportedly briefed the DMP about their duties with respect to the Popular Consultation and the arrival of UNAMET. Witnesses reported that Siagian stressed the following points: that the Popular Consultation was not necessary in Bobonaro District; that nobody should be allowed to approach the UNAMET office; that the local UNAMET staff should be scared off and replaced by DMP members; and that the UNAMET flag should be pulled down. A member of the DMP who was present at the briefing testified that Lt. Col. Siagian had also told the group not to worry about any repercussions or reactions from the Police or Mobile Brigades posted to defend the UN compound because, in his reported words, "they are one of us."

849. Observations made on the morning of 29 June, and the testimony of those who were at the scene of the incident, strengthen beyond reasonable doubt the probability of a link between the local military authorities and the militia, and their joint responsibility for the attack.

850. At least two local eyewitnesses reported observing the Head of Military Intelligence, First Lt. Sutrisno, and the District Military Commander, Lt. Col. Siagian, at the scene of the incident in plainclothes, and they concur that they made no effort to prevent the attack, or to stop it once it had commenced. When the UNAMET Political Officer arrived at the scene roughly 15 minutes after the incident began, he encountered Lt. Col. Siagian who, in turn, introduced him to three DMP commanders, saying that they wished to explain their actions to UNAMET. Local witnesses also reported the names of several active and retired TNI members who were among the militia group itself at the time of the incident, all of them dressed in civilian attire. Finally, it is noteworthy that, at the conclusion of the attack, members of the militia assumed a military-style formation and marched toward the local military post, about 100 metres from the UNAMET compound.

851. Taken together, this evidence suggests very clearly that the militia group responsible for the 29 June attack, the DMP, was controlled by TNI officers in Maliana, and more specifically by the District Military Commander, Lt Col Burhanuddin Siagian, and Chief of Intelligence, First Lt. Sutrisno. In view of this finding, it is difficult to escape the conclusion that the attack, and the inadequacy of official efforts to prevent and stop it, were part of an effort by these authorities to impede or disrupt the work of the United Nations.

Attack on humanitarian convoy (4 July 1999)

852. At about 4.00 pm on Sunday, 4 July, a convoy of vehicles returning from a successful humanitarian mission to assist internally displaced persons (IDPs), was attacked by roughly 20 members of the armed militia group Besi Merah Putih (BMP) as it passed through the town of Liquiçá. One UNAMET staff member was directly targeted, many NGO personnel were assaulted, and one was hospitalised with a serious head injury. NGO and UNAMET vehicles were badly damaged.*

853. In response to the increasingly unsafe situation, it was decided to evacuate all UNAMET personnel from the Liquiçá area the same day, and a helicopter was sent from Dili for this purpose. However, the evacuation plan had to be aborted when another group of armed militias, probably BMP, attacked the helicopter with stones and homemade guns. A second evacuation effort was also aborted when militias surrounded UNAMET personnel, and attempted to assault local staff members.

854. The two attacks occurred against the background of a series of threats against UN personnel in the town of Liquiçá – and just a few days after the attack on UNAMET headquarters in Maliana and militia intimidation of UN personnel in Viqueque. A number of these incidents were reported to Police authorities (Polres) in Liquiçá, as a result of which some additional Mobile Brigade personnel were posted to protect UNAMET staff. However, these provisions and prior warnings did not have any significant impact on the freedom with which the militia moved about town and engaged in acts of intimidation and violence.

855. Those in the humanitarian convoy included some 50 representatives of local NGOs, and about 20 IDPs who had been evacuated from villages along the border between Ermera and Liquiçá to receive medical attention. The group was accompanied by the UNAMET Officer for Humanitarian Affairs, and a representative of the UNHCR. About one hour before reaching Liquiçá, the convoy was joined by two UNAMET Military Liaison Officers (MLOs) who were in the area on another assignment.

856. At the time of the attack, the convoy was stationary, and many of the passengers were taking the opportunity to stretch their legs or buy refreshments at nearby shops. The Humanitarian Affairs Officer had requested the brief stop to speak with the UNAMET MLOs, who planned to leave the convoy at that point. Concerned for the safety of the IDPs, he asked the MLOs to return to the area of the humanitarian distribution to ensure that the population would not be harassed by the militia. Having finished his conversation, the officer began to walk from the MLO vehicle back up the road and around a corner toward the front of the convoy. As he rounded the corner, he witnessed the early moments of the militia attack.

857. Television footage and the eyewitness testimonies of more than a dozen people, including some BMP members and bystanders, allow the following reconstruction of the incident. About five minutes after the convoy stopped in Liquiçá, a blue-green mini-van with the word "Miramar" on the side sped down the hill from the south, and came to a sudden stop near the middle of the line of parked vehicles. As the van stopped, about 20 young men jumped out and began to approach the NGO and UNAMET staff, some shouting "kill them!" Most were carrying machetes, knives, or home-made guns. At least one member of the group was carrying an automatic weapon. Without warning or provocation the militia members began to attack, waving their machetes and knives menacingly, pointing their guns at members of the convoy, and smashing the windows of most of the vehicles. The attack continued as people tried to flee on foot and in vehicles. At least two eyewitnesses testified that armed militiamen clung to, and thrust weapons into, one of the UNAMET vehicles as it drove eastward along the main road toward Dili.

858. NGO staff took the brunt of the attack, but UNAMET personnel were also targeted. The Humanitarian Affairs Officer was threatened by three militia men who pointed their weapons directly at him at close range. Television footage also shows him trying to protect some members of the group, before he and the others turn and flee for the safety of a vehicle. Most of the group was finally able to run or drive to the nearby Liquiçá District Police station (Polres), while about ten people fled to the local Police post (Polsek). Eventually, all members of the convoy, including UNAMET personnel, were brought to the Polres. There, the Humanitarian Affairs Officer voluntarily passed to the Police a home-made gun that had been discovered inside his vehicle.

859. Several people were injured in the attack, and most were seriously shaken. Film footage reveals that one man was kicked brutally in the head by a BMP member. The victim of that attack was Laurentino Soares, the driver of one of the NGO vehicles, who was hospitalised with severe trauma to his head. A BMP member testified that Mr. Soares was also struck in the head with a gun before being kicked. Two members of the BMP also suffered gunshot wounds during the incident. They were identified as Romaldo Corea Martins, the local BMP post commander and member of the Liquiçá Police auxiliary (Kamra), and Fernando Ramos, a BMP member and farmer. All three victims were transported to Wirahusada military hospital in Dili, where they were interviewed by UNAMET personnel on 4 July and again on 6 July. Mr. Laurentino Soares was subsequently transferred to a different medical facility. Six other people reported missing after the attack were subsequently located.

860. Shortly after the attack on the humanitarian convoy, an armed militia group launched a separate attack on UNAMET personnel who were preparing to evacuate from Liquiçá. Nobody was injured in that incident, and all personnel were eventually brought back to Dili safely, but the attack again highlighted the unwillingness or inability of the Police to intervene.

861. The decision to evacuate had been taken in response to early reports of the attack on the humanitarian convoy, and to the series of attacks on and threats against the UN over the previous two days. A helicopter was sent from Dili to a specified location on the beach near Liquiçá, and all UN staff were gathered in one house in preparation for moving to that location in convoy. While the UN staff waited, they were guarded by a contingent of Mobile Brigades (Brimob).

862. The evacuation plan had to be aborted, however, when two UN staff members, one Civpol and the Field Security Officer, were ambushed by militia members as they drove toward the beach to meet the helicopter. The militiamen carried machetes and home-made guns and brandished these at the UN personnel. Despite these threats, the two UN staff managed to drive their vehicle to the beach in time to warn the pilot and passengers of the militia's presence, and of the probability of an attack. The decision was taken to fly the helicopter to a different location in order to draw the militia away from the area. As the helicopter prepared to take off the militia arrived and began to pelt it with stones. Those present at the scene also reported that shots were fired at the helicopter.

863. After the helicopter took off, the convoy of eight UN vehicles that had been preparing for evacuation drove to the alternative evacuation site. Soon after arriving at the site, however, they were surrounded by militia members who had arrived in a truck. The militia banged on the windows of the vehicles, leveled their weapons directly at the passengers, made menacing gestures, and tried to drag at least one local staff member from a vehicle. Indonesian Police present at the scene did nothing to stop the attack.

They did not take measures against the militia members, who remained in the area making threatening gestures.

864. Eventually, the UNAMET personnel managed to drive away from the scene. As they headed toward Dili, however, they encountered a roadblock just outside the Liquiçá Police station (Polres) manned by two militiamen, one of whom was observed carrying an automatic weapon. Prevented from continuing down the road, they turned into the Liquiçá Police station, where they joined members of the humanitarian convoy who were already there. Later the same evening, both groups returned in a convoy to Dili, arriving there safely at about 10.00 pm.

865. In a related incident, two UNAMET vehicles that had been dispatched from Dili encountered a militia roadblock a few kilometres east of Liquiçá. Several militia members aimed home-made guns at the first UN vehicle carrying Indonesian Police Colonel Sitompul and Civpol Superintendant Polden. When the first vehicle went past, the militiamen then aimed their weapons at the second vehicle, containing another Civpol officer. At least one home-made gun was discharged in the direction of the UNAMET vehicles, but no damage or injuries were sustained.

866. The available evidence strongly suggests that the Indonesian Police were either complicit in the attacks of 4 July or, at a minimum, were unwilling or unable to stop them. That conclusion is reinforced by the refusal of the Police to provide a requested escort for the humanitarian convoy, by the inadequacy of the Police response once the attacks were underway, by Police behavior in the immediate aftermath of the incident, and by the nature of their subsequent investigations. An especially troubling aspect of the Police response was the energy with which they pursued the spurious allegations of NGO and UNAMET provocation, while taking no action against the militia groups who were known to have committed criminal acts. As in the case of the attack on UNAMET headquarters in Maliana, strong international pressure led to the arrest of several militiamen. However, those charged were soon released after receiving short suspended sentences.

867. Concern with the Police approach to the humanitarian convoy began to emerge a few days before the 4 July militia attack. Before heading out, the NGOs – through UNAMET – had requested a Police escort to accompany the convoy, and this appeared to be approved. Shortly before the convoy was set to depart, however, Police authorities informed UNAMET that it would not be providing an escort. The reason given was that the delivery of humanitarian assistance was not within UNAMET's mandate, although UNAMET made clear that it was requesting the escort on behalf of the NGOs organising the convoy. On the morning of Sunday, 4 July, UNAMET conveyed to the Police a further request that, in view of threatened militia attacks, the convoy should be escorted by Police on its return journey to Dili. This was agreed, but did not happen. Without question, the refusal to provide a Police escort created the conditions in which an attack could easily take place.

868. The Police also failed to respond effectively once the attack on the humanitarian convoy was underway, allowing the incident to continue without impediment, and taking no action whatsoever to arrest those responsible. In view of the fact that the incident took place just around the corner from the local Police station (Polsek), and just minutes by car from the District Police station (Polres), the failure of Police to stop the attack, or to detain the perpetrators, was troubling.

869. Finally, Police investigations were marked by a conspicuous lack of impartiality. From the outset, Police efforts were directed toward proving allegations that the attack had been 'provoked' by people in the humanitarian convoy. Meanwhile, no effort was made to detain or investigate the militia members who had been observed attacking the convoy with weapons. Most of the evidence pointed to the conclusion that the Police investigation was being influenced by TNI authorities, without regard to proper police procedure.

870. In short, the passive attitude of the Police toward the perpetrators of the attacks, and the woeful inadequacy of their investigations, clearly suggests that the militias were under the control of, and protected by, TNI authorities over whom the Police had no effective power.

Murder of UNAMET staff members at Boboe Leten (30 August 1999)

871. Among the targets of grave human rights violations both before and after the ballot were members of UNAMET's East Timorese staff. At least 14 local staff members were killed in 1999, and many others suffered injury, death threats, and forcible deportation.*

872. Local staff members were targeted because of their real or alleged pro-independence sympathies and because of a general antipathy toward UNAMET fueled by repeated allegations by Indonesian officials of UNAMET bias and unfairness. In other words, the killings were not random acts of violence but politically motivated assassinations. In virtually every case, moreover, they were carried out with the ac-quiescence or the direct involvement of Indonesian military and Police forces.

873. The murder of two UNAMET staff members, João Lopes and Orlando Gomes, and the attempted murder of a third, Alvaro Lopes, in Ermera is one of the clearest examples of this general pattern. The three men were all UNAMET staff members working at the polling station in the village of Boboe Leten, in the Sub-District of Atsabe. They were attacked by armed militiamen while loading ballot boxes onto UNAMET vehicles at the end of polling on 30 August.†

* The UNAMET staff members known to have been killed in 1999 are: João Lopes, Ruben Barros Soares, Domingos Pereira, José Ernesto Jesus Maia, Orlando Gomes, Leonel Silva de Oliveira, Manuel de Oliveira, Mariano da Costa, Ana Lemos, Carlos Maia, Abrui da Costa, Hilario Boavida da Silva, Francisco Taek, and Paulos Kelo. It is not clear that all of those killed were targeted because they were UNAMET employees, but most were.

† An internal TNI report mistakenly states that all three men died. See: Secret telegram from Dandim Ermera (Lt. Col. Muhammad Nur) to Danrem 164/WD (Col. Noer Muis), No. TR/148/1999, 31 August 1999 (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #42).

874. The trouble began in the late afternoon, when a group of militiamen armed with machetes, knives, and guns arrived at the polling centre, and began to issue threats against local staff members. Eyewitnesses have testified that the militias arrived in a dark blue jeep-like vehicle (a 'Kijang'), and that they were accompanied by TNI members carrying automatic weapons.

875. UNAMET staff reported their presence by radio, and expressed concern for the security of the ballots and for their own safety. The message was relayed to the nearest polling center, in Lauana. Having established that polling had finished there, the Lauana team was directed to load their vehicles immediately and travel by Police-escorted convoy to Boboe Leten. The convoy arrived at Boboe Leten at about 5.00 pm. Two or three minutes later, the convoy leader radioed to report that militias were firing automatic weapons in the immediate vicinity of the polling station. The attack was underway.[*]

876. As militias and TNI soldiers fired their automatic weapons, a man later identified as a TNI soldier, João da Costa, entered the polling centre. There he stabbed João Lopes who was carrying a ballot box to a waiting UNAMET vehicle. The militiaman then dragged Mr. Lopes outside, where two more militiamen stabbed him in the back. UNAMET staff managed to get to Mr. Lopes and place him in the back of a UN vehicle. He was then driven to the Civpol building in Atsabe town, where Civpol officers administered emergency medical treatment for a punctured lung and severe blood loss. Despite these efforts, João Lopes died shortly after 6.00 pm.

877. Back in Boboe Leten, the militias had attacked two more poll workers. According to an internal UN report one of the two victims, Orlando Gomes, was severely beaten with a stick and then stabbed to death by militias.[†] His body was reportedly buried in a sewer. His remains were later exhumed and reburied at a site close to the Polling Centre.

878. The third man, Alvaro Lopes, was also attacked while carrying a ballot box to the UN vehicles. He was seriously wounded but survived. According to the UN report cited above, the TNI member João da Costa first grabbed Alvaro by the arm, and then stabbed him. The blade entered into the lower left side of his back and came out the front on the lower right hand side of his torso. He was then dragged to a corner and left there by militias who apparently assumed he was dead. When the militias had finally left, Alvaro's father retrieved him and took him to the mountains where he treated him with traditional medicines.

879. A UNAMET investigation undertaken the next day established that TNI officers and soldiers had been directly involved in the attack, and that others had acquiesced in it. It also revealed the clear political motivation behind the killings, and provided abundant evidence of the inadequacy of the Police and TNI response to the incident. These observations were recorded in an internal UNAMET report, dated 31 August, which recorded the highlights of a UNAMET investigative visit to Atsabe that day.*

880. On the matter of TNI complicity, the report noted that a Civpol officer had testified in writing that TNI members were directly involved in the attack at Boboe Leten. The report also drew attention to evidence of the acquiescence and complicity of the Sub-District Military Commander (Danramil) in the attack. Several UNAMET staff observed, for example, that the vehicle (the dark blue Kijang) being driven by the Danramil on 31 August was the same vehicle that had been used to transport the militias to the scene of the attack. According to the report, moreover, the Danramil admitted to UNAMET officials that he had known of the plan to attack UNAMET on 30 August, but had done nothing to prevent it. According to the report, the Danramil:

> "... expressed no regret at the violence of the previous night, but instead sought to justify it [on] the grounds that the 'people' had been angry at UNAMET's alleged lack of neutrality. He volunteered that he had been forewarned that there would be an attack against UNAMET personnel on August 30, and that he had told the militia not to injure any UNAMET international staff. When [UNAMET officials] asked why he had not sought to prevent the attack entirely, the Danramil said that if he had interfered, the militias might have turned against him."†

881. On the matter of the motivation behind the assault, the report confirmed that the militias were acting with political intent. It noted that, in a discussion with UNAMET officials on 31 August, "the militia leader said his people had killed Mr. Lopes because UNAMET staff had not been neutral and had 'forced' people to vote against autonomy. He also said that, for the same reasons, his men would not allow the ballot boxes or UNAMET local staff, to leave."‡

882. Finally, on the question of the official response to the incident, the UNAMET report described it as "completely inadequate," and offered the following observations of official behavior during UNAMET's visit to Atsabe on 31 August:

> "The first team, which arrived in Atsabe at about 7.00 hours, found the deceased, João Lopes, lying in the Civpol house, accompanied by his mourning family, and the house surrounded by about 50 armed militia members . . . Lengthy discussions with the local Police chief (Kapolsek) and a Police Liaison Officer from Polres Ermera, produced assurances that the militias would be dispersed and restrained, but no > action was taken and the militias maintained their armed presence in the immediate vicinity of the Civpol house . . . In response to repeated UNAMET requests that the militias be asked to disperse he explained that he did not dare to make such a request."

883. Likewise, the report noted, the Danramil "refused to provide any guarantee that the militias would be restrained, let alone arrested."[*]

884. A high-level TNI and Police delegation from Dili and Ermera that arrived later on the afternoon of 31 August managed to convince the militias to allow the ballot boxes and local staff to leave. However, even that delegation – which included Police Col. Made Pastika from Dili, and both the Dandim and Kapolres from Ermera – was unable or unwilling to secure UNAMET access to the scene of the crime. According to the UNAMET report, "Police and military authorities . . . continued to insist that security could not be ensured, and were unwilling to exert their authority to make a visit possible."[†]

885. Later investigations and documentation have substantiated these early observations, while adding important details. Investigations have found eyewitnesses able to identify several of the attackers by name. Significantly, those named include four alleged agents of the notorious military intelligence outfit SGI and three regular members of the TNI.[‡] This evidence adds further weight to the conclusion that the TNI was directly involved in the killings.

886. A secret military report on the attack, dated 31 August and signed by the Dandim of Ermera, does not provide evidence of direct TNI involvement, but it does reveal the remarkable extent to which TNI officers accepted or perhaps shared the militia outlook and interpretation of events. The explanation offered for the murders of 30 August in the report, for example, is virtually identical to the explanation provided to UNAMET by the militia leader on 30 August. It reads: "The cheating of local UNAMET staff members angered the pro-autonomy people, leading them to attack those staff members at about 5.00 pm on 30 August."[§]

Forcible relocation and murder of refugees in Dili (5-6 September 1999)

887. Fearful of the mounting violence, in the days after the 30 August vote many of Dili's residents fled to the surrounding hills or sought out places of refuge within the city. On

5 and 6 September, these places of refuge were attacked by large groups of militiamen, as well as TNI and Police personnel. The compounds themselves were destroyed and burned, dozens of refugees were seriously injured, and at least 17 people were killed.*

888. Eyewitness testimony indicates that these attacks were not a random assault by marauding militiamen intent on revenge, but a carefully orchestrated operation intended to terrorise refugees and to force their removal to West Timor. In that sense, the attacks stand as a clear example of the methods employed by security forces and militias throughout the territory to bring about the forcible relocation of some 400,000 people in the days and weeks after the ballot.

889. The first of the attacks was on the Dili Diocese, where some 300 people had sought refuge in previous days. At about noon on 5 September, as many as 50 armed Aitarak militiamen began to assault the refugees there, and to destroy and set fire to the buildings in the compound. The attack continued until the late afternoon. A large number of TNI and Police personnel were present at the scene throughout this time, but took no action to prevent the attack, or to stop it once it was underway. In fact, some TNI and Police joined in the attack.

890. The assault proceeded in two stages. First, all of the refugees were forced from the compound and across the road to Dili harbour. Next, the men were separated from the women and children, and subjected to further interrogation and beatings. Those believed to be students, UNAMET staff or CNRT members were singled out for especially harsh treatment. The precise number of casualties is not known. However, investigators have established the identities of more than 20 people subjected to inhumane acts during the attack, and at least 15 people who were killed or disappeared.

891. As the attack on the Dili Diocese began, some of Indonesia's most senior military, police, and civilian officials were meeting at the home of the Timor-Leste military commander, Col. Noer Muis, about two kilometres away.†According to an aide to Bishop Belo, Manuel Abrantes, who attended and took notes at that meeting, Bishop Belo explicitly asked General Wiranto to instruct the TNI and Police commanders in Timor-Leste to control the militias.‡ After some discussion, and clear opposition from the supreme militia commander, João Tavares, the Bishop repeated his request. This time General Wiranto replied "Yes, Bishop."§ The events of the following day, however, demonstrated either that no such order was ever issued or that an order was issued but ignored. In the course of just a few hours on the morning of 6 September, three major places of refuge in Dili were attacked by armed militiamen.

892. One target was the Canossian Convent where some 100 people and nine Sisters had sought sanctuary. Militias drove all of them from the compound, assaulting one Sister in the process, and then destroyed most of the property inside. A second target was the compound of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), where an estimated 2,000 people had gathered in the days after the vote. Firing their weapons and shouting, militiamen forced the refugees out onto the road, where suspected pro-independence activists were separated from the others before being marched away. As in the case of the Dili Diocese, Police and TNI personnel either took part in these attacks or failed to take action to prevent them.

893. The most widely reported and thoroughly documented of the three attacks of 6 September targeted an estimated 5,000 people who had sought refuge in Bishop Belo's residence. More than 15 people were seriously wounded in the attack, at least one was killed, and the Bishop's house was reduced to a smouldering ruin.

894. The attack was preceded by ominous signs of official complicity. Early on the morning of 6 September, Bishop Belo called the Timor-Leste Chief of Police, Col. Timbul Silaen, to request assistance in protecting and perhaps evacuating the refugees. Col. Silaen reportedly said he could not help, and advised the Bishop to contact the East Timor Military Commander, Col. Noer Muis. The Bishop then called Col. Muis, who also said he could not help. At about 9.00 am an unidentified Kostrad officer arrived at the residence to speak to the Bishop. The officer told the Bishop that he wished to protect him and the compound, and he invited the Bishop to call if anything happened. He then took his leave. About 15 minutes later, militias began to arrive.

895. The first group, about 20 men wearing no shirts, arrived on motorbikes. They were followed by dozens of others, riding in several jeep-like vehicles (Kijang) and yellow dump trucks. Those in the trucks were wearing red and white headbands. In all, there were more than 100 militiamen. As they gathered, the militias shouted abuse at the refugees inside, calling them "Sons of whores," and threatening "We will kill you – we know you are pro-independence!" Some reportedly shouted "Fuck your mother!" and "You can eat your own shit if you want to be independent!"*

896. The attack then unfolded in what appeared to be a coordinated fashion. The militias began by driving around the compound, which is bounded on all sides by roads. The first time around they fired pistols, automatic weapons, and home-made guns into the compound, breaking windows and apparently causing some injuries. The second time around, they hurled incendiary devices (Molotov cocktails) into the compound. Some of those devices entered the Bishop's residence, and soon the house was in flames.†

897. Meanwhile, dozens of militias armed with guns and swords entered the compound and began arresting young men while shouting for others to leave. People were screaming and crying, and a number of people were seriously injured. Among them was a girl, aged seven, who lost her left eye when hit by a stray bullet, and a young boy who was shot in the back of the head.*

898. According to the indictment issued by the Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Police and TNI personnel actively participated in the attack. More specifically, the indictment states that:

> "... members of TNI and Brimob entered the compound firing automatic weapons, assaulting refugees and ordering them outside. Members of POLRI entered the compound and ordered the refugees out. One member of POLRI set Bishop Belo's house alight with a number of gerry-cans of petrol."†

899. Eventually, the refugees made their way outside to the Travessa Lecidere, a square adjacent to the Bishop's compound. Indonesian Police and TNI units, and at least one TNI officer, were present throughout this operation.‡ Manuel Abrantes, who was there, described the scene:

> "As people were leaving the compound, units of Kostrad and the Police appeared, including the Commander of Kostrad. As we were being directed by the militia into the Travessa Lecidere, militia members said 'Don't talk, don't scream. If you scream, we'll kill you.' Guns were pointed at us by the militia, the Police and Kostrad."§

900. In the midst of the chaos, the Bishop left the compound to speak to the Kostrad commander who had earlier offered his assistance. After some discussion with him and with Police officers, the Bishop was taken away. He was driven first to the Regional Police headquarters (Polda), before being taken by helicopter to the city of Baucau, where he joined Bishop Nascimento.

901. Meanwhile, at the compound in Dili, five or six militiamen were interrogating the assembled refugees. A militia leader, armed with a pistol and a grenade and wearing an Indonesian flag on his head, demanded to know whether the refugees were for independence or integration. The refugees shouted that they were for integration. Still brandishing his weapons, the militia leader demanded to know where the CNRT members were, mentioning two leaders (Leandro Isaac and Manuel Carrascalão) by name. As the interrogations proceeded, additional militiamen arrived. The new militias, apparently BMP from Liquiçá, were wearing red berets and camouflage uniforms similar to those worn by Kopassus troops. *

902. At about 1.00 pm the militia commander ordered the refugees to gather their things and go to the Regional Police headquarters (Polda) on the other side of town. According to Manuel Abrantes, the militia commander threatened the refugees, saying that if they did not go to the Police station "We'll kill you and won't be responsible."† Some of the refugees managed to escape in the direction of the mountains but, fearing for their lives, a substantial number made their way to the Regional Police headquarters some three kilometres away. After a period of waiting, they were loaded onto trucks and transported to West Timor, joining some 250,000 others in exile.

Suai church massacre (6 September 1999)

903. The District of Covalima was the scene of widespread human rights violations both before and after the ballot in 1999. The worst single incident in the District, and among the worst in the country, was the massacre at the Ave Maria church in the town of Suai on September 6, 1999.‡

904. At least 40 people, but possibly as many as 200, were killed in the massacre.§ Of the 40 whose identities were known by late 2002, three were Catholic priests, ten were under the age of 18, and more than a dozen were women. The dead were among some 1,500-2,000 people who had taken refuge at the old church, in the priest's quarters adjacent to it, and in a new half-built church a few hundred metres away, because of mounting violence and intimidation by militias and security forces.

905. The key perpetrators of the Suai church massacre, and of the 1999 violence in Covalima generally, were members of the district's main militia group, Laksaur, commanded by Olivio Mendonça Moruk. Some of the perpetrators also belonged to the Ainaro-based militia group, Mahidi, led by Cancio Lopes de Carvalho. But the militias did not operate independently. As in all other districts, they were formed, trained, supplied, and directed by TNI officers. They also had the financial and political backing of the civilian administration, and the support or acquiescence of the Police and the Mobile Brigades in the district.

§ The KPP-HAM estimates that 50 were killed, while the local human rights organisation, Yayasan HAK, places the figure between 50 and 200. The indictment issued in this case says that "between 27 and 200 civilians were killed during the attack." See Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Egidio Manek et al., Dili, 28 February 2003, p. 232.

906. The officials with most immediate responsibility for the control of the militias in Covalima, and with direct responsibility for the Suai church massacre, were the Bupati, Col. Herman Sediyono, the Dandim, Lt. Col. Lilik Koeshardianto (a.k.a. Lilik Kushadiyanto), the District Chief of Police, Lt. Col. (Pol.) Gatot Subiaktoro, and the Sub-District Military Commander for Suai, Lt. Sugito. All four men were observed, bearing arms, at the scene of the massacre, and all are alleged to have participated in the attack.*

907. Although they were not reported at the scene of the attack, two other military officers arguably share responsibility for the massacre because of their direct role in mobilising and coordinating militia activities in the district. They are the District Military Commander until late August, Lt. Col. Achmad Mas Agus, and a TNI intelligence officer, Sgt. Yus Nampun.

908. The massacre of 6 September was preceded by several months of tension and violence in the town of Suai, much of it centreing on the IDPs in the church. The IDPs had first come to the church in early 1999, following the murder of several CNRT leaders, and a series of militia attacks on villages deemed to be pro-independence strongholds. A group of about 300 IDPs had gone to the church in late June after UNAMET officials facilitated their return to Suai from their places of refuge in the mountains. Throughout this period, the militias, the Bupati, and other pro-autonomy leaders, adopted a hostile attitude toward the IDPs, and toward the priests and nuns who were providing them with sanctuary.

909. With the announcement of the result of the ballot on 4 September, militiamen and the TNI began a campaign of violence that quickly came to focus on the IDPs in the church. Laksaur militiamen began, on 4 September, threatening, beating and killing residents of Debos village, in the town Suai, and then looting and burning houses. Some residents fled to the hills, while others joined the hundreds of IDPs already sheltering at the church. At least three people were killed. On September 5, TNI forces, including the Suai Danramil, Lt. Sugito, joined the militia in burning, looting, and firing their weapons in the vicinity of the church. In the course of the day, at least one more person was shot and killed by Laksaur militiamen, and the flow of IDPs swelled.

910. Starting at about 8.00 am the following day, 6 September, Laksaur commanders had a series of meetings with TNI officers, first at the Koramil in Salele, which also served as the militia headquarters in the area, and then at the Kodim in Suai. After the meeting at the Salele Koramil, Laksaur militia members were informed that they would be attacking the Suai church that day. At about 10.00 am, Laksaur and Mahidi militiamen armed with machetes, swords and firearms began to gather around the church compound, and to threaten and taunt the IDPs inside. According to witnesses, a militia member entered the compound and told one of the priests (Father Hilario Madeira) that trucks would soon be arriving to transport the IDPs to West Timor.

* See Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment against Col. Herman Sediyono et.al., Dili, 7 April 2003, p. 42. Herman Sediyono acknowledged in a Jakarta court that he was at the church during the massacre, but claimed that he was trying to stop the violence. See AP, 30 July 2002.

Later the same day, TNI soldiers and Mobile Brigade units arrived and took up positions around the church.

911. Meanwhile, Laksaur commanders and some militia members had gathered at the house of the Bupati, Herman Sediyono. They were armed with rifles, swords and machetes. At about 2.30 pm the militiamen left the Bupati's house and headed towards the church. The Bupati, wearing a TNI uniform and armed with a rifle, followed them to the church in a vehicle.

912. Inside the church, there was growing anxiety. There had been a number of warnings of a planned attack. One of these came from a militiaman who had entered the compound in the morning in search of his niece, and had urged people to leave while they could. Other warnings came by telephone. The head of the District legislature called to offer assistance in taking the IDPs to safety. Finally, around 12 noon, the priests began to urge the IDPs to pack their things and prepare to leave. Hundreds of younger men, thought to be the likely targets of an attack, did leave but as many as 1,500, many of them women and children, remained in the church.

913. Shortly after 2.30 pm the attack began. According to witnesses, two grenades were thrown and then the militia and the TNI started to fire their weapons into the church compound. The attack continued for roughly three hours. Witnesses and prosecutors say that several high-ranking officials were at the scene throughout, and participated in the attack. They included: the Bupati, Col. (ret.) Herman Sediyono; the Dandim, Lt. Col. Lilik Koeshardianto; the District Chief of Police, Lt. Col. (Pol.) Gatot Subiaktoro; and the Danramil, Lt. Sugito.*

914. The first to enter the church were scores of Laksaur and Mahidi militiamen, armed with machetes, swords, knives, and home-made firearms. Immediately behind them were a mixed group of TNI soldiers and militiamen. According to witnesses, the militias headed first toward the priests' and nuns' quarters, adjacent to the old church. As they proceeded they hacked, stabbed, and shot many people in their path. Outside the compound, witnesses said, TNI and Mobile Brigade units maintained a perimeter from which they shot at those fleeing the mayhem.

915. Several witnesses reported hearing between three and five large explosions, which they believed to be grenades, in the course of the attack. One witness, who was hiding in the priests' quarters, said that a grenade was thrown into Father Hilario's room, after which the room was raked with automatic gunfire.

916. Among the first to be killed were the three priests, Father Hilario Madeira, Father Francisco Soares, both Timorese, and Father Tarsisius Dewanto, who was Indonesian. The precise circumstances of their killing remain somewhat unclear, but the statements of witnesses indicate that they were clearly identifiable as priests at the time of their murders. In any case, all three were well known in the community, and they were killed in or nearby the priests' quarters of the old church, making it unlikely that there was doubt about their identity.

917. Witnesses concur that Father Hilario was shot and also stabbed or hacked, by a Laksaur militiaman (Egidio Manek) as he emerged from his room in the priests' quarters. One witness stated that he saw Father Hilario's dead body lying on the floor of the sitting room in the house. Father Francisco is also said to have been stabbed and hacked to death by a Laksaur militiaman (Americo) near his quarters. According to one witness statement, shortly before being killed he implored his attackers to spare the women and children. Father Dewanto, the Indonesian priest, was reportedly killed by gunfire in or near the old church. One witness said that, as Father Dewanto was about to be killed, one of the attackers shouted "Don't kill him! He is one of us!" But the warning came too late.

918. By about 5.00 pm the killing had finally stopped. A number of survivors, some of them women, were led out of the compound by militiamen and TNI soldiers. As they walked they were told not to look around them, but they could not help seeing corpses strewn about the compound. One witness said that blood was flowing like a long stream from inside the church, across the compound and all the way to the street outside. From the church, the survivors were taken to the Kodim headquarters, and to a nearby primary school, where they were interrogated. Several of them were held for about eight days, and at least one woman is reported to have been sexually assaulted by a militiaman while in detention.[*]

919. Early the following morning, 7 September, TNI and militia leaders set about disposing of the bodies and destroying as much evidence as possible. According to one of the indictments issued in the case, those directly involved in the disposal efforts included the former Dandim, Lt. Col. Achmad Mas Agus, and the Suai Danramil, Lt. Sugito.[†] At least 27 bodies, and probably more, were placed onto trucks (the type, color and registration numbers of which are known) and driven out of town, across the border to West Timor.

920. An Indonesian Police officer based in Mettamauk, Wemasa, West Timor, told investigators that trucks loaded with bodies had stopped at his Police post at around 8.30 on the morning of 7 September.[‡]The witness said that Lt. Sugito, the Suai Danramil, had been present, and had told him that the dead were from the church at Suai. Another witness said that he had seen the bodies being buried near the shore in Alas Selatan village, in the District of Belo, West Timor, at about 9.00 am on 7 September. He stated that the burial party was led by Lt. Sugito and included three TNI soldiers and a platoon of Laksaur militiamen from Suai.

921. In late November 1999, Indonesian investigators went to the site indicated by witnesses, and discovered three mass graves. From these graves they exhumed the remains of 27 people, including 16 men, 8 women, and three others whose gender could not be determined. Among those exhumed were the remains of a child of about 5 years, a young man whose lower limbs and pelvis were missing, and a teenage woman who was naked, and whose body had been burned.

922. In addition to those buried in West Timor, and others allegedly thrown into the sea, an undetermined number of bodies were reportedly gathered together at the Suai church and burned beyond recognition. Investigators who visited the site in late 1999 found what appeared to be charred human bones and skulls. On the basis of this information, and statements gathered from families and local officials, by late 2002 UN human rights investigators had identified 40 people thought to have died in the massacre. However, credible estimates of the total number who may have died range as high as 200.

Maliana Police Station massacre (8 September 1999)

923. Bobonaro witnessed a number of mass killings in September 1999. The systematic nature of these killings, the presence of TNI and Police officers at the scene, and the deliberate efforts to dispose of the bodies, all offered powerful evidence that the killings were pre-meditated and organised by Indonesian authorities.

924. The most notorious of the mass killings, and the most revealing of official responsibility, was the attack on refugees at the District Police headquarters in the town of Maliana on 8 September. The victims were among many hundreds of Maliana residents who had sought refuge at the Police station as the town erupted in violence after the 30 August vote. As many as 14 people, some of them children, were killed in the attack.* In addition, at least 13 people who fled the scene were killed the next day in nearby Mulau, and two more were killed at or near the Police station on 10 September. In all, at least 71 people were killed in Maliana Sub-District alone in the period 2-29 September.

925. Witness testimonies concur that the massacre at the Maliana Police station was conducted jointly by TNI soldiers of Kodim 1636 and members of the DMP militia, under the apparent supervision of TNI and SGI officers.† They also agree that Indonesian Police and Brimob forces took no action to prevent the attack, to stop it once it was underway, or to apprehend the perpetrators when it was over.

926. The TNI officers directly implicated in the attack include: the former District Military Commander, Lt. Col. Burhanuddin Siagian, and the District Head of Military Intelligence, Lt. Sutrisno. Lt. Col. Siagian had ostensibly been removed from his post in mid-August, in response to overwhelming evidence of his sponsorship of militia violence. In reality, however, he never left Maliana in the weeks after his removal.

* Higher estimates announced in the weeks and months after the massacre appear to reflect the number of people killed in the area at about this time, only some of whom were actually killed at the Police Station.

† There are unconfirmed allegations that elements of Kostrad's Linud 700, reportedly posted to Maliana in early 1999, were also involved.

Although he wore civilian attire instead of his TNI uniform, he continued to operate in a command position during that period. In the days leading up to the massacre he was repeatedly observed at the Police Station, where he took part in meetings with the Chief of Police and militia boss João Tavares.

927. The Police station massacre was preceded by several days of mounting violence in the town of Maliana, in which several people were executed, many were assaulted and threatened, and some 80% of all buildings were burned or destroyed. Residents who were unable to flee to the hills had begun to gather at the Police station immediately after the ballot.

928. One of those who did so with his family was a veteran Police officer. He later told investigators how armed militiamen and TNI soldiers had come to his village, Lahomea, spreading a message of terror:

> "All of them had surrounded the village and they announced in Bahasa Indonesia and Tetum: 'Since you are all pro-independence supporters we have to kill all of you.' We were afraid that they would return and do what they had announced, so I and my family together with our relatives began to pack our belongings and moved to Polri headquarters where we believed we would have protection."[*]

929. For a time, the refugees seemed safe at the Police station, but there were ominous signs of danger. Starting on 3 September, dozens of militiamen and TNI soldiers were observed moving freely in and out of the Police station compound, and among the refugees.[†] Between 3 and 7 September, moreover, several meetings took place at the Police station, attended by the former Dandim, Lt. Col. Burhanuddin Siagian, the Chief of Police, Major Budi Susilo, and the pro-autonomy leaders João Tavares and Natalino Monteiro.

930. On the morning of 7 September, this group had one final meeting at the Police station.[‡] After the meeting concluded, the Chief of Police and his deputy informed the IDPs that they would have to move to a single area at the rear of the compound, ostensibly to make room for Police officers and their families.[§] Prosecutors allege that the instruction was a ploy by officials to concentrate the IDPs prior to an attack, and it was in the area where they had been regrouped that the IDPs were trapped and killed when the attack began the following day.

931. In the hours before the attack, on 8 September, dozens of militiamen gathered at the Koramil. There they were divided into four groups and briefed on their mission by TNI and SGI officers. Two of the groups were tasked with forming a security perimeter around the Police station. The other two were assigned to seek out and kill the pro-independence leaders sheltering in the Police station compound. Before departing for the Police station, some of the militias had their faces painted black by SGI soldiers.

932. The attack began at about 5.30 pm. Two trucks pulled up in front of the Police station, and three others stopped on a road running along side the compound.* The vehicles were filled with soldiers and militiamen, armed with machetes, knives, and swords. Many of the militiamen were dressed in black and wearing 'Ninja' type hoods or Indonesian flags to cover their faces. The TNI soldiers, most of them wearing combat trousers and black t-shirts, were carrying automatic weapons and side arms. When the vehicles stopped, the soldiers and militiamen jumped down, and took up positions in and around the compound. Some TNI soldiers sealed off the main road running in front of the Police station, while others formed a perimeter around the compound.

933. Meanwhile, dozens of militiamen and TNI soldiers entered the compound from the side entrance and ran into the area where the refugees were gathered. One witness described the initial moments of the attack:

> "I saw the militias running in all directions, chasing men and boys to kill them . . . The refugees were screaming in fear but they could not escape as militias and TNI were all around guarding the place."†

934. In panic, many refugees ran to the security post at the front entrance of the compound, but Brimob soldiers there told them to return to their tents. Not all did so, but those who did then witnessed the attack unfold.

935. Among the first victims was a 13-year-old boy, José Barros Soares, who was hacked to death by militiamen while his younger sister looked on.‡ But the violence was not as random as that scene suggested. The attackers were clearly singling out well-known pro-independence figures for execution. The victims included a number of CNRT leaders, as well as a Sub-District Head, two Village Heads, and several civil servants with pro-independence sympathies.§

936. The militias also targeted the families of such figures. According to one report, for example, the militias who killed the young boy, José Barros Soares, told his sister that they were killing him because they could not find his father, a known independence figure. Also singled out were members of the TNI and Police who were considered to be independence sympathisers.[*]

‡ A western journalist reported in 2001 that several other children – Renato Gonçalves (12), Victorino Lopes (11), and Francisco Barreto (10) – had been killed in the police station massacre. See Mark Dodd, "Widows who share a legacy of murder," Suara Timor Lorosae, 10 August 2001. This report would appear to be in error. Several children were killed in Maliana, along with their father, on the morning of 8 September, but they were not killed in the Police station.

§ Those reportedly killed at the Police station include: Lourenço Gomes, a high-level clandestine figure; Manuel Barros, a well-known pro-independence leader; Julio Barros, the Camat of Maliana; Domingos Pereira, the Head of Ritabou Village; and Damião, the former Head of Tapo Village.

937. In some instances, the attackers asked for their intended victims by name. In other cases, they appear to have known exactly where in the compound to find them. One witness said that the attackers had a list of names to which they referred as they made their way through the compound.

> "I was cooking and suddenly the militias came in cars and people started running from one side to the other. Then when people calmed down they divided into sections and entered the tents seeking people on lists to kill."[†]

938. Among those targeted in this way was the prominent Maliana pro-independence figure Manuel Barros, who had taken refuge at the Police station with his family on 2 September. At least four people witnessed his killing, including one man who was just a few feet away when it happened.

939. According to the testimony of that man, shortly after the attack on the compound began, three militiamen walked straight up to Manuel Barros and began to speak to him in an aggressive manner. First they ordered him to stand, then to sit, and then to extend his hand. As he extended his hand, one of the three militiamen lunged forward and stabbed him in the chest with a knife. Manuel Barros immediately fell to the ground and died soon thereafter. His body was then dragged away by the three militiamen.[‡]

940. Many witnesses have said that they saw the Police Chief, Major Budi Susilo, inside the compound as the killings took place, and several witnesses have testified that they saw the District Head of Military Intelligence, Lt. Sutrisno, on a motorbike near the Koramil on the evening of 8 September. At least one witness claims to have seen both Lt. Col. Siagian and Lt. Sutrisno in the immediate vicinity of the Police station: "When I walked out of the compound", the witness told a journalist, "I saw the chief of the Kodim [Siagian] there, with the Intel chief, Lt. Sutrisno. They were waiting for something near the Kijang pick-ups."[§]

941. The attack continued until about 9.00 pm and the disposal of the bodies began shortly thereafter. As in other cases of mass killing in 1999, the process of disposal was methodical, and supervised by TNI officers, indicating that it had been planned in advance by the authorities. It was also clearly intended to conceal the evidence of a crime.

* They included Domingos P. Gonçalves, a TNI soldier. Filomeno Guterres, a Police officer, was killed at or near the station on 10 September 1999. UNTAET interview with witness "FG-1," 12 November 1999.

942. The electricity to the area was cut, and the corpses were loaded onto two or more trucks under the cover of darkness. According to a man who was ordered to assist in loading the bodies onto the trucks, a TNI officer kept track of the identities and the number of dead.* The trucks were then driven out of town to Batugade, a pro-autonomy stronghold near the Indonesian border. The TNI had made arrangements with local militia leaders Rubén Tavares (João Tavares' nephew) and Rubén Gonçalves to receive the corpses and dispose of them. According to prosecutors, the militiamen filled large rice sacks with sand and attached them to the bodies. Weighted down by the sand-filled sacks, the bodies were then taken out to sea on fishing boats, and dumped overboard.

943. The systematic and planned character of the crime at the Maliana Police station is also suggested by further killings of a similar nature that took place in the two days immediately afterward. At least 13 people who managed to flee the attack on the Police station were hunted down and killed with knives and machetes on 9 September at the Mulau lagoon outside Maliana town. One day later, on 10 September, two Timorese policemen were killed in a similar fashion, for their suspected pro-independence leanings.†

944. Like the victims at the Maliana Police station, those killed on 9 and 10 September included prominent leaders and alleged supporters of independence.‡ And like them, their bodies were disposed of in an apparent attempt to hide the crime. The remains of two of those killed at Mulau were later found on the beach at Batugade, some 50 kilometres from the scene of their murder.§

945. In large part because of the deliberate efforts to hide the bodies, the precise number of people killed at the Maliana Police station on 8 September, and over the next two days, has been difficult to determine. According to prosecutors, at least 14 people were killed in the Police station on 8 September. Together with the 13 believed killed at Mulau on 9 September, and two others killed on 10 September, the total from those two days is at least 29 dead. For the District of Bobonaro as a whole, the total number killed in September 1999 is at least 111, and some estimates range as a high as 200. Given the strong possibility that as many as 40 bodies were thrown into the sea, however, it is unlikely that the precise number of dead, or their final resting places, will ever be known.

946. The Maliana Police station massacre is significant not only because of the numbers who died there, but because it so clearly highlights the close operational relationship between the militias, the TNI, and the Police. It therefore points clearly to official responsibility for gross human rights violations amounting to crimes against humanity.

The Passabe and Maquelab massacres (September–October 1999)

947. Compared to some other districts, the District of Oecussi was not a major center of military or militia activity for much of 1999. That situation changed dramatically in the post-ballot period, especially after the departure of UNAMET personnel and other international observers in early September 1999. Over the next several weeks more than 150 civilians were murdered, some in very gruesome fashion, bringing the total number killed in the District in 1999 to at least 170.*

948. The worst of the violence in the district, and probably in the country as a whole, took place near the villages of Passabe and Maquelab. There, roughly 100 people were deliberately killed in what have become known as the Passabe and Maquelab massacres. Eighty-two of the victims were residents of four villages in the Sub-District of Oesilo, in the southeastern part of Oecussi; they were killed en masse near Passabe on 8-10 September. At least 12 more people were deliberately killed in the village of Maquelab, on the north coast on 20 October, just two days before Interfet forces arrived in the district. Virtually all of the targeted villages were known as pro-independence strongholds, and the victims were overwhelmingly independence leaders or supporters.

949. The sequence of events known as the Passabe massacre began early in the morning of 8 September. At about 6.00 am some 200 Sakunar militiamen, accompanied by members of the TNI's 745 Battalion, attacked the villages of Tumin, Quebesilo, Nonquican, and Nibin, in the Sub-District of Oesilo, near the border with Indonesia. The attacks were launched simultaneously from three different directions, suggesting a significant measure of coordination and planning.

950. Indeed, the attacks were preceded by a number of meetings between Sakunar leaders and TNI officers. At one meeting on 7 September, held at a TNI post in Padimau and attended by about 30 people, Sakunar Commander Simão Lopes outlined the plan to attack the villages. A second meeting took place the following morning, 8 September, at the home of the Passabe Village Head (and Sakunar leader), Gabriel Kolo. At that meeting, particular villages were identified as targets, after which militias set out on foot, accompanied by at least four TNI soldiers.

951. Further evidence of planning, and of the coordinating role of the TNI, lies in the fact that some residents of the targeted villages had received advance warning of the attacks from relatives living in the Indonesian town of Imbate just across the border. Evidently, the militia and TNI had established an operational base at Imbate, which was intended to serve as a gathering station after the initial 8 September attack.

952. Many residents heeded the advance warnings and fled to the mountains before the attack. Those who remained behind were subjected to a coordinated assault by militiamen and soldiers armed with a combination of automatic and home-made firearms, as well as machetes, knives, and spears. At least 18 people were killed in this initial attack and another five suffered serious injury.* A number of houses were looted and burned.

953. After the killings, surviving members of the targeted communities were rounded up by Sakunar militiamen and forced across the border to the Indonesian town of Imbate. There they were subjected to a process of screening and sorting that again suggested a measure of advance planning, and a clear intention to target particular categories of the population. Over the course of two days, on September 8 and 9, all of those brought to Imbate were made to register at the Sub-District office, and divided into groups according to age, level of education, and village of origin.

954. Late in the afternoon of 9 September, a group of some 80 young men with better than average education, from the villages of Quebesilo and Tumin, were separated from the rest. At around 6.00 pm they were bound together in pairs, with their hands tied behind their backs. Surrounded by a large number of militiamen, including TNI officers Lt. Col. Sabraca and Sgt. Andre Ulan, and Police officer Gabriel Kolo, they were force-marched out of Imbate. With the TNI, Police, and militiamen threatening and beating them, they walked along the border to the village of Sungkaen, where they crossed the river into Timor-Leste, and then descended along the riverbank toward the village of Passabe.

955. Not far from Passabe, at a place called Nifu Panef, the men were ordered to stop and line up along the river-bed. The distance from the head of the line to the tail was some hundreds of meters. There, at about 1.00 am, on 10 September, a signal was given and the militia and TNI soldiers began to hack the young men to death with machetes and swords. Some of the attackers also used firearms.

956. At about 6.00 am the following morning, still on 10 September, about 100 men from Passabe village were instructed by militiamen to gather tools suitable for road repair work. They were then taken to the site of the killings and ordered to bury the bodies where they had fallen. The villagers were told they would be killed if they revealed any information about what they had seen.

957. Evidence of the attack was later gathered from seven men who had managed to escape and run into the bush. Most had sustained life-threatening injuries from machetes and knives, and some had serious gunshot wounds. Photographs taken by investigators a few months after the events illustrated the severity of the wounds. Investigators examined the massacre site in 2000, and found at least 47 sets of human remains. Nine of the remains had no skull, suggesting that the victims may have been decapitated by their attackers. The investigators also found binding material with the remains, confirming the testimony of survivors that they had been bound by their captors.

958. The murders took place in the middle of the night, and the scene was lit only with a few kerosene lamps, making it difficult for the survivors to identify all of those involved in the killings. However, the key instigators and perpetrators of the massacre are known to have included: the Danramil of Passabe, Lt. Antonio Sabraca, the Babinsa (TNI officer) of Passabe village, Sgt. Andre Ulan; Police officer and Head of Passabe village, Gabriel Kolo; and the Head of Cunha Village, Laurentino Soares (a.k.a. Moko).

* For the names of those known to have been killed, see UNTAET, General Prosecutor, Indictment of Simão Lopes et al.

959. The second massacre of the post-ballot period in Oecussi took place in the vicinity of Maquelab on 20 October 1999. Once again, the main perpetrators were Sakunar militiamen, and the victims were known or alleged supporters of independence. Two local UNAMET employees were also among the dead.

960. Until this massacre, the people of Maquelab had largely been spared the campaign of terror. Their good fortune had been due largely to the efforts of their former Village Head who, despite having been replaced by a pro-autonomy figure, had managed to convince the local militia group not to use violence. The massacre of 20 October, however, was beyond his capacity to control. The militiamen in question were not local men, but part of a large mobile group engaging in a systematic cleansing operation. On the day they reached Maquelab, the militia group had already killed two people in Bokos village and one more in Sai Laut.

961. The trouble in Maquelab began in the early afternoon of 20 October, as the armed militiamen, riding in eight trucks, arrived in the area and started searching for people who had fled to the mountains. Upon finding a large group, the militiamen announced that they had come to take them back to the village so that they could then travel safely to West Timor. The militiamen then rounded up about 300 people and marched them back to the village. On the way, some of the men were beaten. At about 2.00 pm two CNRT leaders were pulled out from the group, and taken behind the Maquelab market where they were killed.

962. About thirty minutes later, the Deputy Commander of Sakunar, Laurentino Soares (a.k.a. Moko) arrived at the scene and ordered the group of villagers to sit down. He then selected four men and ordered them to stand. As the rest of the group watched in horror, he raised his gun and shot the four men. The victims were: the CNRT chief of security and UNAMET local staff member, Francisco Taek; another UNAMET local staff member, Paulos Kelo; a pro-independence student, Mateus Ton; and a CNRT leader, Augustinho Sufa.

963. Immediately after these executions, and evidently on command, the Sakunar militiamen set about burning all of the houses and buildings in Maquelab, without exception. In the course of the afternoon they also killed another six, and possibly seven, people in the village, before moving out to West Timor. Interfet forces arrived in the district two days later.

Rape and Murder of Ana Lemos (13 September 1999)

964. The victims of human rights violations in 1999 included women and girls. Like men, they were targeted because of their membership in pro-independence organisations. They were also singled out because of the political activities of their husbands or male relatives, a practice of Indonesian security forces that long pre-dated the events of 1999. Women and girls were subjected to many of the same kinds of violence as men, including beating, torture, killing and forcible relocation. In addition, however, they suffered a disproportionate number of sexually-related crimes, such as molestation and rape.

965. The fate of many East Timorese women in 1999 was epitomized by the experience of Ana Xavier da Conceição Lemos, a pro-independence activist and mother of three from Ermera District. She was beaten, raped, and killed by militiamen and TNI soldiers in early September 1999.*

966. Ana Lemos was a well-known member of the OMT, a prominent pro-independence women's organisation. When the possibility arose in 1999, she campaigned vigorously for independence, openly criticising Indonesian rule at political gatherings. Her two brothers were also involved in pro-independence organisations, one in the CNRT and the other as a member of Falintil.

967. As a result of these pro-independence activities and associations, Ana Lemos was subjected to repeated threats, and physical violence, by pro-Indonesian militias. In April 1999, for example, her house was surrounded, and its windows smashed, by members of the Darah Integrasi militia, who also stole some Rp400,000 from the premises. The threats abated somewhat with the arrival of UNAMET officials in the district in June, but they never stopped entirely. In fact, throughout that period, Ana Lemos reported to UNAMET officials that she feared for her life. Her fears proved to be well-founded.

968. On ballot day, Ms. Lemos worked as a queue controller at a voting station in Poetete, in Ermera Sub-District. At the close of polling, local militias threatened to attack, so most CNRT people decided to flee to the Falintil cantonment in the nearby mountains. Ana Lemos decided instead to return to Gleno, where her children were. With the assistance of a sympathetic member of the Police Mobile Brigade, she made her way, together with two students, back to her home in Gleno by about 8.00pm that evening, 30 August.

969. Some time around midnight a TNI officer whom she knew, Sgt. Melky, arrived at her home together with several other men thought to be militia members. Two shots were fired and windows and lamps in the house were smashed. Ana and the two students initially hid under their beds, but the men pointed guns at them, so they came out. The three were then subjected to interrogation, in the course of which they were beaten.

970. Sgt. Melky, who led the interrogation, was angry with Ana Lemos. He said that he had protected her when the militias had attacked Gleno on 10 April, but that she had nevertheless persisted with her pro-independence activities. He threatened that, if she reported this encounter to UNAMET, he would get her and her three children after the UN had gone. He hit Ana several times, pulled her hair and knocked her down.

* Unless otherwise noted, this account is based on the following sources: UNTAET, DHRO-Ermera, "Report on Human Rights Violations During 1999: Ermera District" [March, 2000]; and Helene van Klinken, "Taking the Risk, Paying the Price: East Timorese Vote in Ermera," in Tanter, Selden and Shalom, eds., Bitter Flowers, Sweet Flowers: East Timor, Indonesia, and the World Community. Rowman & Littlefield, 2001, pp. 91-107. Helene van Klinken was the UNAMET Political Affairs Officer posted in Ermera in 1999.

Meanwhile, the militiamen ransacked the house looking for money and other items, which they took, claiming they were Indonesian property. The telephone lines to the house were cut.

971. After the men finally left, Ana and the two students hid in the garden of a Balinese temple not far from her home. Early the following morning, 31 August, she called the Mobile Brigade officer who had helped the day before, and he took the three of them to his house, and then to the UNAMET headquarters in Gleno. Even there, however, their safety was far from guaranteed. Militiamen had already begun to congregate menacingly in the vicinity of the office, effectively preventing UN staff from leaving the premises. Outside, militias were roaming the streets, setting fire to buildings and firing their weapons.

972. In view of the deteriorating security conditions, UNAMET officials decided to relocate all but a small group of staff to Dili. For several hours, they negotiated with Police, TNI, and militia leaders to permit their safe evacuation from the compound. Militiamen insisted that local staff members, and other East Timorese, should not be permitted to leave, while UNAMET was equally insistent that they should be. Eventually, an agreement was reached and a convoy of vehicles was loaded and set to depart. Even at this stage, however, armed militiamen and security forces were inspecting all the vehicles for known pro-independence figures.

973. In one of the vehicles, driven by UNAMET's Humanitarian Affairs Officer, Patrick Burgess, was Ana Lemos, squeezed between two international staff members, her face covered with a scarf. As the militias made their way from one vehicle to the next, the sympathetic Mobile Brigade officer stood beside that vehicle, chatting with Mr. Burgess. In doing so, he effectively prevented the militias from discovering Ana Lemos there, and ensured that she was able to make her way safely to Dili with UNAMET.

974. The convoy arrived at UNAMET headquarters in Dili later that evening. Ms. Lemos stayed in Dili for several days, moving to a new location every few days. Eventually, after an attack on the Don Bosco School where she was then staying, she fled to the Regional Police headquarters (Polda). While there, she reportedly met her ex-husband, the father of her three children. The two reportedly argued about the children, who were still in Gleno. Shortly thereafter, Ana Lemos set out on foot for Gleno.

975. Just outside of Gleno, she was reportedly picked up by a TNI officer, and driven to the Kodim where she was questioned. From the Kodim, she was reportedly moved to the office of the Darah Merah militia in Gleno. It is not known how long she was held there, nor exactly what transpired in that time, but when she returned to her mother's house on 11 September she was covered in bruises, and she told her mother that she had been beaten. She told a close friend, Aliança Gonçalves, that while held at the Kodim the previous day she had been raped by Sgt. Melky. According to Aliança, Ana Lemos said Sgt. Melky had threatened her with a pistol and told her that he would kill her if she did not cooperate.

976. On the evening of 11 September, a large party was held at the local primary school in Gleno, at which a cow was killed and eaten. According to one of Ms. Lemos' brothers, the CNRT member Flaviano Lemos, a militia member at the party said to others: "Let's just kill the woman who likes to play politics." The same evening, Ana Lemos gave her mother some money and some rice, and told her she thought they would kill her.

977. At about 9.00 am on 13 September, she was taken from her home by an unidentified militiaman. Her mother asked to go along but she was not allowed. That was the last time Ana Lemos was seen alive. Two days later, 15 September, her mother and her three children were taken to Atambua. A militiaman told her mother that she need not bother waiting for Ana as she would never come back.

978. On 5 November, the clothes Ana Lemos was wearing when she was last seen, were found about 4 kilometers along the road to Aileu. Not far from the clothes, the remains of a female body were also found. On the request of family members, in March 2000 the body was exhumed. Forensic examination established that it was most likely the body of Ana Lemos.

979. The chief suspects in the abduction and killing of Ana Lemos are: Zeca Pereira, the leader of the Darah Merah militia in Gleno; Lucas, leader of the Naga Merah militia in Hatolia; and Hilario, a TNI soldier. As the account above makes clear, TNI Sgt. Melky was directly responsible for an assault on Ana Lemos on 31 August, and he is strongly suspected of involvement in her abduction, rape, and murder.

980. Ana Lemos is now considered a hero in the District of Ermera. The primary school in the town of Gleno is dedicated to her memory, and her remains are buried under a monument built in the same town to commemorate East Timor's independence day in May 2002.

The Battalion 745 rampage (20–21 September 1999)

981. Very few foreigners were victims of human rights violations in 1999. One tragic exception was the Dutch journalist Sander Robert Thoenes, killed by TNI soldiers on 21 September in Dili. Thoenes' murder was only the final act in a campaign of deliberate killing and destruction carried out by elements of TNI's Battalion 745 as it withdrew from its base in Fuiloro village, in Lautém in September. When the rampage was finally over, members of the battalion had killed at least 21 people, and burned or destroyed dozens of houses.

982. There were strong indications that the violence was planned and directed by TNI officers. Shortly before the announcement of the ballot result, a Platoon Commander in Battalion 745, Lt. Camilo dos Santos, reportedly told his troops that if the vote favored independence, their job would be to destroy houses and livestock, and kill CNRT supporters. Those orders evidently originated with the Commander of Battalion 745, Maj. Jacob Sarosa. According to the criminal indictment filed against Maj. Sarosa by Timor-Leste's General Prosecutor:

> "At 7.00 am on 30 August 1999, the day of the Popular Consultation, Major Jacob Djoko Sarosa ordered the East Timorese soldiers to line up. He addressed the soldiers. Showing them an Indonesian flag and a CNRT flag he said whoever was going to vote for CNRT would be killed."*

983. With those orders evidently still in effect, on 17 September, Battalion 745 moved from its base in Fuiloro to the village of Lautém on the north coast. From there, the bulk of the battalion boarded troop ships bound for Indonesia, but roughly 120 members and their families, and another 20 soldiers from the local Kodim, remained behind to perform convoy duty. The convoy consisted of some 40 motorcycles and more than 60 assorted vehicles, including at least one TNI truck mounted with a 12.7 mm gun. All soldiers in the convoy were armed with automatic weapons, and many were wearing red and white bandanas. They were led by the Commander of Battalion 745, Maj. Sarosa.

984. By that stage TNI units, including Battalion 745, had already committed a string of serious human rights violations in Lautém. These included the killing of at least ten people between 8 and 13 September (See District Summary: Lautém).† However, the concerted campaign of TNI violence really began in earnest on 20 September with the killing of three men near a rice warehouse in the town of Lautém. The charred remains of three bodies were discovered at a gravesite near the warehouse two years later. Several witnesses have testified that the three men – Amílcar Barros, João Gomes, and Agusto Venancio Soares – were detained, beaten, shot, and then burned by TNI soldiers, including members of Battalion 745.‡ They have also stated that the Commander of Battalion 745, Maj. Sarosa and Platoon Commander, Lt. dos Santos, were present at the attack but took no action to prevent or stop it.§

985. Later that day, 20 September, the Battalion 745 convoy began to move from Lautém to the village of Laga in Baucau District. After camping at Laga for the night, members of the Battalion destroyed and burned their lodgings, and several houses in the village, before heading off.

986. As they moved westward, on 21 September, members of Battalion 745 reportedly killed two young men whom they encountered riding a motorcycle along the main road from Baucau. Witnesses have said that the two men – Egas da Silva and Abreu da Costa – were stopped near the village of Buile, in the Sub-District of Laga, and then shot by soldiers as they tried to flee. According to the indictment filed by Timor-Leste's General Prosecutor, Abreu da Costa was shot in the right leg and through the right eye, and Egas da Silva was shot in the stomach, neck and chest.¶ A relative of the two men later told a journalist, "I constantly dream about them."

987. Later the same day, members of Battalion 745 killed at least four more people, including two women, as they passed through the villages of Buruma and Caibada, just east of Baucau town. The four victims – Victor Belo, Carlos da Costa Ribeiro, Elisita da Silva, and Lucinda da Silva – were killed as soldiers conducted raids of the villages, and fired indiscriminately at civilians as they ran for safety. According to family members and friends, Victor Belo was shot by two soldiers at the end of the convoy after returning to lock the door on his house; Carlos da Costa Ribeiro was shot in the head inside his home; Lucinda da Silva was shot in the chest while running away from the soldiers; and Elisita da Silva died after being shot in both her legs.*

988. Elisita da Silva's father gave the following account of the assault:

> "When I saw the TNI convoy they were already firing their weapons into the bushes. There was single and automatic gunfire and they also fired grenade launchers into the bushes. I also saw TNI soldiers on foot searching houses and the bush-land for people. So we (Jacinta, Elisita, Cezarina and Zelia) hid behind a big rock, which was next to our house. A few moments later, two TNI soldiers detained me . . . After the soldiers released me I went straight to the back of my house and I saw that my daughter Elisita had been shot in both legs. Her legs were broken and there was a lot of blood. She was still alive and she told me she was in a lot of pain."†

989. Battalion 745 soldiers committed several more killings near the village of Laleia, in the District of Manatuto, west of Baucau. The dead included three men, apparently unarmed, who were killed in the course of an assault on the eastern side of Laleia bridge, and one man, an alleged Falintil fighter, who was stabbed and shot by soldiers who then cut off one of his ears. Three other people, including one woman, were reportedly detained near Laleia, beaten then handed over to soldiers of the Manatuto Kodim. They were not seen again and it is thought that they were killed.‡ Some of the victims were executed while in custody, and reportedly under orders from TNI officers.§

990. More violence, including at least three more killings, followed as the Battalion 745 convoy rolled into Dili in the late afternoon on 21 September. Travelling along Becora Road at about 4.30 pm a British journalist, Jon Swain, and an American photographer, Chip Hires, encountered the convoy. The journalists, accompanied by an interpreter, Anacleto da Silva, were travelling in an old blue taxi, driven by a local man, Sancho Ramos da Ressuriçao.¶

991. According to a number of witnesses, soldiers from the convoy stopped and surrounded the taxi, and started hurling abuse and tugging at the doors. One soldier struck the driver in the head with the butt of his rifle, "causing his right eye to come out from its socket." The interpreter, Anacleto da Silva, was reportedly forced from the taxi and into a TNI vehicle. One witness told UN investigators he saw a man fitting Anacleto's description being beaten by Battalion 745 soldiers at the Korem in Dili later that evening. He was never seen again, and is believed to have been killed.*

992. A number of soldiers searched the taxi and seized the journalist's possessions, including cameras, rolls of film, and a bag. A soldier then shot at the taxi's tires and radiator to prevent the journalists from continuing their journey. The driver of the taxi later testified to UN investigators that Lt. Camilo dos Santos of Battalion 745 took part in the assault.†

993. Also present at the scene was the Battalion Commander, Maj. Jacob Sarosa. During the incident, he reportedly told the journalists that his soldiers were "very angry, very angry with [the] UN and you Westerners. You must understand."‡ In an interview with UN investigators in November 1999, Maj. Sarosa denied any knowledge of, or involvement in, the beating of the driver or the abduction of the interpreter.§ He did admit, however, that the taxi had been stopped and searched, the journalists' possessions seized and destroyed, and the taxi's tires shot out, on his orders.

994. Still on the afternoon of 21 September, about 400 metres down the Becora Road, soldiers of Battalion 745 killed yet another man, Manuel Andreas. The murder was witnessed by two people, one of whom gave the following testimony to investigators:

> "Later that afternoon, I think it was about 5.00 pm myself, Manuel [the deceased] and António . . . started to walk up the main road towards the bridge and river. I think António was in front, followed by me, and Manuel was behind us. As we were walking, I heard a burst of gunfire and saw straight away that António had been shot in the right arm. At the same time I saw Manuel fall to the ground and start screaming. I then saw that he had been shot in the chest. The gunfire continued and António and I ran for cover in the hills."¶

995. The final act in Battalion 745's two-day campaign of violence occurred shortly thereafter, roughly 300 metres further along the Becora Road. There, soldiers killed and mutilated the body of Dutch journalist Sander Robert Thoenes.

996. Mr. Thoenes had recently arrived in Dili to cover the arrival of Interfet for the Financial Times newspaper. According to witnesses, he left the Hotel Turismo at about 5.00 pm on 21 September, riding on the back of a motorcycle driven by a local man, Florindo da Conceição Araújo. As they drove down the Becora Road, they encountered several TNI soldiers on motorcycles, armed with automatic weapons. The soldiers shouted for the men to stop but, fearing for his own and his passenger's safety, the driver attempted to execute a U-turn and flee. The soldiers opened fire, and the motorcycle rolled over causing both driver and passenger to fall to the ground. The driver managed to run off, leaving Mr. Thoenes lying on the road.*

997. Witnesses said that four or five soldiers then dragged Mr. Thoenes off the road into a secluded area, where his body was found the following morning.† He had been shot in the chest, and his assailants had cut off his left ear and sliced off part of his face, apparently with surgical precision. Some of Mr. Thoenes' fingers were also missing, but it is believed that that injury occurred when the motorcycle fell to the ground.

998. According to an Australian pathologist who conducted a post-mortem examination on Thoenes's body in Darwin on 24 September 1999, the cause of death was a single gunshot to the chest. In 2001, a Dutch investigator and an Australian military policeman wrote: "It can be concluded . . . [that] Sander Thoenes was killed by a military [sic] of TNI Battalion 745 with a shot in the back."‡

999. Shortly after Mr. Thoenes' murder, the Battalion 745 convoy proceeded to the Korem headquarters in the center of Dili. There, together with Brimob and Korem units, they received a briefing from the recently appointed Korem Commander, Col. Noer Muis. According to witnesses, Col. Muis ordered the members of Battalion 745 to move out as soon as they had eaten and refueled their vehicles. He also ordered them to say nothing about their actions of the previous two days. By one account, his words were as follows:

> "You don't need to tell anyone about what you have done on your way here. Don't even tell your wives. From Dili to Kupang the way is safe, so you will not need to open fire."§

1000. Later that evening, the convoy moved out, reaching the border town of Balibó without further incident. The following day, 22 September, it proceeded to Kupang, arriving at about 10.00 pm. Some time after arriving there, Maj. Sarosa, Lt. Camilo, and Lt. James were interviewed by TNI military police. The three were subsequently detained for between one and two weeks.¶

1001. Apart from those brief detentions, as of March 2003 no member of Battalion 745 had been punished in connection with the murders and other criminal acts described here. Indonesian investigators claim to have found little evidence of TNI involvement in any of the murders, and Indonesian prosecutors elected not to bring any of these cases to trial.

Murder of Lospalos Clergy (25 September 1999)

1002. One of the most shocking aspects of the pro-autonomy strategy, both before and after the ballot, was the deliberate targeting of Roman Catholic clergy and places of worship. The massacres at the churches in Liquiçá and Suai, in April and September respectively, and the attack on the Bishop's residence in September seemed deliberately calculated to terrorise a population that is 80% Roman Catholic. The assaults were also motivated by a perception that the Church had supported the pro-independence position.

1003. Both of these motivations were evident in one of the most grisly incidents of violence of the post ballot period: the ambush and execution-style killing of a group of five clergy and four lay people by a gang of militiamen in Lautém on 25 September.[*] The victims included a nun who was hacked with a machete as she knelt praying by the roadside, and then thrown into a river and shot dead.[†]

1004. The trial of the perpetrators, all of them associated with the Team Alfa militia group, confirmed that the killings had been deliberate and politically motivated. The leaders of the operation knew the identities of the religious figures they killed, and considered them legitimate targets because of their alleged pro-independence sympathies. Significantly, the trial also confirmed that Team Alfa was organised by, received orders from, and had "close ties and continuous contact" with Kopassus, and in particular its local commander, Lt. Syaful Anwar.[‡]

1005. On 25 September, a Team Alfa commander, Jony Marques, and several other members of the group drove from the port of Com, in Lautém District, toward the town of Lautém. The ostensible purpose of their journey was to get rice from a warehouse near Lautém, but there was reason to believe that the actual intention was to ambush and kill the clergy. The most obvious indication that they were not in fact intending to get rice was that they drove right past the rice warehouse. In addition, at least seven of the men were armed with SKS automatic weapons, the type used by Indonesian security forces, and most were also carrying machetes and knives.

1006. About one kilometre past Lautém, the militiamen passed two young men pushing a cart along the road. The militia commander, Jony Marques, ordered his driver to stop, and the militiamen got out and chased the two men, hurling rocks and firing their weapons at them. One of the two men, José Pereira, was wounded but managed to escape.[§] The second, Izinho Freitas Amaral, was caught, tied to a tree near the side of the road, and later killed. In its findings in this case in December 2001, the Special Panel for Serious Crimes of the Dili District Court concluded that the militias had chased the two young men, and killed one of them, in order to ensure that there would be no witnesses to the crime they were about to commit.[*]

1007. Jony Marques then ordered his men to set up a roadblock by placing large stones on the road. Some militiamen were posted on a nearby hill as a lookout, and others took up positions in a ditch with their weapons aimed up the road. Some witnesses testified in court that they knew that there was a plan to ambush the clergy's vehicle. One witness recalled that after setting up the roadblock, Jony Marques had said: "Now we will wait for the Sisters who will be coming towards Baucau . . . and when they come we will kill them all."[†]

1008. At about 2.30 pm the same day, a grey four-wheel drive vehicle came into sight from the direction of Lautém heading west toward Baucau. There were eight people in the vehicle, including two nuns, three Brothers/Priests, a journalist and two other lay persons. When the vehicle stopped at the roadblock, Jony Marques and two other militiamen opened fire on it with their automatic weapons, instantly killing the driver and some of the passengers.

1009. As one of the surviving passengers tried to get out of the vehicle, a militiaman grabbed him and dragged him to the river where he was shot and killed. The same militiaman poured petrol over three other survivors and lit them on fire. One of the three ran from the car to the river, where Jony Marques and another man shot and killed him.

1010. One of the nuns, Sister Erminia, got out of the vehicle and knelt down by the roadside to pray. As she prayed, a militiaman (Horacio) slashed her with a machete. Another militiaman (Pedro da Costa) testified that he had yelled "Don't kill a Sister!" but that Jony Marques had replied "Kill them all! They are all CNRT!" A militiaman then picked up Sister Erminia and threw her in the river, before shooting her twice. At the trial, a witness testified:

> "I noticed a nun sitting beside a [ditch]. There was a body beside the nun. I noticed the cap of the nun was on her shoulder. The nun talked to me in Tetum. I cannot remember all the words, but I remember she was saying 'Oh! God!'"[‡]

1011. At about this time, Jony Marques ordered his men to push the clergy's vehicle into the river. Several witnesses testified that he shouted: "Come here and push the car, you mother fuckers!" The men did so, though one person was still inside the vehicle. When the person got out of the car, he was shot and killed.

1012. The attackers then turned to Izinho Freitas Amaral, the young man they had earlier tied to a tree. One militiaman cut off Izinho's ear and hacked his neck with a sword. He was then pushed into the river, where he was shot and killed. Finally, Jony Marques threw a grenade into the river, where the dead and wounded lay, to be sure that there would be no survivors.

1013. For this and other crimes committed in 1999, Jony Marques, and two other members of Team Alfa were found guilty and sentenced to 33 years and 4 months in prison. Six other militiamen received sentences ranging from 5 to 19 years. No TNI officers had been tried in connection with this crime by March 2003.

Individual and command responsibility

1014. The evidence presented in this report demonstrates conclusively that the violence in 1999 was part of a widespread and systematic attack on the civilian population, in which supporters of independence for Timor-Leste were deliberately targeted. As such, the acts in question are appropriately considered not only grave violations of human rights but also crimes against humanity.* It remains to consider who should be held responsible for those crimes.

1015. In one sense, the answer is straightforward: the responsible parties are the scores of militiamen, TNI soldiers, and Police who directly carried out the crimes. Many of these individuals have already been indicted, and some have been tried both in Timor-Leste and in Indonesia, for individual or multiple acts of murder, rape, torture, and persecution committed in 1999. However, responsibility for crimes against humanity does not stop with the immediate perpetrators. Under international law, as well as the domestic laws of both Indonesia and Timor-Leste, it extends also to those who ordered or facilitated those crimes, and to those who failed to take adequate measures to stop them or to punish the perpetrators.

1016. On those grounds, this report concludes that responsibility for crimes against humanity in 1999 extends to the highest reaches of Indonesia's military, police, and civilian leadership. More precisely, it identifies some 80 Indonesian officers and officials, at or above the rank of Lt. Colonel and Bupati, who appear to bear legal responsibility for the crimes against humanity committed in 1999 (See Table 1). Some were actively involved in committing, ordering or facilitating such crimes, and so may be said to bear 'individual criminal responsibility' for them. Others failed to stop or punish the crimes of their subordinates and so arguably bear 'command responsibility' for them.

1017. The evidence presented in this report, and discussed in this chapter, also serves as a reminder that in addressing the question of responsibility, it is necessary to look beyond the actions of individuals, to consider the impact of institutional and state norms and practices. Accordingly, this report suggests that responsibility for the crimes committed in 1999 also rests with the Indonesian armed forces as an institution, and with the Indonesian state.

* Although the case has not been made in this report, many of the acts in question might also be considered violations of international humanitarian law.

Individual criminal responsibility

1018. The concept of individual criminal responsibility is spelled out in Article 25 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court,* and in the national laws of East Timor and Indonesia. Under Article 14 of UNTAET Regulation 15/2000, which is based on Article 25 of the Rome Statute, a person is said to bear individual criminal responsibility if s/he commits, orders, solicits, induces, aids, abets or otherwise contributes to the commission, or attempted commission, of a serious crime. More precisely, Section 14.3 states that:

> ". . . a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the [serious crimes] panels if that person:

> (d) in any other way contributes to the commission or attempted commission of such a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose. . ."

1019. Further clarification of the concept of individual criminal responsibility in international law is found in the Tadic Appeals decision (15 July 1999) at the International Criminal Tribunal for Yugoslavia (ICTY). That decision distinguishes between participation in a crime through 'aiding and abetting' and participation in furtherance of a 'common criminal purpose.'† Both kinds of participation constitute grounds for individual criminal responsibility for a crime against humanity. The main difference between the two concepts lies in the specificity of the acts described, with 'aiding and abetting' implying a greater degree of specificity than an act in furtherance of a 'common criminal purpose.' In the language of the ICTY decision:

> "The aider and abettor carries out acts specifically directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain specific > crime (murder, extermination, rape, torture, wanton destruction of civilian property, etc.) and this support has a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime. By contrast, in the case of acting in pursuance of a common purpose or design, it is sufficient for the participant to perform acts that in some way are directed to the furthering of the common plan or purpose."*

1020. The Tadic Appeals decision also clarifies that such a common criminal plan, design or purpose need not have been previously arranged or formulated. "The common plan or purpose may materialize extemporaneously and be inferred from the fact that a plurality of persons acts in unison to put into effect a joint criminal enterprise."†

1021. Using these statutes as a guide, and drawing upon the evidence presented in this report, it is possible to identify by name scores of militiamen, TNI, Police, and civilian government officials as individually responsible for crimes against humanity. That list, of course, includes militiamen who directly committed acts of murder, rape, torture, and persecution against supporters of independence in the course of 1999. It also includes a number of lower-ranking members of the TNI and of the Police who directly committed or ordered such crimes. Many of these individuals have been indicted by Timor-Leste's Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, and some have been charged and tried before Indonesia's Ad Hoc Human Rights Court.‡

1022. The vast majority of suspects formally charged with individual criminal responsibility have been the ordinary militiamen or militia leaders who 'pulled the trigger.' Some, however, have been charged with individual responsibility for aiding, abetting or otherwise contributing to the commission of such crimes. It is on those grounds that Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim, Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri, Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri, Col. Tono Suratman, Lt. Col. Yayat Sudrajat, and Governor Abílio Osório Soares were indicted by Timor-Leste's Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, in February 2003.§ The evidence in this report strongly supports the allegations made in that indictment.

1023. In addition, however, the evidence presented here suggests that other officers and officials also bear individual criminal responsibility for crimes committed in 1999. Indeed, the language of Regulation 15/2000, and of the 1999 Tadic Appeal decision of the ICTY cited above, allows that those responsible for crimes against humanity in Timor-Leste – beyond the direct perpetrators of those crimes – may include any person who did one or more of the following:

* Ibid., paragraph 229 (iii).

† Ibid., paragraph 227 (ii).

‡ As of late May 2003, the authorities in Timor-Leste had issued 60 indictments related to the events of 1999, charging 247 individuals, most of them with crimes against humanity. See UNMISET, Serious Crimes Unit, "Serious Crimes Update V/03," Dili, 28 May 2003. Meanwhile, the Indonesian authorities had issued several indictments charging a total of 18 individuals with crimes against humanity. For further discussion of both judicial processes, see Chapter 12.

§ East Timor, Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment of Wiranto et al., February 2003.

- helped to establish the militias and to recruit their members;
- made public statements in support of the militias;
- granted the militias legal and political recognition;
- provided militiamen with military training and guidance;
- coordinated or conducted joint combat operations with militia groups;
- provided militiamen with weapons and/or ammunition;
- provided the militias with financial and/or material support.

1024. Given the abundant evidence presented in this report on the role of Indonesian authorities in doing precisely these things, it can reasonably be argued that there are dozens of military, police, and civilian officials who bear individual criminal responsibility for crimes against humanity in Timor-Leste. The key suspects are listed in Table 1.

Managers and planners

1025. While many officials might bear individual legal responsibility for the crimes of 1999, it is nevertheless useful to distinguish between different types or degrees of culpability. Two broad categories beyond the 'trigger pullers' are suggested here: first, those who managed the militia groups in East Timor in 1999; and second, those who were responsible for devising and coordinating the overall policy that called for the mobilisation of the militias and the use of violence against civilians.

1026. In the first category, which we may call the 'managers' of violence, belong: all militia commanders, all Kopassus and Sectoral Commanders, most (but not all) District Military Commanders, some (but not all) District Chiefs of Police, the Governor, and some (but not all) District Heads.* There is little doubt that many of these 'managers' aided and abetted, and in some cases ordered, specific criminal acts. At a minimum, their participation took the form of furthering a 'common criminal purpose' that entailed the commission of crimes against humanity. Nevertheless, a strong argument can be made that they would not, and could not, have done these things in the absence of an overall policy, initiated and coordinated by higher-ranking officials – whom we may call the 'planners.'

1027. In this second category, the 'planners,' arguably belong a dozen, and possibly more, high-ranking TNI officers and Cabinet-level civilian officials. The evidence in this report suggests that the following officers and officials were very likely involved in such planning, and should at a minimum be the subject of further criminal investigations:

1. Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri Assistant for Operations to the Army Chief of Staff; Martial Law Commander in Timor-Leste

* Dandim who probably do not belong in this category include those in Aileu, Baucau, Manatuto (Lt. Col. Gerson Ponto), Manufahi, and Viqueque. Kapolres who should not be considered 'managers' of violence include those in Aileu, Baucau, Ermera, Lautém, Liquiçá (Maj. Joko Irianto), Manatuto, Manufahi, and Viqueque. Likewise, the Bupatis of Baucau, Ermera, and Manufahi should arguably be excluded from the list of 'managers' of violence.

2. Maj. Gen. Sjafrie Sjamsuddin Assistant for Territorial Affairs to the Armed Forces Chief of General Staff
3. Brig. Gen. Arifuddin Director 'A' of BAIS
4. Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim Head of BIA (to January 1999); Member, Task Force for the Implementation of the Popular Consultation in Timor-Leste
5. Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri Commander, Regional Military Command IX/ Udayana
6. Brig. Gen. Mahidin Simbolon Chief of Staff, Regional Military Command IX/ Udayana
7. Col. Tono Suratman Commander of Sub-Regional Military Command 164/ WD (to 13 August 1999)
8. Col. Noer Muis Commander, Sub-Regional Military Command 164/WD (from 13 August 1999)
9. Lt. Col. Yayat Sudrajat Commander, Satgas Tribuana-VIII (Kopassus), Timor-Leste
10. Lt. Gen. (ret.) Feisal Tanjung Coordinating Minister for Political and Security Affairs
11. Lt. Gen. (ret.) A.M. Hendropriyono Minister of Transmigration and Resettlement
12. Maj. Gen. (ret.) Yunus Yosfiah Minister of Information

1028. It is noteworthy that virtually all of the officers on this list were either deployed with Kopassus units in Timor-Leste, or shared career histories in Kopassus or military intelligence.* The pivotal role of Kopassus and intelligence officers in the 1999 violence is consistent with long-standing patterns of responsibility for grave human rights violations in Timor-Leste and Indonesia, and it suggests a serious, underlying institutional problem in the Indonesian armed forces. Accordingly, a proper assessment of the causes of the violence in 1999, and of responsibility for it, must extend beyond matters of individual criminal responsibility, and address broader patterns of command and control within the Indonesian military and state apparatus.

Command responsibility

1029. International law provides that, under certain conditions, military commanders as well as police and civilian superiors may be liable for crimes against humanity committed by their subordinates. That principle, commonly described as 'command responsibility,' is spelled out in Article 28 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court.† It is also articulated in the national laws of Indonesia and Timor-Leste. Drawing from the Rome Statute, Section 16 of Timor-Leste's UNTAET Regulation 15/2000 stipulates that

* Those with Kopassus and/or intelligence positions or career histories included: Lt. Gen. Feisal Tanjung, Lt. Gen. (ret.) Hendropriyono, Maj. Gen. (ret.) Yunus Yosfiah, Maj. Gen. Sjafrie Sjamsuddin, Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim, Brig. Gen. Arifuddin, Brig. Gen. Mahidin Simbolon, Col. Tono Suratman, Col. Noer Muis, and Lt. Col. Yayat Sudrajat.

† The full text of the Rome Statute can be found on the website of the International Criminal Court: http://www.un.org/ law/icc/a commander or superior is responsible for the criminal acts of his/her subordinate if s/he:

> "... knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrator thereof."*

1030. It is principally on the basis of such 'command responsibility' that prosecutors both in Indonesia and in Timor-Leste have brought charges against several high-ranking TNI, Police and civilian officials. In February 2003, for example, Timor-Leste's Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes issued an indictment accusing seven TNI officers – Gen. Wiranto, Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim, Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri, Maj. Gen. Damiri, Col. Tono Suratman, Col. Noer Muis, and Lt. Col. Yayat Sudradjat – of responsibility for the crimes of their subordinates, pursuant to Section 16 of UNTAET Regulation 15/2000.

1031. The evidence provided in this report supports those allegations. At the same time, it suggests that many other military officers, as well as police and civilian officials may also bear command responsibility for the crimes committed in 1999. Some 80 officers and officials who appear to bear such responsibility are listed in Table 1. The assessment of their culpability is based on an analysis of the evidence, as it relates to the three elements necessary to prove 'command responsibility' – first, that there was a superior-subordinate relationship; second, that the superior knew or had reason to know of the crimes being committed by his subordinates; and third, that the official failed to take necessary and reasonable measures to stop those crimes, and punish the perpetrators. These three elements are discussed in turn below.

Superior-subordinate relationships

1032. Military, police and civilian lines of authority in Timor-Leste were complex, and often opaque. Formal chains of command did not always signify real or effective authority. To determine whether effective superior-subordinate relationships existed, therefore, it is necessary to look carefully at both the formal and the informal lines of authority that were operating in 1999.

1033. Under Indonesian law, the Supreme Commander of the Indonesian Armed Forces in 1999 was the President, B.J. Habibie.† Major strategic initiatives, such as the decision to hold a referendum in Timor-Leste, and the declaration of Martial Law on 7 September 1999, required his approval. An argument might be made, therefore, that ultimate command responsibility for any acts committed by members of the armed forces in Timor-Leste in 1999, or those operating under their command, rested with the President.* On the other hand, there is serious doubt that President Habibie had anything more than a theoretical control over the TNI hierarchy in 1999. Indeed, as noted elsewhere in this report, senior TNI officers evidently opposed his Timor-Leste policy and sought to subvert it. Under these circumstances, it would be difficult to argue that Habibie had effective command over his subordinates in the TNI, or over the militias.

* UNTAET Regulation No. 15/2000 (6 June 2000) "On the Establishment of Panels with Exclusive Jurisdiction Over Serious Criminal Offences."

† The President's position as Supreme Commander is specified in a 1983 law on security and defence, and a 1983 Presidential decree.

1034. As a matter of law and in practice, effective command responsibility over TNI units in Timor-Leste rested with the Armed Forces Commander and Minister of Defense and Security, Gen. Wiranto. As Armed Forces Commander, Gen. Wiranto stood at the apex of a chain of territorial military command that passed through the Commander of Kodam IX/Udayana, Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri, and his Chief of Staff, Brig. Gen Mahidin Simbolon, to the Commanders of Korem 164/Wira Dharma, Col. Tono Suratman and Col. Noer Muis, the Korem Deputy Commander, Col. Mudjiono, and Chief of Staff, Lt. Col. Supadi, and beneath them, to the 13 Kodim Commanders, 62 Koramil Commanders, and 442 Village level Babinsas. Within this territorial chain of command, the commanding officers at each level had direct responsibility for the actions of officers and soldiers at lower levels. As might be expected, there was some variation in the effective authority of different commanders, and questions have been raised about Gen. Wiranto's authority over some of his subordinates. Broadly speaking, however, this formal chain of territorial command did reflect real superior-subordinate relationships.

1035. Most other TNI units deployed in Timor-Leste in 1999 – such as Infantry Battalions 744 and 745 that were permanently based there, and the various combat battalions that passed through on tours of duty – also operated within this chain of command. However, there were some important exceptions. The two elite combat units, Kopassus and Kostrad, were commanded directly from their headquarters in Jakarta. Thus, to the extent that crimes were committed or facilitated by Kopassus and Kostrad officers or soldiers, command responsibility arguably did not rest formally with officers in the territorial chain of command (Kodam, Korem, Kodim etc.) but with the commanding officers of those units, such as the Kopassus commander in Timor-Leste Lt. Col. Yayat Sudrajat, with their overall commanders in Jakarta, Kopassus Commander Maj. Gen. Syahrir and Kostrad Commander Lt. Gen. Djamari Chaniago, and ultimately with Gen. Wiranto. The status of units grouped within TNI Combat Sectors A and B in Timor-Leste is less clear. As Kopassus officers, however, those Sectoral commanders appear to have operated outside the normal territorial chain of command, answering instead to their Kopassus commanders.

1036. A number of senior officers at Army, Armed Forces and BIA/BAIS headquarters also appear to have exercised effective command responsibility over junior officers and troops in Timor-Leste. At Army headquarters in Jakarta the key officers included: the Army Chief of Staff, Gen. Subagyo Hadisiswoyo, and his Assistant for Operations (and later Martial Law Commander), Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri. At Armed Forces headquarters, the main players were: the Armed Forces Chief of General Staff, Lt. Gen. Sugiono; his Assistant for Territorial Affairs, Maj. Gen. Sjafrie Sjamsuddin; and his Assistant for Operations, Maj. Gen. Endriartono Sutarto. Within BIA/BAIS, the central figures in 1999 were the Head, Lt. Gen. Tyasno Sudarto, Director 'A', Brig. Gen. Arifuddin, and Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim, Head of BIA until January 1999, and thereafter senior member of the Task Force for the Implementation of the Popular Consultation in Timor-Leste.

* Indeed, some of those who have been tried since 1999 (e.g. Col. Timbul Silaen and Eurico Guterres) have insisted that ultimate responsibility for the violence in Timor-Leste rests with Habibie.

1037. Administrative authority over the Indonesian Police rested formally with Gen. Wiranto, in his capacity as Minister of Defence and Security. However, operational command responsibility lay with the National Chief of Police, Gen. (Pol.) Roesmanhadi. Beneath him, the Police chain of command descended through the Regional Chief of Police for Timor-Leste, Col. Timbul Silaen, to the Chiefs of Police in each of the territory's 13 Districts, 62 Sub-Districts, and 442 Villages. The Police Mobile Brigades (Brimob), and other Police units specially deployed in Timor-Leste for the referendum, were under the command of the Regional Chief of Police.*

1038. As explained elsewhere in this report, the authority of Police officials was limited by the TNI. That was particularly true with respect to Police actions against TNI soldiers and militias. Police officials who attempted to stop TNI or militia violence were themselves subject to reprisals, and some were killed. Nevertheless, the National, Regional and District Chiefs of Police did exercise effective authority over their own police subordinates and, in some cases, over militia groups.†

1039. The lines of authority within the civilian government apparatus in Timor-Leste were similarly mixed. The authority of the Governor, Abílio Osório Soares, the 13 Bupatis and the hundreds of lesser civilian officials was circumscribed by the TNI. Nevertheless, the Governor and the Bupatis did exert some real control over their subordinates, and some even held positions of authority within militia groups. Thus, while the Governor and the Bupatis were hardly the most powerful figures in the structure of power, they did exercise authority over their subordinates.

1040. At the national level, several Cabinet Ministers were involved in shaping and implementing the government's Timor-Leste policy, and exercised effective authority over some pro-Indonesian groups. They included: the Minister of Transmigration and Resettlement, Lt. Gen. (ret.) Hendropriyono; the Minister of Information, Maj. Gen. (ret.) Yunus Yosfiah; and the Coordinating Minister for Political and Security Affairs, Lt. Gen. (ret.) Feisal Tanjung. Among these, Lt. Gen. Tanjung undoubtedly had the greatest authority, both formal and informal. In his capacity as Coordinating Minister, Tanjung effectively shaped and oversaw political strategy on Timor-Leste. As the Minister responsible for the Task Force for the Implementation of the Popular Consultation, he also stood at the apex of the network of officers and officials, including Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim, who are believed to have controlled Timor-Leste's militia groups.[*]

* The only exception to this rule occurred when Brimob troops were formally seconded (in Indonesian BKO'd) to the TNI, in which case overall command responsibility shifted to a TNI officer.

† Police officials who exercised some real authority over militia groups included: the Regional Chief of Police, Col. Timbul Silaen, and the District Police Chiefs in the Districts of Ainaro, Bobonaro, Covalima, Dili, Liquiçá (Lt. Col. Adios Salova), and Oecussi.

1041. These military, police, and civilian chains of command were in effect through most of 1999. However, they underwent two significant changes in the immediate post-ballot period. First, on 4 September 1999 the TNI assumed direct command over all security operations in Timor-Leste, relegating Police and civilian authorities to an ancillary role.[†] The new arrangement was formalised under a command structure called "Ko-ops Nusra" (Komando Operasi TNI Nusa Tenggara – TNI Operations Command, Nusa Tenggara), under the command of Maj. Gen. Damiri.[‡]

1042. The second shift came at 00.00 hours on 7 September 1999, when Martial Law was formally declared in Timor-Leste.[§] Thereafter, until late September 1999 when Martial Law was lifted, a very different chain of command was in effect. During that period all military, police, and civilian operations in the area were formally under the control of the Martial Law Commander, Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri, who was accountable to Gen. Wiranto and, in theory, to President Habibie as Supreme Commander.[¶]

1043. In principle, then, it is possible to determine with some precision which officers and officials might bear overall command responsibility for the criminal acts of their subordinates at any give time in 1999. For example, responsibility for crimes committed before 4 September 1999 would rest with the TNI and, in certain cases, with Police and civilian authorities, or some combination of the three. Command responsibility for crimes committed in the period 4-7 September 1999, would rest with TNI officers in the normal chain of command, but not with Police or civilian authorities. Crimes committed after 00:00 hours on 7 September would also fall formally under the command responsibility of TNI officers and particularly the Martial Law Commander, Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri.

1044. In practice, however, the determination of command responsibility during these time periods is somewhat more complicated, mainly because those in formal positions of authority did not always exercise effective command over their subordinates.

* Testifying at his own trial in Jakarta, the former Timor-Leste Chief of Police, Col. Timbul Silaen, said that Lt. Gen. Tanjung should be held accountable for the violence in 1999. "Those accountable for security affairs at the national level are Feisal Tanjung and Wiranto. I was only a field officer . . ." Cited in Jakarta Post, 25 April 2002.

† Gen. Wiranto has testified that the change took effect on 5 September 1999, but contemporary documents indicate that it happened on 4 September. See: Secret telegram to the Armed Forces Chief of General Staff (No. B/01/IX/1999) 4 September 1999, signed by Maj. Gen. Damiri as "Panglima, Komando Operasi TNI Nusra" (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #47).

‡ Testifying in the trial of Timor-Leste Police Chief, Col. Timbul Silaen, Gen. Wiranto explained that the decision had been taken at TNI headquarters because it was considered that the Police would not be able to handle the situation. See Jakarta Post, 9 April 2002.

§ The Presidential order imposing Martial Law is dated 6 September 1999. "Keputusan Presiden Republik Indonesia Nomor 107 Tahun 1999 tanggal 6 September 1999, tentang Keadaan Darurat Militer di Timtim."

¶ The authority of the Martial Law Commander is spelled out in an order issued by Gen. Wiranto, dated 20 September 1999. See: Menteri Pertahanan Keamanan/Panglima TNI, "Surat Keputusan Nomor Skep/821/P/IX/1999, tentang Ketentuan Penggunaan Wewenang Penguasa Darurat Militer Daerah Timor Timur" (HRU Collection, Doc. TNI #10).

1045. The problem is clearest in the case of the Martial Law Commander, Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri. Although he was formally appointed commander with effect from 00.00 hours on 7 September, it would appear that he did not assume effective command until a few days later, perhaps as late as the evening of 9 September. Until that time, effective command responsibility remained with Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri in his capacity as Commander of Ko-ops Nusra. That does not mean that Syahnakri is off the hook. On the contrary, as Martial Law Commander he clearly bears command responsibility for many of the crimes committed by TNI troops, Police and militiamen after 9 September. Moreover, he arguably bears individual and command responsibility for his role in mobilising and backing the militias long before the declaration of Martial Law.

1046. A somewhat different complication affects judgements about the culpability of at least two other TNI officers: Gen. Wiranto and Col. Noer Muis. As noted elsewhere in this report, there have been suggestions that Wiranto and Muis lacked effective control over at least some of the officers and men formally under their command, especially in the immediate post-ballot period. If that was indeed the case, their culpability for crimes committed by their subordinates would be open to question. At the same time, if the acts in question are viewed as the continuation of long-standing policies that violated international law, and for which these officers shared responsibility, the case for their culpability would be considerably strengthened. Such an argument could well be made in regard to Gen. Wiranto.

1047. These cases serve as a reminder that effective command authority cannot be taken for granted, but must be proven. The same is true of blanket claims to a lack of effective authority. Such claims have been used, disingenuously, as a legal defence strategy by some TNI and Police officers charged and tried in Indonesian courts. At his own trial in July 2002, for example, Maj. Gen. Damiri reportedly rejected all of the charges against him because he "was not in the field" at the time of the crimes in question.[*] His denial of command responsibility was supported by Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim, who testified that Damiri did not have "effective command" over troops in the field, and therefore "cannot be tried for anything done by TNI soldiers in Timor-Leste."[†]

1048. These claims are patently untrue, most obviously for the critical days in early September when Damiri was the Commander of Ko-ops Nusra, and was in fact on the ground in Timor-Leste.[‡] Moreover, they are at odds with the repeated pronouncements of Indonesian authorities in 1999 that TNI forces were well-disciplined, and that the authorities were fully in control of the security situation.[§] As the International Commission of Inquiry on Timor-Leste noted in its January 2000 report:

* Jakarta Post, 11 July 2002.

† Suara Timor Lorosae, 12 September 2002.

§ Asked in early 1999 if he could trust all sections of the Indonesian armed forces, for example, Foreign Minister Ali Alatas replied: "Yes, our armed forces are a very disciplined lot." See ABC, Four Corners, "A License to Kill," 15 March 1999, transcript, p. 14.

> “Throughout [1999] the Government . . . gave repeated assurances to the United Nations and the East Timorese people that it would take measures to guarantee security and maintain law and order. At no time did the Government express its inability to do so or its intention to give up this responsibility.”*

1049. Beyond these questions of formal and effective authority, the determination of command responsibility for crimes against humanity hinges on two further criteria: whether a superior officer knew or had reason to know of the crimes in question, and whether he took necessary and reasonable measures to prevent and punish them. In the language of UNTAET Regulation 15/2000, a commander or superior can be held responsible for the criminal act of a subordinate only if he “knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrator thereof.”†

“Knew or had reason to know”

1050. Did the officers and officials in the chain of command know, or have reason to know, about the involvement of their subordinates in the widespread and systematic violence being committed in 1999? The answer is that, without doubt, key commanders had reason to know what was going on. In several specific instances, moreover, it can be proved that they had such knowledge.‡

1051. The general case that key officers and officials had reason to know of the crimes committed is made in the Deputy General Prosecutor’s February 2003 indictment of Gen. Wiranto et al. Referring specifically to Gen. Wiranto, the indictment reads:

> “211. During 1998 and 1999 WIRANTO made frequent visits to Timor-Leste. During those visits he met with East Timorese community leaders, members of the press and officials representing the international community, including Military Liaison Officers and other officials from the United Nations Mission in East Timor [UNAMET].
> 212. At these meetings he was repeatedly informed of acts of violence and other crimes being perpetrated by TNI and militia groups in Timor-Leste. In these meetings requests were made that he control the TNI and militia groups that were committing those crimes.”§

‡ Indicators suggested by the UN Committee of Experts regarding Former Yugoslavia in determining whether a superior officer must have known of crimes committed are the following: the number, type and scope of illegal acts; the time during which the illegal acts occurred; the logistics involved; the widespread occurrence of the acts; the geographical location of the acts; the speed of operations; the modus operandi of similar illegal acts; the officers and staff involved; and the location of the commander at the time.

§ Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment of Wiranto et.al., 22 February 2003.

1052. The indictment makes similar allegations against the other accused TNI officers: Makarim, Syahnakri, Damiri, Suratman, Muis, and Sudrajat. Given the structure of military, police and civilian authority outlined in the previous section, moreover, it is reasonable to assume that knowledge of the crimes committed extended beyond these men, to include many of those occupying key command positions. That claim is substantiated by the following points of fact, all of which have been elaborated elsewhere in this report.

1053. On a regular basis between June and October 1999, senior UNAMET officials presented written and oral briefings concerning general patterns, and specific incidents, of violence to high-ranking TNI, Police and civilian government officials. These briefings frequently highlighted evidence of the close relationship between the TNI and the militias.* Briefings and complaints were also routinely conveyed to the Indonesian authorities by representatives of governments, by international organisations such as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch, and by local non-governmental organisations, including Fokupers and Yayasan HAK. Allegations and detailed information about the violence were also abundantly available through the East Timorese, Indonesian, and international media.

1054. In addition to the information they received from such outside sources, high-ranking Indonesian officials received frequent written and oral reports about the situation in Timor-Leste through their own command hierarchy. As Gen. Wiranto reportedly told Indonesian investigators in December 1999: "Of course, I received reports regularly and I studied those reports, and at critical junctures those reports were forwarded to the President."† Although these internal reports often skirted the question of direct TNI involvement with militias, some did make it clear that there was a link, and described the violence in detail.‡

* Written briefings provided by UNAMET officials included: two dossiers of evidence on the misuse of official funds and recourse to pressure of office in support of the pro-autonomy campaign, submitted to the government on 16 June and 14 July 1999; detailed reports on the Maliana incident of 29 June, and the Liquiçá incidents of 4 July, submitted to the government in mid-July 1999; a letter dated 5 August, from UNAMET's head of mission Mr. Ian Martin to Task Force Chairman Tarmidzi conveying deep concern about a recent attack on UNAMET staff, and about possibly criminal behavior by government officials in Bobonaro; a letter dated 19 August, from Mr. Ian Martin, to Tarmidzi, and another from the Chief UNAMET MLO, Brig. Gen. Rezaq, to Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim, outlining the involvement of named TNI officers in supporting the militias, and calling for their removal. ‡ The reports included: a secret TNI telegram from Col. Suratman, dated 28 January 1999, recounting several killings of civilians recently committed by militias (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #7); a secret TNI telegram, dated 18 April 1999, describing the widespread militia violence in Dili on 17 April 1999 in which 13 civilians were killed (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #16); a secret TNI telegram, dated 21 April 1999, from the Chief of Staff of Korem 164, concerning several cases of direct TNI involvement in unlawful killings, and mentioning in particular the discovery of two corpses in Triloca, Baucau (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #48); the secret 'Garnadi report,' dated 3 July 1999 which referred to militias as 'heroes of integration' (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #35); a secret TNI telegram, dated 31 August 1999,describing the killing of two UNAMET staff members in Boboe Leten, on 30 August 1999 (Yayasan HAK Collection, Doc #42); a letter from Gen. Wiranto to President Habibie, dated 6 September 1999, describing the widespread violence and destruction in Timor-Leste, and referring to the close emotional ties between the TNI and the militias as a factor inhibiting firm action against the latter (HRU Collection, Doc. TNI #7).

1055. In short, it is clear that many of those in positions of command responsibility, up to and including the highest authorities in the country, knew or had reason to know about the criminal violence in Timor-Leste and about the involvement of their subordinates in that violence. That conclusion strongly supports the allegations made in the indictment of Wiranto and six other TNI officers issued by Timor-Leste's Deputy General Prosecutor in February 2003. At the same time, it suggests that knowledge of the crimes committed – and possible command responsibility for them – extended beyond the seven officers named in that indictment, and included dozens of other high-ranking TNI, Police and civilian officials.

"Necessary and reasonable measures"

1056. Given that senior TNI, Police, and civilian officials in the chain of command knew, or had reason to know, about the violence, the question of command responsibility for that violence hinges on whether, in the language of UNTAET Regulation 2000/ 15, those officers took "necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrator thereof." The answer is that, with rare exceptions, those in authority failed to do so.[*] Indeed, as this report has shown, TNI and Police officials consistently encouraged, or at a minimum condoned such acts, and only a handful of the perpetrators were ever detained or tried.

1057. That overriding failure substantially reinforces the case that command responsibility for the violence rests with TNI officers and, to a lesser extent, with senior civilian and Police authorities. The evidence also strongly supports the allegation in the Deputy General Prosecutor's February 2003 indictment against Wiranto et al. that:

> "During 1999 WIRANTO [and the other accused] failed to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the crimes being committed by his subordinates and he failed to take necessary and reasonable measures to punish the perpetrators of those crimes."[†]

1058. One possible explanation for the authorities' failure to stop the crimes or punish the perpetrators is that they did not have the material ability to do so. As already noted, that was arguably the case for most civilian officials in East Timor because, with some exceptions, their effective authority over the militias and TNI soldiers was heavily circumscribed by the TNI. Nevertheless, the Governor and the 13 Bupatis did have the material ability, and the responsibility, to stop and to punish crimes by their civilian subordinates. The same was true for Police officials. Their capacity to stop and punish crimes committed by TNI soldiers and militias was limited by the effective subordination

* In the words of Maj. Gen. Peter Cosgrove, Commander Interfet, in late 1999: "The evidence is that there was widespread, unchecked violence by militia groups and that has to suggest that the level of control over ordinary law and order, (and) crimes of violence that were being committed by TNI, was inadequate." Cited in ABC, Four Corners, 'The Vanishing'. 18 October 1999, transcript, p.10 of the Police to the TNI. Nevertheless, the Regional Chief of Police and the 13 District Chiefs of Police did have the material ability to stop and punish unlawful acts committed by their Police subordinates and, in some cases, by militia groups.

1059. Lack of material ability was not a problem for most TNI commanders. On the contrary, as shown conclusively in this report, TNI officers were able to control the timing, the geographical distribution, and the character of the violence with remarkable precision. Having mobilised the militias, and having provided them with training, weapons, financial and logistical support, TNI authorities were in a position to exercise powerful control over militia actions. Their control over TNI soldiers, with rare exceptions, was even more secure. Had senior commanders wished to stop the violence permanently, and to punish the perpetrators, they could have done so without difficulty. Indeed, in a meeting with Mr. Ian Martin on 7 July 1999, General Wiranto said that if Falintil was ready to surrender its weapons to the Indonesian Police, he could guarantee that the militias would be disarmed within two days.[*]

1060. It should be noted that some TNI officers took actions that they claimed were intended to stop or control the violence. On a number of occasions in 1999, for example, Col. Tono Suratman ordered his subordinates to exert greater control over militia groups, to withdraw weapons from them, and to halt joint TNI-militia operations.[†] In apparent response to international pressure, in mid-August 1999 Gen. Wiranto replaced the Korem commander, Col. Tono Suratman, with Col. Noer Muis, and replaced the Kodim Commanders in Bobonaro and Covalima.[‡] According to reports, both President Habibie and Gen. Wiranto periodically reprimanded TNI officers in Timor-Leste for failing to control the militias. [§]President Habibie ostensibly imposed Martial Law, on Gen. Wiranto's recommendation, as a measure to restore law and order. Finally, according to some accounts, Maj. Gen. Syahnakri and Lt. Col. Noer Muis tried, unsuccessfully, to control the violence during the period of Martial Law.

1061. Taken at face value, these initiatives suggest that some attempt was made by certain commanders – Col. Tono Suratman, Gen. Wiranto, President Habibie, Maj. Gen. Syahnakri and Col. Noer Muis – to contain the actions of the militia, to control the TNI, and to limit the violence. These claims require further discussion, both in the interest of fairness to the officials involved, and to help clarify the question of command responsibility.

1062. Some of the initiatives in question, it must be said, clearly did not constitute necessary and reasonable measures to stop crimes or punish the perpetrators. As detailed elsewhere in this report, the measures taken by Col. Suratman were arguably no more than tactical moves designed to achieve a short term political advantage, either by concealing the nature of the TNI-militia relationship from foreign delegations, or by answering mounting international pressure for some action without effectively interfering with the planned violence. Moreover, there is no evidence that Col. Suratman ever made any serious attempt to punish the perpetrators of the crimes in question.

1063. There is more debate about the other initiatives noted above, including the transfer of certain TNI officers in August 1999, the decision to impose Martial Law, and the reported efforts to control the violence during Martial Law. Some observers have suggested that these measures were nothing more than a smokescreen, intended to deceive or divert international opinion. In support of that view, it may be recalled that the moves in question were singularly ineffective and, in the case of Martial Law, seemed to coincide with a worsening of the security climate rather than its improvement. Moreover, like Col. Suratman's efforts, these other initiatives did not include the punishment of known perpetrators.

1064. Others have argued that these attempts to contain the violence were sincere, but that they failed because of strong resistance from militiamen, as well as TNI soldiers and officers. If this interpretation is correct – and that remains an open question – it would tend to limit the culpability of certain individual officers for some of the crimes committed by their subordinates. However, it would not affect the general conclusion here that senior TNI officers failed to take necessary and reasonable measures to stop crimes against humanity or to punish the perpetrators.

1065. In short, the evidence presented in this report demonstrates that most, though perhaps not all, TNI officers in the chain of command, as well as some senior Police and civilian officials, knew or had reason to know about the crimes being committed by their subordinates, and had the material ability to stop and punish those crimes, but failed to take necessary and reasonable measures to do so. Thus, not only does the evidence strongly support the allegations made in Timor-Leste's February 2003 indictment against Wiranto et al., it also suggests that command responsibility extended well beyond those named in that indictment.

1066. In the face of mounting evidence of TNI complicity in the violence, in late 1999 Indonesian Foreign Minister Alatas suggested that, beyond the militias, responsibility for the massive violence in Timor-Leste may have rested with certain 'rogue elements' within the TNI. "We have acknowledged," he said, "that there are rogue elements . . . [that] have been supportive of some of the actions of the militia."[*] The evidence in this report belies the claim that official involvement was limited to such 'rogue elements.' On the contrary it demonstrates that those responsible included many of the highest-ranking military officers and police and civilian officials in the country.

1067. From the perspective of international and national law, two sorts of responsible party can be identified. First, there are those who bear 'individual criminal responsibility' either because they directly committed the crimes in question, or because they assisted others in doing so. Second, there are those who bear 'command responsibility' because they failed to stop or punish the crimes committed by their subordinates. Based on these widely accepted legal principles, this report identifies some 80 TNI, Police and civilian government officials who may be responsible for crimes against humanity, and should therefore be the focus of further criminal investigations.

International responsibility

1068. The responsibility of Indonesian officials is only part of the story. Timor-Leste's political status was the subject of international dispute for 24 years, and the violence in 1999 took place in the context of a United Nations operation aimed at resolving that dispute. Accordingly, any discussion of responsibility for that violence must consider the role of the international community, including the United Nations and its most powerful member states.

1069. This chapter argues that, notwithstanding their eventual contribution to ending the violence, through their acts and omissions powerful members of the international community share political and moral responsibility for the crimes committed in 1999. It also argues that the United Nations bears a special responsibility to ensure that the perpetrators of the violence in Timor-Leste are brought to justice. It concludes that an international criminal tribunal for Timor-Leste should be established at the earliest opportunity, and that the United Nations Security Council and Secretary General should take the lead in doing so.

International responsibility

1070. Indonesian authorities have sought to blame UNAMET for the violence in Timor-Leste, especially in the post-ballot period. Criticism has typically focused on allegations of UNAMET bias or foul play in conducting the referendum. Testifying in the trial of former Timor-Leste Chief of Police, Col. Timbul Silaen, for example, Gen. Wiranto said: "UNAMET's failure to remain neutral during that historical moment sparked anger among East Timorese who felt they were being treated unfairly...."[*] Similar allegations have been made by many other military and government officials.[†]

1071. Some officials have also alleged that UNAMET bears responsibility for the violence because it usurped control over security in Timor-Leste from the TNI and the Police. In September 2002, Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim testified in an Indonesian court that the TNI had been unable to maintain security because "UNAMET had to be informed of every TNI movement."* Testifying in the trial of former Gov-ernor Abílio Soares, Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri blamed UNAMET even more directly, reportedly telling the court:

> "According to the UN resolution, the security responsibility before, during and after the UN self-determination ballot lay with the UN Civilian Police . . . The TNI had been 'excluded' from such matters."†

1072. This claim was demonstrably false. The 5 May Agreements spelled out very clearly that responsibility for security rested solely with the Indonesian Police. Likewise, the oft-repeated allegations of UNAMET bias have never been substantiated. Indeed, when they were submitted to the independent Electoral Commission, that body concluded that they were without merit.

1073. Yet if the specific Indonesian allegations of UNAMET responsibility for the violence in 1999 are unconvincing, there are nevertheless grounds for arguing that the international community shares some responsibility. The chief argument in that regard is that powerful members of the international community facilitated the violence both through their long record of acquiescence toward Indonesia's violations of human rights in Timor-Leste since 1975, and through their failure to take reasonable and necessary measures to stop widely predicted violence in 1999.

1074. The United Nations, it is true, condemned Indonesia's 1975 invasion in a series of resolutions. But for much of the 24-year occupation, no concrete action was taken to force Indonesia's withdrawal from Timor-Leste or to end the widespread violations of human rights perpetrated by Indonesian forces and their proxies. On the contrary, those countries best placed to do something, like the United States and Australia, actually facilitated the occupation and the violence. Right up until 1999, the behavior of key states was characterised by a combination of overt support, inaction, and silence, the main purpose of which was evidently to maintain friendly relations with the Indonesian government and the TNI.

1075. Such behaviour, on the part of key states, is more than a regrettable historical fact. It arguably implicates those states in the human rights violations committed under the Indonesian occupation. The same may be said of the actions of certain international agencies, like the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, and corporations that sold arms to Indonesia. At a minimum, those states, agencies, and corporations had an obligation to ensure that their activities did not contribute to the commission of human rights violations in Timor-Leste. For the most part, they failed to do so.

On a separate occasion, Maj. Gen. Damiri complained that "It was UNAMET who made Jakarta replace Suai military commander Lt. Col. Achmad Mas Agus for no clear reason, so I appointed [Lt. Col.] Liliek [Koeshadianto] to fill the post. UNAMET also prohibited the military from patrolling." Cited in Jakarta Post, 20 June 2002.

1076. The problem of international acquiescence and complicity was highlighted by the position taken by key powers on the issue of security for the 1999 Popular Consultation. In spite of the mounting militia violence in early 1999, and credible predictions of worse to come, the most influential states made no serious effort to ensure that there would be effective security arrangements for the referendum. Instead, the 5 May Agreements placed sole responsibility for maintaining law and order in the hands of Indonesian security forces. Even a brief glimpse at the history of the Indonesian armed forces, and its behavior in Timor-Leste, would have indicated what a dangerous approach that was.

1077. Some who were privy to the negotiations of early 1999 have maintained that strong representations for a UN force were made during the negotiations, but that these were powerfully rebuffed by Indonesian officials. The UN Secretary General's Personal Representative for Timor-Leste, Ambassador Jamsheed Marker, has written, for example, that the suggestion of a UN security presence was indignantly rejected by Indonesia's Foreign Minister Ali Alatas at a meeting in March 1999.[*] Similarly, when Australian Prime Minister John Howard raised the possibility of UN peace-keepers at a meeting with President Habibie in late April 1999, Habibie is said to have 'exploded,' rejecting categorically the deployment of foreign troops on 'Indonesian' territory.[†]

1078. Yet there is reason to doubt that the case for UN peacekeepers was made as forcefully as these participants have claimed. In a press conference in New York, in April 1999, announcing that an agreement had been reached, Indonesian Foreign Minister Ali Alatas told reporters that "throughout our discussions, UN peacekeeping forces have not been an issue that has been raised."[‡] In the same press conference, Ambassador Marker explained the decision not to push for peacekeepers, saying: "We have not found it necessary under the present circumstances to send in a peacekeeping force, to parachute a whole lot of Blue Helmets down there. We don't think the situation calls for that."[§]

1079. The feeble position adopted during the negotiations was evidently influenced by the posture of a few powerful states. Marker has noted, for example, that UN negotiators faced strong pressure from the U.S. and Australian governments not to push too hard on the security issue.[¶] Similarly, a UN official who was privy to the negotiations has written of the deep reluctance of key states to support the deployment of an international military or police force.* The regrettable result was that the argument for a UN peacekeeping force was not seriously made. As a Jakarta-based diplomat later admitted, in the course of the negotiations "everybody conceded too much."†

¶ Marker, East Timor, pp. 153-154. It is worth noting that, as late as February 1999, senior U.S. State Department officials, anxious to avoid alienating the Indonesian Government, were still looking for alternatives to a direct vote in Timor-Leste. It is difficult to imagine, under those circumstances, that U.S. officials would have been pushing hard for a UN peacekeeping force.

1080. The failure to secure adequate security arrangements had direct consequences on the ground in Timor-Leste, where the TNI and their militia proxies continued to terrorise and to kill supporters of independence. The security situation was so poor that, almost immediately after the start of the UN deployment in May 1999, the question arose about whether it was wise to proceed with the vote. UNAMET's position on that question was not a foregone conclusion. In a series of assessments written in June and July, UNAMET analysts argued that none of the security criteria spelled out in the UN Secretary General's memorandum of early May had been met, and that the referendum should therefore not go ahead.

1081. In the end that position did not prevail. It would be a mistake, however, to conclude that the UN's decision to proceed with the vote was as foolhardy as some critics have suggested. The decision stemmed partly from the fluidity of the situation on the ground, and indications that the violence might yet be brought under control. Senior UNAMET officials took the view that sustained political pressure might yet convince the Indonesian authorities to rein in the militias, and allow the ballot to proceed with only minor disruptions. The decision to proceed was also supported by the main resistance leader, Xanana Gusmão, and many other East Timorese. They pointed out that any delay would only benefit the side responsible for the violence – the same side that did not wish to see a free expression of the popular will.

1082. However, the decision to move ahead was most powerfully shaped by the political pressures emanating from the UN in New York, and from the capitals of major powers. At the political level, the UN position was constrained by the interests of the five permanent members of the Security Council – the U.S., the U.K., France, Russia, and China. It was also guided by a group of five states specially convened in New York for this purpose, the U.S., the U.K., Australia, New Zealand and Japan, informally known as the Core Group. The Permanent Five and the Core Group were anxious to move ahead with the referendum, and reluctant to do anything that might unduly upset the Indonesian government and military.‡ There was also constant pressure from the Indonesian government. It was understood that any Security Council statement or resolution that did not have the support of Indonesia would be rejected by China and Russia; and as a consequence, such initiatives were generally avoided.

1083. As it became clear that the vote would proceed, some observers took the view that an armed international peacekeeping force ought to be deployed – and that it should happen before ballot day. Among those who reached that conclusion was a delegation from Canada. At the end of their visit, on 12 August 1999, the delegation's spokesman said: "Unless Indonesia is going to live up to its obligation, we believe it is critical for a peacekeeping force to be sent to the territory immediately."* A U.S. Congressional delegation made an equally emphatic statement in late August 1999.

1084. The idea of a pre-ballot deployment of peacekeepers, however, never got off the ground. The reason was simple: the idea was actively opposed by key powers in the Security Council, most notably the United States. As the New York Times noted in early September 1999, "... no major country on the Council urged the creation of an armed peacekeeping force. Diplomats said the U.S., in particular, remained opposed to such action."† That is not to say that the U.S. and other powers remained silent in the face of the mounting violence. There was plenty of criticism. In June, for example, the vice chief of the Australian defense force, Air Marshall Doug Riding, delivered an unusually blunt message to senior TNI officers about official support for the militias. Further criticism was voiced at a donor meeting for Indonesia in Paris in late July, and again as voting day approached in late August.‡ But peacekeepers were never seriously discussed. Instead, key states, and the UN Security Council as a body, stuck steadfastly to the position that security was the responsibility of the Indonesian authorities.

1085. When UN staff, or outside observers, asked about or urged the possible deployment of peacekeeping forces, the answer was that it would be impossible to deploy peacekeepers without Indonesian approval, or by invoking Chapter VII of the UN Charter.§ It was also said, as early as July that it would take too long – three months at least – to mobilise such a force, so that there was no point in discussing a pre-ballot deployment in any case.

1086. Significantly, when the Security Council finally lent its unanimous support to the Australian-led Multi-National Force (MNF) on 15 September 1999, its resolution (No. 1264) invoked Chapter VII of the UN Charter, and gave the MNF authority to use all necessary means to restore security. Moreover, notwithstanding the earlier claim that a force would take at least three months to deploy, the MNF was on the ground within a week of the Security Council resolution. In other words, all that had been said about the impossibility of deploying peacekeepers was not entirely true. What had prevented it from happening sooner was not an immutable 'political reality,' nor even logistical difficulties, but rather an acute lack of political will.¶

§ 16 Article 42 of Chapter VII of the UN Charter (1945) stipulates that where other measures have proved to be inadequate, the Security Council "may take such action by air, sea or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security." Some human rights advocates argued at the time that a Chapter VII resolution was not needed, since the UN had never recognised Indonesian sovereignty in Timor-Leste. That argument, however, appears not to have been taken seriously within the Security Council.

¶ Tamrat Samuel, who had responsibility for Timor-Leste and Indonesia in the UN's Department of Political Affairs from 1992 to 2000, has written that "there was virtually no desire among key states to deploy a peacekeeping force." Samuel, "East Timor: The Path to Self-Determination," p. 211.

1087. Whatever the reasons, opposition to peacekeepers prevailed in the U.S., and among its allies, at least until 10 September – almost two weeks after the militias and the TNI had begun their campaign of violence on 30 August. That is not to say that the U.S and its allies did nothing during this period.* President Clinton wrote twice to President Habibie to express his concern, and to urge that every effort be made to restore security. On 8 September, the Commander-in-Chief of U.S. forces in the Pacific, Adm. Dennis Blair, travelled to Jakarta to convey a similar message directly to Gen. Wiranto. Australian Prime Minster John Howard and senior officers of the Australian defence force were also in frequent contact with their counterparts in Jakarta.

1088. Unusual and sincere as these initiatives may have been, they were not nearly enough to effect a change in the situation on the ground in Timor-Leste. And so it was that UNAMET found itself helpless to do anything as the violence descended. It was mainly in those days, and in the two further weeks before the MNF was approved and deployed, that Timor-Leste was burned to the ground, that more than a thousand people were killed, and that roughly one half of the population was forcibly displaced.

1089. In short, a strong case can be made that political and moral, if not legal, responsibility for the violence in 1999 rests, in part, with the international community, and in particular with some of its most powerful member states. Through their actions and acquiescence, key states effectively encouraged the invasion of Timor-Leste and, together with international agencies and corporations, facilitated a historical pattern of grave human rights violations there. More directly, by failing to take effective measures to prevent the widely predicted violence in 1999, key members of the international community facilitated crimes against humanity committed by the Indonesian armed forces and the militias.

1090. Support for this argument, paradoxically, lies in the effectiveness of the actions that were eventually taken by those same states and agencies in mid-September 1999. In response to mounting public outrage, the United States and other key governments, as well as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, finally took steps to rein in the Indonesian Army and their militia proxies. For the first time in 24 years, these parties placed serious and concerted pressure on the Indonesian government by cutting military ties and threatening to suspend economic aid. These initiatives coincided with an unusual visit to Jakarta and Dili by a UN Security Council delegation that strongly urged the Indonesian authorities to accept international intervention. Under this unprecedented pressure, on 12 September Indonesia agreed to permit the deployment of an international armed force. That force landed about one week later and within a few weeks of its deployment, the worst of the violence had stopped.

UN responsibility: the question of justice

1091. If members of the international community share responsibility, through their silence or inaction, for the crimes against humanity perpetrated in 1999, the United

* For an account of international responses to the crisis in early September, see Greenlees and Garran, Deliverance, Chapter 12. Nations as an institution shoulders an additional burden: the responsibility to ensure that those crimes do not go unpunished.

1092. Ensuring that the perpetrators of crimes against international human rights and humanitarian law are brought to justice is, of course, a general concern of the United Nations. Yet in the case of Timor-Leste in 1999, that general principle applies with special force, for three reasons. First, the crimes against humanity committed in 1999 occurred in the context of a process overseen by the United Nations under an explicit mandate from the Security Council.[*] Second, those crimes constituted direct breaches of Security Council resolutions, and of the 5 May Agreements between Indonesia, Portugal, and the UN.[†] Third, resolutions adopted by the Security Council and by the Commission on Human Rights since September 1999 explicitly committed the United Nations to bringing the perpetrators of the crimes in question to justice.[‡] Several years have now passed since those commitments were made, and the chief perpetrators continue to walk free.

1093. The special responsibilities of the UN were highlighted by the International Commission of Inquiry on East Timor, a body established by the Secretary General in November 1999.[§] In its report, the Commission stressed that:

> "The actions violating human rights and international humanitarian law in East Timor were directed against a decision of the United Nations Security Council acting under Chapter VII of the Charter and were contrary to agreements reached by Indonesia with the United Nations to carry out that Security Council decision. Under Article 25 of the Charter, Member States agree to accept and carry out the decisions of the Security Council. The organised opposition in East Timor to the Security Council decision requires specific international attention and response. The United Nations, as an organisation, has a vested interest in participating in the entire process of investigations, establishing responsibility and punishing those responsible and in promoting reconciliation."[¶]

* The UN arguably also had legal responsibilities under the UN Charter, in connection with its central role in the process of Timor-Leste's decolonisation.

† Moreover, under the 5 May Agreements, the UN effectively became the administering authority in East Timor after the ballot. As such it arguably had a legal obligation, similar to the obligation of a state, to bring to justice the perpetrators of crimes against humanity.

‡ UN Security Council Resolution 1272 (25 October 1999) states clearly that the Council " condemns all violence and acts in support of violence in East Timor . . . and demands that those responsible be brought to justice." UN Commission on Human Rights Resolution 1999/S-4/1 of 27 September 1999 affirms that the international community will exert every effort to ensure that those responsible for the crimes committed in Timor-Leste will be brought to justice.

§ The Commission was established in accordance with UN Human Rights Commission Resolution 1999/S-4/1 of 27 September 1999, as endorsed by the Economic and Social Council in its decision 1999/293 of 15 November 1999. The Commission was mandated to "gather and compile systematically information on possible violations of human rights and acts which might constitute breaches of international humanitarian law committed in East Timor since January 1999."

¶ United Nations, Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, "Report of the International Commission of Inquiry on East Timor to the Secretary-General," January 2000, paragraphs 146-147.

1094. Significantly, the Commission's view was endorsed by the Secretary-General, Kofi Annan. The Secretary-General, moreover, stressed his commitment to cooperate with and monitor progress on this matter. In his January 2000 letter to the President of the Security Council and others, introducing the Commission's report, Annan wrote:

> "As the report indicates, the actions violating human rights and international humanitarian law were directed against a decision of the Security Council and were contrary to agreements reached by Indonesia with the United Nations to carry out the decision of the Security Council. This fact reinforces the need to hold the perpetrators accountable for their actions.... I wish to assure Member states of my firm commitment to cooperate with the intergovernmental process in this important matter. I will closely monitor progress towards a credible response in accordance with international human rights principles."[*]

1095. On the question of what exactly should be done to give effect to these commitments, the Commission of Inquiry was very clear. It recommended that the UN Security Council should establish an international criminal tribunal, along the lines of those created for Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia. More specifically, the Commission of Inquiry recommended that:

> "The United Nations should establish an international human rights tribunal consisting of judges appointed by the United Nations, preferably with the participation of members from East Timor and Indonesia. The tribunal would sit in Indonesia, East Timor, and any other relevant territory to receive the complaints and to try and sentence those accused by the independent investigation body of serious violations of fundamental human rights and international humanitarian law which took place in East Timor since January 1999 regardless of the nationality of the individual or where that person was when the violations were committed."[†]

1096. The three UN Special Rapporteurs who conducted investigations in Timor-Leste in late 1999 made essentially the same recommendation.[‡] In their report of December 1999, they argued that, in keeping with accepted norms of international law, primary responsibility for investigating the crimes in Timor-Leste and bringing the perpetrators to justice lay with the Indonesian Government. Accordingly, they argued that the Indonesian authorities should be given an opportunity to conduct such investigations and prosecutions before any further action was contemplated. They noted, however, that in the event that the Indonesian authorities failed to make satisfactory progress in that work, it would be appropriate to establish an international criminal tribunal. More specifically, the UN Special Rapporteurs recommended that:

‡ 26 Pursuant to UN Human Rights Commission Resolution 1999/S-4/1 of 27 September 1999, three UN Special Rapporteurs conducted a joint mission to Timor-Leste in November 1999. The three were: The Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions, the Special Rapporteur on the question of torture, and the Special Rapporteur on violence against women, its causes and consequences. Their report, Situation of Human Rights in East Timor (UN No. A/54/ 660) was issued on 10 December 1999.

> "Unless, in a matter of months, the steps taken by the Government of Indonesia to investigate TNI involvement in the past year's atrocities bear fruit, both in the way of credible clarification of the facts and the bringing to justice of the perpetrators – both directly and by virtue of command responsibility – the Security Council should consider the establishment of an international criminal tribunal for the purpose. This should preferably be done with the consent of the Government, but such consent should not be a prerequisite. Such a tribunal should then have jurisdiction over all crimes under international law committed by any party in the Territory [of East Timor] since the departure of the colonial Power [Portugal]."[*]

1097. The Special Rapporteurs made clear, then, that the need for an international criminal tribunal was contingent upon the adequacy of measures taken by the national Indonesian authorities. It is fair to ask, then, what progress has been made in the years since that recommendation was made. The simple answer is, very little.

1098. Largely in response to demands for an international tribunal, in 2001 Indonesia established an Ad Hoc Human Rights Court to try cases arising from the events in East Timor.[†] After considerable delay, in January 2002 indictments were finally issued against 18 individuals for crimes against humanity allegedly committed in 1999. The accused included several high-ranking Indonesian TNI and Police officers, including Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri, Brig. Gen. Noer Muis, and Col. (Pol.) Timbul Silaen. Of the 18 people charged, twelve were acquitted in first instance trials, and four were later acquitted on appeal. The only two whose convictions were upheld were the former Governor of Timor-Leste, Abílio Osório Soares, and the militia leader, Eurico Guterres, both of them East Timorese. No Indonesian officers or officials were jailed, and some were actually promoted and appointed to highly sensitive command positions.[‡]

1099. This is not the place for an exhaustive analysis of the trials, or of the Ad Hoc Human Rights Court which heard them.[§] However, a few general points can be made by way of judging their effectiveness in clarifying the facts and bringing the perpetrators to justice.

* UN, Situation of Human Rights in East Timor (UN No. A/54/660) 10 December 1999, p. 14.

† The court was established by Presidential Decree No. 96/2001.

‡ For example, by the time he was brought to trial in 2002, Maj. Gen. Damiri had assumed the powerful post of Assistant for Operations to the Armed Forces Chief of General Staff. In that position he played a central role in organising the TNI military operation in Aceh that began in May 2003.

§ For a detailed analysis of the trials, see David Cohen, Intended to Fail: The Trials Before The Ad Hoc Human Rights Court in Jakarta. New York: International Center for Transitional Justice, 2003

1100. First, there were fatal problems with the mandate of the court. Most glaringly, the Presidential decree through which it was established limited its jurisdiction to violations that had occurred in only two months of 1999 (April and September), and in just three of Timor-Leste's thirteen districts (Dili, Liquiçá, and Covalima). That decision effectively guaranteed that a majority of crimes would never be investigated or tried, and that the widespread and systematic nature of the crimes would not be established.

1101. Second, the Attorney General decided to prosecute only four cases, thereby further limiting the likelihood of establishing that the violence was widespread and systematic. Moreover, key suspects – including many of the high-ranking officers identified in this report and in the report of Indonesia's own Human Rights Commission – were not among the defendants. Among the most glaring omissions were Gen. Wiranto, Maj. Gen. Zacky Anwar Makarim, and Maj. Gen. Kiki Syahnakri.

1102. Third, the prosecutions were poorly prepared and weakly argued. The prosecutors generally failed to take advantage of the abundant documentary and testimonial evidence available to them. Most also appeared reluctant to argue their cases vigorously, especially against high-ranking TNI officers. The prosecution's call for the acquittal of Maj. Gen. Adam Damiri in mid-2003 was a case in point.[*] In some cases, moreover, the judges appeared more diligent and energetic than the prosecutors in uncovering evidence against the accused.

1103. Finally, the conduct of the trials, and the comments of some government and judicial authorities indicated that the Ad Hoc Court was established, and the trials carried out, primarily to deflect demands for an international criminal tribunal, rather than as a genuine effort to see that justice was done.

1104. For these and other reasons, respected international human rights organisations, including Amnesty International and the International Center for Transitional Justice have characterised the process as fundamentally flawed and a travesty of justice. In early 2003, for example, Amnesty International wrote that: "The process in Indonesia has been extremely limited in scope and has, despite some convictions, to a large extent failed in the objectives of delivering truth and justice."[†] Credible national human rights organisations and bodies, both in Indonesia and in Timor-Leste, have reached very similar conclusions.[‡] So too have religious groups. In May 2003, a group of 92 religious leaders and organisations from across the United States issued a statement condemning the Indonesian trials and calling for the establishment of an international tribunal.[§]

* See "Indonesia Wants to Acquit General in Human Rights Case," New York Times, 8 June 2003.

† Amnesty International, Indonesia & Timor Leste: International Responsibility for Justice, AI Doc. ASA03/001/2003, London, April 2003, p. 1. This document also contains a useful summary of Amnesty International's principal concerns with the trial process.

‡ The National Alliance for an International Tribunal for East Timor, a coalition of some 20 non-governmental organisations in Timor-Leste, has referred to the trials as "a disgrace and a sham." Letter to UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, 13 March 2003.

§ See "An International Tribunal Must Be Established for East Timor: A Statement From U.S. Religious Leaders and Organizations," available at East Timor Action Network (ETAN) website: www.etan.org/action/action2/relig.htm

1105. Notwithstanding their interest in maintaining cordial relations with Indonesia, key governments have also been critical of the Indonesian process. In late 2002, for example, the U.S. Department of State said it was disappointed with the acquittals recently handed down by the court, and noted that the prosecutors had "consistently failed to use the resources and evidence available to them from the UN and elsewhere in documenting the East Timorese atrocities."* Similarly, in June 2003 the U.S. Ambassador to Indonesia expressed concern about the prosecutor's request for the acquittal of Maj. Gen. Damiri. "While reserving judgement until the final verdict is reached," he said, "we find it particularly disappointing that it was the prosecution that sought a not-guilty verdict in this case."†

1106. In short, it is fair to conclude that Indonesia's national judicial process has not borne fruit, either in the way of credible clarification of the facts or in bringing the perpetrators to justice.

1107. What then of the judicial process in Timor-Leste itself? Here the news is marginally better, but by no means good enough. On the positive side, some of the basic judicial machinery for investigating and prosecuting serious criminal offences, including crimes against humanity, now exists in Timor-Leste. In 2000, pursuant to UN Security Council Resolution 1272 (1999), UNTAET enacted a statute establishing Special Panels for Serious Crimes within the Dili District Court to try serious crimes, including crimes against humanity.‡ Under the same statute, the norms of international law were adopted as the basis on which such crimes would be prosecuted and tried. UNTAET also established a Serious Crimes Unit (SCU) with a mandate to investigate serious crimes that had occurred between 1 January and 25 October 1999, and to prosecute those responsible for such crimes.§

1108. After a series of false starts and delays, in 2002 these mechanisms began to achieve some notable successes. As of late May 2003, 60 indictments had been filed against a total of 247 individuals, most of whom were charged with crimes against humanity.¶ Those indictments accounted for roughly 40% of all the killings reported to have been committed in 1999. Notably, those indicted as of May 2003 included many of the high-ranking TNI officers identified as suspects in this report, including Gen. Wiranto, and seven other high-ranking officers and officials.

1109. These results, achieved in the face of significant logistical and political obstacles, are impressive. Yet, there is little reason for optimism. For one thing, as of late May 2003, † U.S. Ambassador Ralph L. Boyce, cited in "Indonesia Wants to Acquit General in Human Rights Case," New York Times, 8 June 2003.

‡ The statute is UNTAET Regulation No. 15/2000 (6 June 2000) "On the Establishment of Panels with Exclusive Jurisdiction Over Serious Criminal Offences." The serious crimes over which these Panels have jurisdiction are: genocide, war crimes, crimes against humanity, murder, sexual offences, and torture.

§ After Timor-Leste's independence on 20 May 2002, the Serious Crimes Unit began to operate under the legal authority of the General Prosecutor of the Democratic Republic of Timor Leste (RDTL). See Serious Crimes Unit (SCU), "Serious Crimes Update V/03," 28 May 2003.

¶ SCU, "Serious Crimes Update V/03," Dili, 28 May 2003.

more than 65% of those indicted remained at large in Indonesia.* And there is virtually no chance that any of the senior officials and officers that have been indicted – that is to say, the managers and the planners of the violence – will ever be tried through Timor-Leste's judicial process. The main reason is that the Government of Indonesia has categorically refused to extradite any suspects to Timor-Leste, or even to recognise the competence of Timor-Leste's courts to try them.† Consequently, the only cases that have been tried to date, or that are likely to be tried in the future, are those of local militiamen.

1110. A related problem is that the Government of Timor-Leste has been reluctant to take responsibility for prosecuting high-ranking Indonesian officials.‡ That reluctance is understandable. A tiny, fledgling state, impoverished and decimated by long years of occupation and war, and still sharing a vulnerable border with Indonesia, it cannot reasonably be expected to take the lead in the costly and complex process of bringing to justice some of Indonesia's most powerful officials. Moreover, even if the government wished to take on this task, it would be seriously hampered by the lack of resources, capacity, and expertise in the country's new judiciary.§

1111. To make matters worse, there is uncertainty about the future of the UN-mandated Serious Crimes Unit and the Special Panels for Serious Crimes, the institutions that perform the essential work of investigation, prosecution and trial.¶ To date that work has relied heavily on UN staff and on UN and international funding. As that assistance declines, and with UNMISET's mandate set to expire in May 2005, progress on all of these fronts can be expected to slow and perhaps even to stop.

1112. Under these circumstances, it is extremely unlikely that Timor-Leste's judicial system, whatever its other merits, will provide a satisfactory resolution to the search for justice for the crimes against humanity committed in 1999. In view of the clear failure of Indonesia's own judicial processes, that means that all available national judicial remedies for bringing the perpetrators to justice have now been exhausted. These are precisely the circumstances in which it is appropriate and necessary to prosecute such

* The actual figure was 169 of 247 indictees. See SCU, "Serious Crimes Update V/03," Dili, 28 May 2003.

† In response to the Indictment of Gen. Wiranto et al., issued in February 2003, Indonesia's Foreign Minister was quoted as saying: "[The Timor-Leste court] is not at all an international tribunal . . . they don't have international jurisdiction and for that matter legally they don't have the capacity to reach non-East Timorese." ABC Radio, 25 February 2003.

‡ The President Xanana Gusmão has been especially cautious in this regard. The Prime Minister Mari Alkatiri has called for the establishment of an international tribunal in a neutral third country. See, "East Timor PM Wants International Tribunal To Try Indonesian Officers," AP, 30 May 2003.

§ For a useful summary of the problems facing Timor-Leste's judiciary in 2003, see Judicial System Monitoring Programme (JSMP), "JSMP Background Paper on the Justice Sector," prepared for the Timor-Leste and Development Partners Meeting, June 2003. Also see, UNMISET, Press Release, "Justice Sector Consultation Meeting ends: 'Fair and efficient justice key to a democratic state," Dili, 6 June 2003.

¶ At the time of writing, the SCU was expected to complete its investigations by November 2004, and the Special Panels to complete trials by May 2005.

 These problems are spelled out in more detail in Amnesty International, Indonesia & Timor Leste: International Responsibility for Justice, AI Doc. ASA 03/001/2003, London, April 2003, p. 8.

crimes under a broader, universal jurisdiction. That was, moreover, the course of action recommended by the UN Special Rapporteurs and the International Commission of Inquiry on East Timor nearly four years ago.

1113. For these reasons, this report concludes that the United Nations should establish – indeed, has a solemn duty to establish – an international criminal tribunal to prosecute the crimes against humanity committed in Timor-Leste. More specifically, it urges the UN Secretary General and the Security Council to take the lead in this matter, in keeping with their stated commitment to ensure that justice will be done.

CHRONOLOGY: THE UNITED NATIONS AND TIMOR-LESTE*

1960

The United Nations General Assembly adds "Timor and dependencies" to the list of non-self-governing territories. Timor-Leste is administered by Portugal as an overseas province.

1974

Following a change of Government, Portugal acknowledges the applicability of the United Nations Charter provisions regarding non-self-governing territories and the right of the colonial territories under its administration, including Timor-Leste, to self-determination, including independence.

1975

After violent clashes erupt between groups favouring independence and those favoring integration into Indonesia, Portugal withdraws and Indonesia invades Timor-Leste.

1976

Indonesia annexes Timor-Leste as its 27th province. The United Nations never recognises this integration.

1982

The UN Secretary-General begins informal consultations with the Governments of Indonesia and Portugal aimed at improving the humanitarian situation in the Territory and resolving its status.

1995

The Secretary-General initiates a process to promote a dialogue among East Timorese which provides a forum for East Timorese of all shades of political opinion to explore ideas for improving the situation.

1998

In June, Indonesia's President B.J. Habibie proposes autonomy for Timor-Leste on condition that the territory accepts integration into Indonesia. The proposal is rejected by East Timorese resistance leaders. From August to October, Secretary-General Kofi Annan and the Foreign Ministers of Indonesia and Portugal hold in-depth discussions on Indonesia's proposals for a special status based on a wide ranging autonomy for Timor-Leste.

1999

27 January

President Habibie indicates in a public statement that his Government might be prepared to consider independence for Timor-Leste. Talks begin in New York between the Personal Representative of the Secretary-General, Jamsheed Marker, and the Directors-General of the Indonesian and Portuguese Foreign Ministries.

11 March

At ministerial-level tripartite talks in New York, agreement is reached on use of a direct ballot to consult Timor-Leste's people about whether they accept or reject the autonomy proposal.

21 April

Secretary-General Annan welcomes the signing of an agreement, initiated by Indonesia's national Human Rights Commission, which commits all the parties in Timor-Leste to end violence in the Territory.

5 May

The talks in New York result in a set of agreements between Indonesia and Portugal. The two Governments entrust the Secretary-General with organising and conducting a "popular consultation" in order to ascertain whether the East Timorese people accept or reject a special autonomy for Timor-Leste within the unitary Republic of Indonesia.

1 June

The newly-appointed Special Representative of the Secretary-General (SRSG) in Timor-Leste, Ian Martin, arrives in Dili, Timor-Leste.

11 June

The Security Council formally establishes UNAMET through the end of August 1999. In resolution 1246 (1999) adopted unanimously, the Council endorses the Secretary-General's proposal for a mission including up to 280 civilian police officers to advise the Indonesian Police, as well as 50 military liaison officers to maintain contact with the Indonesian Armed Forces. The Council stresses again the responsibility of the Indonesian Government in the maintenance of peace and security in Timor-Leste to ensure the integrity of the ballot and the security of international staff and observers.

18 June

At a press conference in Dili, SRSG Martin says that continuing violence has forced tens of thousands of East Timorese from their homes, creating a "serious obstacle" to preparations for the vote on the future of the Territory.

23 June

Secretary-General Annan decides to delay the Timor-Leste vote by two weeks, citing unabated violence and logistical problems. Reporting to the Security Council, the Secretary-General says that security conditions and the lack of a level playing field do not allow for the consultation process to go forward. Registration is delayed to 13 July to allow time for the deployment of UN staff throughout the Territory and to give Indonesian authorities time to address the pending security concerns.

6 July

Following attacks on UN personnel in Maliana and Liquiçá, Security Council members demand an immediate halt to the violence and intimidation carried out by militia in the territory.

16 July

Voter registration begins after a three-day delay to allow time for Indonesian authorities to resolve remaining security problems.

5 August

Voter registration closes. UNAMET has registered 451,792 potential voters among the population of over 800,000 in Timor-Leste and abroad.

9 August

Supporters and opponents of the autonomy proposal for Timor-Leste sign a code of conduct for the campaign period leading up to the ballot on 30 August.

14 August

Campaigning for the popular consultation begins.

18 August

In response to an upsurge in militia activity, SRSG Martin, Ambassador Agus Tarmidzi, Chairman of the Indonesian Task Force, and senior Indonesian police officials visit Viqueque, Suai and Maliana, where they discuss additional security measures with local police, military and administration.

19 August

East Timorese leaders from pro-independence and pro-autonomy groups agree to establish a 25-person commission to foster reconciliation and cooperation in the Territory until the results of the UN-run autonomy ballot are implemented.

20 August

Violence mars campaigning in Timor-Leste as pro-integration militia harass people attending a pro-independence rally in Suai. In Manatuto, military liaison officers serving with UNAMET are threatened by militia.

24 August

Indonesian authorities assure UNAMET that they will try to create a secure environment. Members of the Security Council express strong concern at the continuing campaign of intimidation and violence in Timor-Leste and call on the parties to fulfill their commitments to disarm and store their weapons.

26 August

SRSG Martin tells a press conference in Dili that the UN intends to proceed with the vote despite the recent spate of deadly violence. In New York, Indonesia's representative, in a meeting of the Security Council, pledges his country's commitment to ensuring that there is a safe environment, as called for in the 5 May agreements. The Security Council extends UNAMET's mandate until 30 November. In a unanimous vote, the Council adopts resolution 126 (1999), endorsing the Secretary-General's proposal to restructure the UN Mission in East Timor for the interim phase after the 30 August vote.

27 August

UNAMET facilitates an historic meeting between the pro-independence fighters of FALINTIL and the Indonesian Armed Forces (TNI) at the main FALINTIL cantonment site in Timor-Leste.

29 August

On the eve of the popular consultation, the Secretary-General issues an appeal to the people of Timor-Leste, calling on all sides to "live up to their responsibilities before history."

30 August

UNAMET announces that at least 95 per cent of registered voters cast their ballots in the popular consultation; a total of more than 430,000.

31 August

Members of the East Timorese Consultative Commission meet for the first time. The group is composed of ten members each from the pro-independence and pro-autonomy camps, as well as five members appointed by the UN Secretary-General .

1 September

Violence erupts outside the UNAMET compound in Dili as militia members attack pro-independence supporters.

2 September

Pro-integration militias, at times with the support of elements of the Indonesian security forces, launch a campaign of violence, looting and arson throughout the entire Territory.

4 September

UNAMET announces the result of the vote: 94,388 or 21.5 per cent of East Timorese voted in favor of the special autonomy proposal and 344,580 or 78.5 per cent voted against. A total of 446,953 East Timorese cast their ballots within and outside the Territory.

5 September

The Secretary-General intensifies his efforts to secure urgent action by Indonesia to bring the situation under control within a specifically limited time frame, or to secure Indonesia's agreement to urgent deployment of an international security force.

8 September

A delegation of five members of the Security Council is dispatched to Jakarta and Timor-Leste to discuss with the Government of Indonesia concrete steps for the peaceful implementation of the 5 May Agreement. In New York, Council members back the Secretary-General's view that if the security situation in Timor-Leste does not improve "within a very short period of time," they will have to consider further action to help the Indonesian Government resolve the present crisis in the Territory.

10 September

As lawlessness in the Territory increases and militia members threaten to invade the UN compound in Dili, the Secretary-General publicly urges the Indonesian Government to accept the offer of assistance from several Governments, including Australia, New Zealand, the Philippines and Malaysia, "without further delay." If the Indonesian Government refuses to do so, he tells a press conference, it cannot escape the responsibility "for what could amount, according to reports reaching us, to crimes against humanity."

12 September

As the five member delegation concludes its visit to Jakarta, the Government of Indonesia agrees to accept the offer of assistance from the international community. The Security Council authorises a multinational force (Interfet) under a unified command structure headed by Australia. The United Nations begins a large-scale emergency humanitarian relief effort. At the same time, increasing attention is paid to the voluntary repatriation of some 250,000 East Timorese from West Timor and other areas in Indonesia and the region. The Indonesian Armed Forces and police begin a draw-down in the Territory.

28 September

Indonesia and Portugal, at a meeting with the United Nations, reiterate their agreement for the transfer of authority in Timor-Leste to the United Nations. They also agree that ad hoc measures are required to fill the gap created by the early departure of the Indonesian civil authorities. UNAMET re-establishes its headquarters in Dili and immediately begins efforts to restore the mission's logistical capacity and redeploy UNAMET personnel as conditions allow.

19 October

The Indonesian People's Consultative Assembly formally recognises the result of the popular consultation.

25 October

The United Nations Security Council, by resolution 1272 (1999), establishes the United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET). The Mission comprises three main components: governance and public administration; humanitarian assistance and emergency rehabilitation; and a military component with an authorized strength of up to 8,950 troops and 200 military observers.

27 October

The Consolidated Inter-Agency Appeal for East Timor, led by the World Bank, is launched in Geneva to request $199 million to meet urgent humanitarian needs through June 2000.

1 November

The last Indonesian Armed Forces (TNI) leave Timor-Leste. The end of the 24-year presence is marked by a farewell ceremony attended by members of the Indonesian Task Force on Timor-Leste, TNI, United Nations officials and Timorese resistance leader and President of the National Council of East Timorese Resistance (CNRT), Xanana Gusmão. The interagency assessment mission led by the World Bank arrives in Dili and meets at UNTAET headquarters with Xanana Gusmão and Acting SRSG Ian Martin.

2 November

Hostile militia impede UNHCR efforts in West Timor refugee camps in the Atambua area requiring police intervention.

8 November

Three United Nations Special Rapporteurs begin initial investigations on alleged human rights abuses in Timor-Leste.

15 November

The United Nations Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC) endorses an international inquiry into alleged human rights violations in Timor-Leste. The Council votes 27-10, with 11 abstentions, in support of a resolution by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights to send experts to gather information on possible violations committed in Timor-Leste since January 1999.

17 November

The newly appointed Special Representative of the Secretary-General and Transitional Administrator, Sergio Vieira de Mello, takes up duties in Timor-Leste.

17 November

Utusan Khusus Sekretaris Jenderal PBB (SRSG) dan Administrator Transisi yang baru ditunjuk Sergio Vieira de Mello mulai bertugas di Timor-Leste.

21 November

A five-member international commission of inquiry on human rights violations in Timor-Leste arrives in Dili. The commission is led by Sonia Picado.

22 November

The SRSG travels to West Timor where he and US Ambassador Richard Holbrooke witness the signing of an agreement between Interfet and the Indonesian Armed Forces designed to speed up the return of refugees from West Timor. UNHCR reports that despite continued harassment by militia, over 90,000 people have returned to Timor-Leste.

27 November

The SRSG signs the first of a series of legal instruments setting out the terms of UNTAET's administration of the territory. Regulation 1999/1 establishes the authority of the Transitional Administrator and the legal regime for the Territory.

1 December

José Ramos-Horta, the Nobel Laureate, returns to East Timor after 24 years in exile. He is accompanied by the SRSG.

2 December

The SRSG signs Regulation 1999/2 on the establishment of the National Consultative Council (NCC), a 15-member joint East Timorese-UNTAET body, through which the representatives of the people of Timor-Leste can actively participate in the decision-making process during the transition period.

3 December

UNTAET establishes, by regulation 1999/3, a Transitional Judicial Service Commission comprising five individuals, namely, three East Timorese and 2 internationals .

17 December

A United Nations donor conference held in Tokyo results in over $500 million in pledges to rebuild Timor-Leste.

20 December

UN military observers find a mass grave in the East Timorese enclave of Oecussi. Eighteen burial sites are uncovered, some containing more than one body.

2000

3 January

UNTAET formally takes control of Dili Airport. An Australian airline will begin flying three times a week to Darwin beginning 18 January.

12 January

UNTAET, Interfet and Indonesian military officials sign a Memorandum of understanding intended to improve cooperation at the border between East and West Timor.

19 January

UNTAET, acting on behalf of the Territory, signs a Memorandum of understanding extending the terms of the East Timor Gap Treaty with the Government of Australia.

21 January

The Secretary-General appoints Lieutenant General Jaime de los Santos of the Philippines as Force Commander of UNTAET's military component.

31 January

The Secretary-General submits his first report on the work of UNTAET. He says that the humanitarian disaster which resulted from the violence after the popular consultation has been the most pressing crisis facing UNTAET.

15 February

The Secretary-General begins a two-day official visit to Jakarta, his first since taking office, and meets with Indonesian officials.

17 February

The Secretary-General arrives in Timor-Leste for a two-day visit. He meets in Dili with the independence leader Xanana Gusmão, Nobel Peace Laureate Bishop Carlos Filipe Ximenes Belo, and Bishop Basilio Nascimento.

21 February

World Bank President James Wolfensohn, Xanana Gusmão, and the SRSG sign a grant agreement for the disbursement of $21.5 million over two and a half years for community empowerment and local government projects.

23 February

Interfet officially transfers its military command of the Territory to UNTAET. A $1.4 billion gas exploitation plan in the Timor Gap is approved .

28 February

UNTAET and Interfet finalise administrative arrangements for the takeover of security responsibilities.

29 February

Indonesian President Abdurrahman Wahid visits Timor-Leste. The President signs a communiqué with the SRSG, establishing, among other things, a border regime for the passage of people and goods between Timor-Leste and Indonesia, cooperation on legal matters and continued support for East Timorese students wanting to study in Indonesian universities.

3 March

A series of armed attacks against United Nations troops and East Timorese people leads UNTAET to declare western zones to be "high threat" areas.

27 March

A police training college supported by UNTAET opens in Dili.

29 March

The SRSG and the Indonesian Attorney General, Marzuki Darusman, conclude an eight-week interim agreement on the provision of mutual assistance in legal, judicial and human rights matters.

31 March

The Indonesian Government extends for three months the deadline for the return of refugees and rescinds its decision to cut off humanitarian aid to the refugees, noting that it would instead request assistance from the international community. The SRSG asks the Indonesian Defence Minister, Mahfud MD, to control any "extremists" and stop the militia incursions into Timor-Leste by Indonesian-based militia. The Defence Minister says that neither the Indonesian army nor the police are involved in supporting the militia groups in West Timor.

3 April

UNTAET, the World Bank and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) sign a grant agreement for $499,000 towards a project to create employment for the poorest communities in Dili.

5 April

UNTAET announces its decision to appoint East Timorese to top administrative positions within the new administration in Dili, namely as deputy district administrators and deputy heads of departments. The SRSG announces the establishment of new District Advisory Councils to allow East Timorese to voice their concerns on all key issues.

11 April

The UNTAET Force Commander and the Commander of the Indonesian army in West Timor sign a Memorandum of understanding (MOU) covering security, boundary crossing, the passage of refugees and the provision of humanitarian assistance along the border between East and West Timor. The MOU confirms the previous Memorandum of 12 January, provides that neither side will be allowed to carry weapons across the border and specifies that both parties agree to cooperate in reporting and investigating boundary incidents.

28 April

The East Timorese Postal Service begins operating.

12 May

The Dili District Court opens its first public proceeding.

19 May

Over eighty people are confirmed dead, most of them East Timorese refugees, in the intense flooding that continues to ravage West Timor. Some 21,000 people are estimated to have been displaced, 16,000 of whom are from 21 refugee camps for East Timorese in the Belu District of south-eastern West Timor.

30 May

At the opening of the Conference on the Reconstruction of East Timor held in Dili, UNTAET suggests a period of co-government between UNTAET and the East Timorese prior to a full transfer of authority.

7 June

UNTAET and the World Bank sign a $12.7 million grant to help revamp the country's health sector.

8 June

The SRSG and Xanana Gusmão meet with the Governor of West Timor to discuss how to speed up repatriation and increase trade on the island.

20 June

UNHCR and other aid organisations suspend activities in three West Timor camps near Kupang following what it describes as several serious security incidents of threats and intimidation against its staff.

21 June

UNTAET and CNRT agree on a new composition and structure for the National Consultative Council (NCC). The newly expanded NCC will have 33 members. The members will include 13 representatives from the districts, seven representatives from CNRT and three representatives from other political parties. Its other members will represent youth, women's groups and non-governmental organisations, as well as the Catholic, Protestant and Muslim communities, professional and farmers' associations, the labour movement and the business community. All members, including the chairman of the NCC will be East Timorese.

23 June

In Lisbon, the donor community pledges its continued support for the reconstruction of Timor-Leste and the new East Timorese administration, and endorses a work programme for the Territory's development through December 2000. The donors indicate their support for closing the financing gap of $16 million for the next financial year.

12 July

The NCC adopts a regulation establishing a Transitional Cabinet comprised of four East Timorese and four UNTAET representatives. The Secretary-General appoints Lieutenant-General Boonsrang Niumpradit of Thailand as Force Commander of UNTAET's military component, as of 19 July 2000. The first 50 graduates of Timor-Leste 's Police Training College officially take up their functions as police officers.

17 July

The Transitional Cabinet holds its first meeting in Dili.

24 July

A soldier from UNTAET's New Zealand contingent is killed following an exchange of gunfire with an armed group near the border with West Timor. This is the first combat-related death of a United Nations peacekeeper in Timor-Leste.

27 July

At a meeting in Indonesia between the SRSG, the UNTAET Force Commander and West Timor Commander, Major General Kiki Syahnakri, it is agreed that an ad hoc committee, comprised jointly of the Indonesian army and the UN peacekeeping force, be set up to investigate the killing of the UNTAET soldier on 24 July.

31 July

UNTAET inaugurates Timor-Leste's first diplomatic training programme in Dili.

3 August

The Security Council calls on the Government of Indonesia to cooperate closely with the United Nations to end cross-border incursions from West Timor and to disarm the militias still operating in the border area.

10 August

A soldier from UNTAET's Nepalese contingent is killed during an exchange of fire with militia in Suai, close to the border with West Timor.

23 August

A high-level Indonesian delegation briefs the SRSG on the Indonesian Government's new policy on refugees and says that the refugee camps in West Timor will be closed down within three to six months in coordination with the United Nations.

25 August

The first criminal sentence in Timor-Leste is imposed by the Dili District Court.

6 September

Three UNHCR staff are murdered in Atambua, West Timor, following an attack by armed militias on the UNHCR office.

8 September

The Security Council adopts resolution 1319 which insists "that the Government of Indonesia take immediate additional steps, in fulfillment of its responsibilities, to disarm and disband the militia immediately, restore law and order in the affected areas in West Timor, ensure safety and security in the refugee camps and for humanitarian workers, and prevent cross-border incursions into East Timor."

12 September

The East Timor Transitional Cabinet approves the establishment of a East Timor Defence Force (ETDF) with former Falintil soldiers representing the core of the 3,000 strong force.

23 October

CNRT President Xanana Gusmão is elected speaker of the East Timor National Council, a precursor of the nation's parliament.

10 November

A Security Council delegation visits East and West Timor to review the implementation of resolution 1272, which gives the UN Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET) the mandate to prepare the territory for independence. In West Timor, the delegation reviews resolution 1319, in particular the need for disarming and disbanding militia groups and repatriating refugees to Timor-Leste.

15 November

The National University of Timor-Leste is opened.

1 December

The first indictments of persons suspected of committing serious crimes in Timor-Leste are presented to the Dili District Court.

11 December

The first indictment containing charges of "crimes against humanity" committed in Timor-Leste is filed .

31 January

By Resolution 1338 (2001), the Security Council extends the mandate of UNTAET until 31 January 2002.

1 February

At a ceremony in Aileu marking the transition of Falintil into the Timor-Leste Defence Force, Falintil Commander Taur Matan Ruak is appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Force, with the rank of Brigadier-General.

16 March

The SRSG announces that the first democratic election in Timor-Leste will be held on 30 August 2001, after signing the Regulation on the Election of a Constituent Assembly .

17 March

UNTAET begins civil registration of the East Timorese population, an important step toward organizing Timor-Leste's first Constituent Assembly elections.

4 May

The North Jakarta District Court sentences six men to between 10 and 20 months in jail for their roles in connection with the killings on 6 September 2000 of three UNHCR staff members in Atambua, West Timor. Secretary-General Kofi Annan calls the light sentences "a wholly unacceptable response."

7 May

Registration of political parties and independent candidates for the Constituent Assembly election commences.

9 June

The Timor-Leste resistance umbrella organisation CNRT is dissolved to make way for a range of political parties to participate in the upcoming election.

23 June

Civil registration ends with 778,989 East Timorese having being registered and issued temporary identity cards.

28 June

The SRSG presents the first State of the Nation address to the East Timorese National Council, giving a detailed and in-depth overview of the work and progress to date, the challenges that lie ahead, and calling again for a Pact of National Unity.

3 July

An Arrangement between the East Timor Transitional Administration and the Australian Government is approved giving Timor-Leste 90 per cent of the revenues from the oil and gas reserves in the Timor Sea.

Introduction

1. Human rights incidents are complex. An eyewitness or victim may report one or many victims, who may each have suffered one or many violations. Each violation may also involve one or many perpetrators. Hence, the interactions between different persons in thousands of these types of incidents require careful empirical methods of identification and aggregation in order to facilitate valid and reliable quantitative analysis.

2. To assure the quality of its data, the Commission instituted several processes. This methodological appendix presents the data and methods from which the Commission's statistical results are derived.

3. The Appendix is divided into six main sections. Section 1 provides an outline of the relevance of empirical data analysis to the Commission's mandate. Section 2 provides detailed descriptions of the different datasets which were used in the Commission's statistical analysis. Section 3 describes the data editing, cleaning and name normalisation techniques which were applied to the data. Section 4 presents the recording accounting tabulations at different stages of the data conversion process. Section 5 presents the various de-duplication and record linkage techniques which were used to match multiple reports of the same individual victim. Section 6 documents the data processing which was used to account for multiple reports of groups of anonymous victims. Finally, section 7 presents the statistical estimation techniques which were used to derive total estimates of the magnitude and pattern of fatal violations and displacements during the Commission's reference period.

Relevance of empirical data analysis to the Commission's mandate

4. The Human Rights Data Analysis Group (HRDAG) helped the Commission to collect and analyse human rights violation data relevant to the mandate period of the Commission, 1974-1999.* This Appendix explains how the data were organised and processed.

5. The Commission required an information management system to manage and structure the data needed to answer the issues outlined in its mandate. Specifically, the Commission's information management system had to supply information about past human rights violations which would subsequently provide:

- Descriptive statistical analyses of general patterns and trends of violations in order to describe the "nature" of human rights violations (the types of violations which were committed).[1]
- Statistical projections of total violations to establish the "extent" of human rights violations (the total number of violations which were committed).[2]
- Statistical hypothesis testing of the regularity of certain violations in order to investigate whether certain patterns of violation constituted "a systematic pattern of abuse".[3]
- Case-level analysis by basic filing and searching of the database in order to describe the "antecedents, circumstances, factors, context, motives and perspectives" that led to large-scale violations.[4]
- Structured quantitative analysis and hypothesis tests in order to investigate whether "human rights violations were the result of deliberate planning, policy or authorisation" on the part of specific parties to the conflict.[5]
- Formal explanations of the scientific and statistical methodologies employed in order to demonstrate that the Commission's findings are based on "factual and objective information and evidence collected or received by it or placed at its disposal".[6]

6. The Commission was aware that after suffering human rights violations a large proportion of victims and their families had lived in silence, fear and isolation, sometimes for more than 25 years. Therefore the Commission had to devise data collection and information management systems that would both produce reliable historical data and promote public participation in the truth-seeking process.

Data sources

7. This section sets out the characteristics of the three primary statistical databases the Commission established to undertake quantitative analysis of past human rights violations and promote reconciliation in Timor-Leste. The Human Rights Violations Database (HRVD) was a collection of narrative statements from victims, qualitative reports from Amnesty International (AI) and data collected by Fokupers, a local East Timorese NGO. The Retrospective Mortality Survey (RMS) was a random-sample household survey used to measure displacement and mortality during the Commission's mandate period. The Graveyard Census Database (GCD) was a comprehensive census of public graveyards in each of the 13 districts of Timor-Leste.

8. The combined data from all three of the Commission's data streams – the HRVD, the RMS and the GCD – were used to make independent demographic estimates of the total extent, pattern and trends of and levels of responsibility for past fatal violations in Timor-Leste.

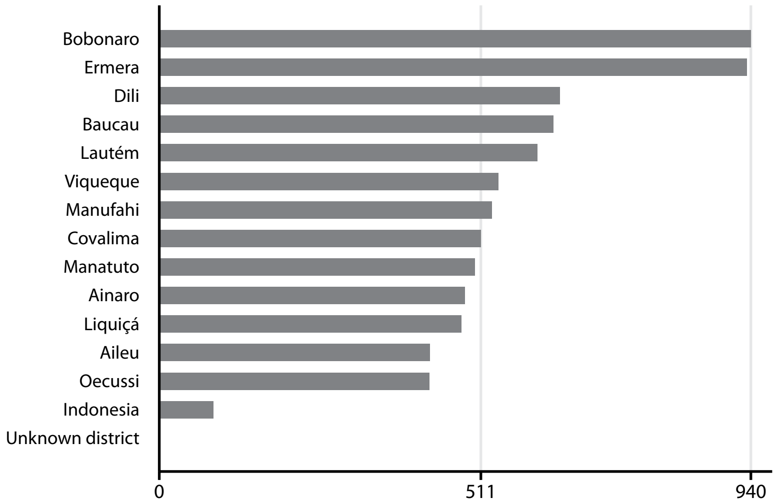
The Human Rights Violations Database (HRVD)

9. The following sections describe the three documentation projects which were conducted to form the Commission's Human Rights Violations Database. The process of transforming qualitative information from these documentation projects into statistical data is also presented. Finally, the recording accounting from the three documentation projects is presented.

The statement-taking process of the Commission

10. In February 2003, the Commission began collecting narrative statements from individuals in all 13 districts of Timor-Leste and from East Timorese people then living in West Timor. These statements were the basis of the HRVD. The Commission established offices in each of the 13 districts to implement its mandate. A total of 7,669 relevant narrative statements were collected documenting reported human rights violations. These narratives provided extensive information on both fatal and non-fatal violations during the reference period.* The statement-taking process covered all 65 sub-districts in each of the 13 districts of Timor-Leste.† In addition to the district-level statement collection, the Commission also collected 86 statements from East Timorese refugees and others living in West Timor, through the Commission's partnership with a coalition of West Timor-based NGOs.‡

11. Given that the statement-giving was entirely voluntary on the part of the deponent, and based on a convenience sample, the distribution of statements across geographic locations was not uniform. As the graph below indicates, the Commission collected



* Commission teams collected a total of 7,824 statements. Some of these (155 statements) were not entered into the HRVD because they either did not mention violations connected to the Commission's mandate, or the violations which they mentioned were not within the Commission's reference period.

† The Commission's district teams generally worked with communities according to local identification with sub-districts and villages and aldeias. As the Commission commenced work in early 2002, the common figure of sub-districts in Timor-Leste was 65; however, the National Statistics Office and the 2001 Timor-Leste Suco Survey report 64 sub-districts.

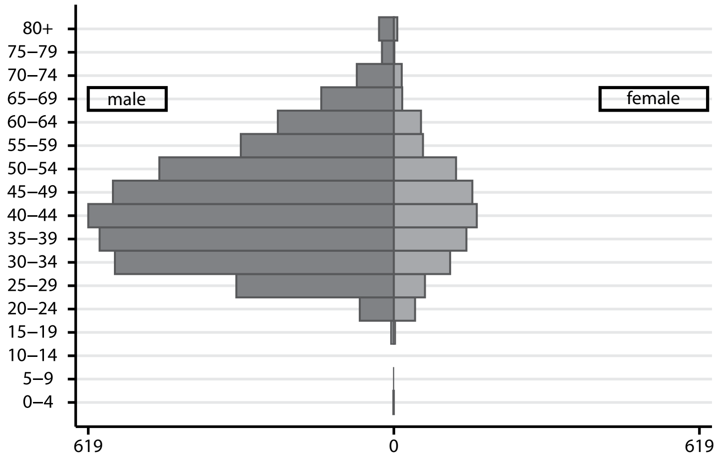
‡ The Coalition of NGOs comprised CIS (Center for Internally Displaced Persons Service), Truk-F, Lakmas (Lembaga Advokasi Kekerasan Masyarakat Sipil), Yabiku and Yayasan Peduli |ndonesia (YPI). Staff from these NGOs collected statements from East Timorese living in Belu, Kefamenanu, Soe and Kupang in West Timor between February and August 2003.

substantially more statements from deponents in Bobonaro and Ermera than from deponents in other districts (See section below for a detailed description of the possible factors which influenced the sampling process during the Commission's statement-taking process).

Number of statements given by district

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

12. In order to analyse this qualitative information statistically, it was coded into a FoxPro database using the design standards of the "Who Did What To Whom" data model.[7] Although these data provide many useful insights, the Commission statement-taking process that generated them did not employ a probability-based random sample. Rather the Commission accepted statements from those willing to volunteer the information they could recall. As a result the narrative data, in isolation, cannot be assumed to be statistically representative of the overall extent and pattern of violations in Timor-Leste.



Demographic characteristics of deponents

13. Approximately 21.4% (1,642/7,669) of all deponents in the Commission statement-taking process were women. In some communities, women did not participate in the Commission's socialisation activities as they were expected to stay at home. In addition fewer women were members of formal organisations with access to information regarding the Commission's work, and some women were uncertain or shy about coming forward to give testimony.[*]

* CAVR, internal document: Evaluation Report of CAVR Statement Taking Process. CAVR Archive..

14. The Commission received statements from adults of all ages. For both males and females, the highest number of deponents were in the 40-44 age group, as indicated in the following graph.

Number of statements by age and sex of the statement-giver

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR
Catatan: 34,6% of violations data did not include the age or sex of the victim

15. Despite the substantial difference in male/female participation rates in the Commission's statement-taking process, female deponents tended to talk about violations against themselves (relative to violations against others) in roughly the same proportion as male deponents. As the following figure shows, of all the violations reported by females, 30.6% (2,939/9,605) were violations against themselves, whereas for male deponents, 35.3% (17,438/49,382) of reported violations were against themselves.

Female	2,939	6,666	30.6	69.4	9,605
Male	17,438	31,944	35.3	64.7	49,382
Not recorded	8	979	0.8	99.2	987
	20,385	39,589	34.0	66.0	59,974

16. The social, cultural and economic challenges faced by women may have limited their participation in the Commission's socialisation and statement-taking processes.

However, the Commission's statistical findings are consistent with the claim that most of the victims of killings, disappearances, torture and ill-treatment were young males. By contrast, the overwhelming majority of sexual violations documented by the Commission were suffered by female victims (see Vol. I, Part 6: Profile of Human Rights Violations).

17. Statement-takers interviewed deponents in Tetum, Indonesian or other East Timorese languages or dialects (which are oral though not commonly written languages) and then wrote the text of the interview in Tetum or Indonesian. Statement-taking forms were available in Tetum and Indonesian. Of the 7,669 statements received by the Commission and found to be within the Commission mandate, 81.7% were in Tetum, 17.0% in Indonesian, 1.2% in other East Timorese languages, and 0.1% in a language that was not specified. As the Commission's statement-taking forms were in Tetum and Indonesian, statements given in other languages were written by the statement-takers onto the official form in either Indonesian or Tetum before coding, data-entry and analysis of the narrative statements.

Potential sampling biases in the statement-taking process

18. As discussed elsewhere in this section, the voluntary nature of the Commission's statement-taking process resulted in a degree of "self-selection". This "self-selection", in turn, introduced a number of factors which affected who was able to give a statement, such as:

- People who lived in remote and mountainous areas very far from where the data were being collected (such as district towns) had less chance of being in the sample than those closer to regional towns and district capitals
- People who were socially active and/or physically agile were more likely to give statements than those who were sick, elderly, disabled or traumatised
- People who were active in the local community or closely affiliated with local village, sub-district and district officials and elders were more likely to participate in the socialisation process and statement taking because these local statement-collection efforts were often organised through local village structures and officials
- People who died before the Commission was formed did not have an opportunity to tell their stories to the Commission; therefore, events that took place in the past tended to be less frequently reported than more recent events
- People with little or no access to the media and mass communications were less likely to approach the Commission, and
- People from constituencies that were hostile to the Commission were less likely to make statements.

19. In order to address sampling biases, the Commission supplemented the statement-taking process by the collection of narrative statements from Fokupers and secondary source information from Amnesty International. Furthermore, to account for biases in measurement of displacement and fatal violations, the Commission developed its Retrospective Mortality Survey which collected structured information from a random probability sample of households in Timor-Leste (See section below for a detailed presentation of the design of the sampling techniques and survey instruments which were used for the Retrospective Mortality Survey).

Amnesty International

20. Amnesty International reported on the East Timorese human rights situation during the Commission mandate period mostly by way of information gathering through underground networks in Timor-Leste and through its contacts within the East Timorese diaspora in Australia and Portugal.

21. The Commission received 322 reports and documents from Amnesty International, which were compiled between 1975 and 1999.*

22. Amnesty International's qualitative reports and Urgent Actions were coded and entered into the Commission's Human Rights Violations Database using the same methods and standards as were used for the statements which were collected by the Commission. The information collected from Amnesty International describes the general human rights situation in Timor-Leste, as it was observed by the international human rights community at the time.

Fokupers

23. Forum Komunikasi Untuk Perempuan Loro Sae (Communication Forum for East Timorese Women, Fokupers) a local human rights NGO, constructed a violations database after the Popular Consultation-related violence in 1999.† The Fokupers database is constructed from open-ended interviews conducted by Fokupers staff with local East Timorese women. Originally, the main purpose of the interviews was linked to the counselling work conducted by Fokupers. However, the objectives were extended to include documentation for investigation purposes by competent legal authorities, such as the UN's Serious Crimes Unit. The narrative statements were taken in the Tetum language.

24. Fokupers constructed its database to facilitate the publication of a report on violence against women. Their original database was centred on representing the biographical data of victims, the narrative events that were described, identifying the violations which occurred and perpetrators involved. In July 2004, Fokupers submitted these data to the Commission on the condition that personal identifiers of deponents, victims,

* The Commission was unable to locate the following Amnesty International Reports: ASA 21/12/83 UA 212/83 21 September, ASA 21/16/85 Disappearances, ASA 21/44/85 Unfair Trials and Possible Torture in Timor-Leste, ASA 21/22/87 Statement on ET by AI to the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation, ASA 21/23/87 ET: Releases of Political Prisoners, ASA 21/14/91 AI statement to UN Special Committee on Decolonisation - Appendix I and II, ASA 21/24/91 Timor-Leste: After the massacre – Appendix 1, As a result, the Commission's statistical analysis of violations in Timor-Leste reported by Amnesty International does not include relevant acts and incidents covered in these reports.

† Fokupers was founded in 1997 to support victims of political violence through counselling programmes and other forms of assistance to women victims of violations, including ex-political prisoners, war widows, and wives of political prisoners. Its mandate also includes promoting women's human rights among the local population, especially East Timorese women.

or family members in the database would not be identified in the Commission Final Report. Commission staff recoded the data, based on the Commission's standardised definitions and coding scheme, so that these data could be analysed in parallel with the CAVR's Human Rights Violations Database.

Coding the qualitative sources (CAVR narrative statements, Amnesty International and Fokupers)

25. Data coding is the process of transforming unstructured narrative information on violations, victims, and perpetrators into a countable set of data elements, without discarding important information or misrepresenting the collected information.

26. In October 2003, the Commission data processing team reviewed the coding and data entry process in order to identify systematic errors and inconsistencies in the coding and data entry process. At the time, 2,473 statements had been coded and entered into the Commission's database. A random sample of 15% of statements (i.e. 371 statements) in the database was taken, stratified on the district in which the statement was taken.

27. Each statement was reviewed by a coder: the coder re-coded the statement without looking at how it had been coded originally. Then the results of the two codings were compared and errors in the original coding were identified, noted and then changed. In addition, the coder would also review the database entry for this statement and identify and note any data entry errors and correct them.

28. Within the 371 reviewed statements, 416 coding errors were identified. 58% (241/416) of these errors were violation coding errors, 12% (49/416) errors associated with coding of the victim's affiliation, 10% (42/416) with the level of location specificity coded and 9% (36/416) were associated with the coding of the institutional affiliation of the perpetrator. Of the 416 coding errors identified, 70% (291/416) of these coding errors were errors of non-identification (i.e. where the act was not identified as a violation or the person or location was not identified by the coder). Another 17% (71/416) of the coding errors resulted from the coder including the act as a violation when what was described in the narrative did not met the definitions and boundary conditions of the Commission's controlled vocabulary. Finally, 13% (54/416) of the coding errors were the result of misclassification of an act into the incorrect violation category.

29. As a result of this coding review, the data processing team undertook three initiatives to minimise these errors in the future: (1) a number of revisions were made to the Commission's controlled vocabulary; (2) a training workshop in which the results of the review were presented to the coding team and extra training provided in the necessary areas; and (3) the implementation of regular group coding exercises where coders coded the same statements and reviewed the consistency of their coding decisions using both qualitative reviews and quantitative Inter-Rater Reliability (IRR) measures.*

* Inter-Rater Reliability is the extent to which two or more coders agree. Inter-Rater Reliability addresses the consistency of the implementation of a coding system.

30. The main types of revisions which were made to the Commission's controlled vocabulary were:

- A reduction in the number of violation categories to a more manageable list
- Refinement of boundary conditions for conceptually similar violation categories (such as torture and ill-treatment)
- Refocusing the controlled vocabulary to the measurement of violations only, not both the measurement of violations and the physical and psychological impact of these violations
- Simplifying the definitions of violation categories and ensuring the syntax of the definition is more consistent with the specificity of information collected in the statements (for example, technical legal terms were re-worded into common language or eliminated, as they did not fit the historical reality being measured)
- Revision to the institutional actors list; both simplification of the list and hierarchical structuring of the institutions to reflect their structural relationships with each other.

HRVD data collection results

31. The HRVD's three combined data sources produced a database with records as shown below. These records represented individual and group victims, both of which suffered fatal and non-fatal violations. The figure shows the breakdown of the number of records collected in each database. Note that these numbers represent the data totals before cleaning where invalid and duplicate records were removed from the databases.

Table 2: Recording accounting matrix for the Human Rights Violations Database

	Statement Count	Individual Count	Fatal Violations	Non-Fatal Violations
CAVR statements	7,779	38,812	6,778	31,595
Amnesty International	267	547	122	631
Fokupers	423	4,888	376	3,983
Total	8,469	4,4247	7,276	36,209

32. Groups are records of unnamed victims that identify two or more victims. Some victims suffered multiple non-fatal violations, others suffered non-fatal violations and a fatal violation, and others suffered only a fatal violation. Consequently, violation totals do not sum to the victim count.

Retrospective Mortality Survey (RMS)

33. The Commission undertook a Retrospective Mortality Survey (RMS) to provide a probability-based estimate of displacement and deaths. This survey drew a stratified random sample of households, and used a structured questionnaire to collect information about deaths in the family and displacement events during the Commission's reference period. The survey enabled statistical estimates of the extent of natural mortality, famine-related deaths, conflict-related deaths, and migration.

Statistical sampling used in the RMS

34. The RMS sample was based on a two-stage sample design. The first stage was a sample of all 2,336 aldeias in Timor-Leste, and the second stage was a sample of households within the selected aldeias.*

35. The population of households was stratified along the following variables: urban/rural, district location, and elevation.† Implicit stratification methods were used so that the list of aldeias was sorted by the following ranked variables: urban/city, district, and altitude, and a systematic random sample picked aldeias across each of the stratification variables.‡ A cumulative measure of size variable is created and a sampling interval is calculated as the number of clusters (144) divided by the total measure of size (180,015), which equals 1,250.1. A random number between 1 and 1,250.1 was generated (397.235) and the aldeia with a cumulative measure of size above that number was selected in the sample. 1,250.1 was added repeatedly to the initial randomly generated number and aldeias were selected throughout the list in the same fashion.

36. The decision to draw a fixed number of 20 households, instead of something proportional to the size of the aldeia or some other allocation method, is primarily one of operational considerations. Selecting a fixed number of households per aldeia is one way of retaining control of the overall sample size and of having an approximately uniform distribution of workload among interviewers.

37. The Commission considered the feasibility of incorporating East Timorese respondents still displaced in West Timor into the reference population.§ However,

* An aldeia is the smallest administrative unit in Timor-Leste. In general, an aldeia is a settlement of group of homes in a small local area. Usually, a suco (village) is made up of three or four aldeias, and groups of sucos make up a sub-district which is an administrative subset of a district. According to the 2001 Timor-Leste Suco Survey there are 13 districts, 64 sub-districts, 498 sucos, and 2,336 aldeias in Timor-Leste. The Commission's district teams generally worked across 65 areas considered by communities as sub-districts, as administrative boundaries took some time to be reorganised following the end of the occupation.

† Stratification is the process of grouping members of the population into relatively homogeneous subgroups before sampling. The strata need to be mutually exclusive such that every element in the population may be assigned to only one stratum. The strata should also be collectively exhaustive, in that no population element can be excluded. Random sampling is then applied within each stratum. Stratified random sampling often improves the representativeness of the sample by reducing sampling error.

‡ The Commission used a method known as Probability Proportional to Size (in this case "size" refers to the number of households and not population, although the two are obviously correlated), a common design in surveys of this kind.

§ Section 3.3 Regulation 10/2001 states: "The Commission may conduct all such activities that are consistent with the fulfillment of its mandate within the present Regulation."

security, operational and data quality concerns arising from conditions in West Timor made survey implementation there difficult. Therefore, the reference population that was sampled by the Commission consisted of all households within the 13 districts of Timor-Leste.

38. It was not optimal, for both statistical and operational reasons, to allow aldeias with fewer than 20 households to be sampled. Therefore, small aldeias were combined with nearby aldeias (which were not necessarily adjacent), before sampling took place, so that the estimated number of households in a cluster (defined as an aldeia or group of aldeias) was at least 40, to reduce the chance that a sample cluster had fewer than 20 households. In practice, due to the inaccuracy of the frame, on arriving in an aldeia a field team might find that it had fewer than 20 households, either because the number of households reported in the 1990 census was inaccurate, or because it had changed in the intervening years. For these reasons, the 144 sampled aldeia clusters actually contain 165 aldeias. Operationally, this means that in these clusters, interviewers had to draw a random sample of 20 households from among the combined total number of households in the cluster.

Questionnaire design and development for the Retrospective Mortality Survey

39. The RMS questionnaire was designed to fulfill the following objectives:
- To produce estimates of total mortality in Timor-Leste between 1974 and 1999, using both survey-based estimation techniques and Multiple Systems Estimation techniques, and
- To develop survey-based analyses that estimate and describe the complicated displacement movements within Timor-Leste throughout the Commission's mandate period.

40. As a result, the questionnaire was organised into the following modules:
- A household register
- A head of household displacement register
- An adult female birth history
- An adult male/female sibling history
- An adult male/female parental history
- A general human rights violation section.

41. The questionnaire* was reviewed by three human rights statisticians external to the Commission† and several subject specialists at the Commission. Through this review process, improvements were made to the layout and design of the questionnaire, and a number of terminological issues in the Indonesian and Tetum languages were identified.

* See Appendix to this Annexe for a copy of the survey questionnaire.

† Fritz Scheuren, President of the American Statistical Association, consultant to HRDAG on projects for Kosovo, Guatemala and Peru; William Seltzer, Fordham University, and Jana Asher, co-author of HRDAG reports in Kosovo, Sierra Leone and Peru.

42. A series of eight cognitive interviews were conducted during the questionnaire development phase. Cognitive interviewing explores the cognitive processes of the respondent. It seeks to identify difficulties and possible solutions to challenges faced by respondents in (i) comprehension of the question, (ii) retrieval from memory of relevant information, (iii) decision processes, and (iv) response processes.* A total of eight subjects – four in laboratory conditions and four in the field – participated in the cognitive interviewing. Significant insight was gained from the probing on respondent's date recall. In particular, cognitive processes and responses about time and date related questions indicated that often, when a respondent answered "Don't Know", they might just not know the exact date according to the Gregorian calendar. However, their responses indicated that sometimes the timing of events were easier to recall by reference to other markers of time such as other major events, or points in the agricultural or seasonal cycle.

43. From the cognitive interviewing process, we developed structured date probes which asked the respondent to narrow event-dates into a six-month window which could be defined by major events such as holidays, or environmental/physical indicators (height of corn or other crops, rainy season or dry season). The cognitive interviewing process also indicated that temporal concepts such as "beginning", "middle", and "end" were not understood by all respondents, so further narrowing of the time window was not possible.

44. During the cognitive and field test interviews, respondents often simply answered "Don't Know" or "into the mountains/forest" as the place to which they were displaced. As a result of the cognitive interviewing, a careful set of probes was created to elicit more detailed descriptions of the places where people were displaced.

45. After peer-review and the cognitive interviewing process, the finalised questionnaire was then translated and back-translated into both Indonesian and Tetum. The questionnaire was then field tested for 5 days in aldeias within Dili, which were not part of the sample. As a result of this field test, a few further question-sequencing, grammatical, and syntactical improvements were made.

Survey implementation and fieldwork

46. Within each sampled household, the head of household responded to both the household register (in which all residents of the household were logged) and the displacement section. An adult female was then randomly selected from the female adult population of the household to answer the adult female birth history module.

47. Before leaving each aldeia, all questionnaires were checked by field supervisors to identify and correct any mistakes or inconsistencies in the completed questionnaires. Two field coordinators accompanied the team of 22 survey enumerators into the field.

48. Twelve aldeias which had been included in the sample were not able to be visited by the enumeration team. The team was unable to conduct interviews in these 12 aldeias due to security concerns at the time. The following figure lists the 12 aldeias that were not enumerated.

49. Furthermore, in some aldeias less than 10 households were enumerated resulting in some additional non-response. Overall, of the 1,440 households in the sampling frame, there was a 3.1% (44/1,440) non-response rate. Given the low non-response-rate, no explicit statistical imputation was performed to control for non-response in the survey.

Graveyard Census Database (GCD)

50. In order to develop baseline mortality data for Timor-Leste, the Commission undertook a census of public graveyards in the 13 districts of Timor-Leste. Through this process available information about names, dates of birth, dates of death, and religion was collected. Gravestones that lacked such information were also enumerated and their size was noted.* By collecting this information, the Commission created a de facto vital registration system for the East Timorese population. That is, the GCD created a baseline listing of some, perhaps even most deaths, which could be used for mortality analysis beyond this project.

GCD data collection

51. To facilitate the Commission's census of public graveyards in the country, a list of all known public graveyards in Timor-Leste was enumerated by CAVR field staff in consultation with village-level officials at the suco (village) level, and where possible, the aldeia level. A "public graveyard" in this study was defined as a location which is reserved exclusively for burial of deceased persons. This definition includes communal burial sites which are established on public land or land owned by a religious institution. However, it excludes family graves located on private property.

* The size of an unmarked gravestone can be used as a proxy indicator of whether the deceased was a child or an adult.

52. The GCD data was collected by two separate data collection teams. The first team collected 128,751 records from 803 cemeteries, which were entered into an series of Excel spreadsheets. The first team covered portions of all 13 districts, but only Dili was covered completely. A second team went into all districts, except Dili, to finish the graveyard survey. They collected 153,057 additional records from 1,779 cemeteries. The second team used a FoxPro database for their data entry.

53. The Commission enumeration teams documented all gravestones within public graveyards – both marked and unmarked. A marked grave was defined as having a physical structure which memorialised a person's life, with legible markings in English, Indonesian, Tetum, or Portuguese.* On all enumerated marked gravestones, the following information was coded if on the gravestone: full name, date of birth and date of death. Unmarked gravestones were typically small simple crosses or other burial markers, without name or date information for the deceased. Enumerators were asked to note information about the religion, type-of-material and grave size, if it was discernible from the gravestone, for both marked and unmarked gravestones.

Methodological description of data editing, cleaning and name normalisation techniques

54. Each of the three databases used by the Commission required data editing, cleaning, and name normalising techniques in order for the data to be compared and linked between databases. Several months were spent reviewing the data for obvious typographical or spelling errors, and a random sample review was conducted to ensure data accuracy. Technical problems occurred in converting data from one database structure to another, and these were also identified and corrected.

Database cleaning and editing

55. The data processing team carried out a complete check (and corrections where required) of all HRVD records with:

- Missing district/sub-district information
- Implausible violation date information (eg day = 42, month =13)
- Records where the violation occurred before the victim's birth date
- Records where the violation occurred after the victim's death date
- Statements where the deponent was coded as a victim of a fatal violation

* Due to a lack of resources, the Commission was unable to enumerate Chinese graveyards.

- Records where the victim's age was coded as 0 or as a negative number
- Records where the victim's age was coded as greater than 75
- Records where there was no violation code recorded
- Records where there was no victim recorded for a coded violation
- Records where there was no (individual/institutional) perpetrator assigned to a coded violation.

56. In addition to the complete quick-checks described above, the coding team also did checks of a simple random sample of records of fatal violations, detentions, torture, ill-treatment, forced recruitment, sexually-based violations and displacements. The objective of the quick checks was to identify whether there were any systematic errors in assigning affiliations of victims and institutional perpetrator responsibility. One major inconsistency was identified - namely where victim affiliation was not assigned to all victims of a violation or violations which happened in the same act or acts closely linked in time. These records were identified, and appropriate rules were applied to correctly assign victim affiliation across violations in the same act or proximate acts for the same actor.

Date editing and cleaning

57. Records that had obvious errors, such as dates of birth, violation, or death that were subsequent to the current date were examined and corrected. This was especially common in the GCD database where the grave markers were so small that full four-digit year dates could not be written out. The data entry system defaulted the two-digit year dates, which should have been in the 1900s, as the 2000s. Enumerators from different teams sometimes used different date coding standards. Some used the European standard DD-MM-YYYY, some the US standard MM-DD-YYYY, some a YYYY-MM-DD format, or variations of these using a two-digit year. Furthermore, sometimes different separators were used between years, months and days – including '/', '.', and '-'. As a result, all date formats across all three datasets were mapped to the standardised format, YYYYMMDD.

58. If the DOB was after the DOD, the dates were swapped. Two types of errors which caused dates with months greater than 12 or days greater than 31 were also identified and examined. The Commission discerned that some errors were caused by variations of the spreadsheet date format settings on the data entry computers.

59. Other errors were obviously typographical. Records from the HRVD and the RMS were corrected by reviewing the original paper material and applying corrections to the database. For the GCD database there was not enough time to hand review the source, so if the error was not easily corrected, the values in that part of the date field (month or day) were left blank.

Age editing and cleaning

60. Age data were examined for possible typographical errors, for example, people over the age of 100. The sources for these records were reviewed to verify the data and corrections made as necessary. Where DOB and DOD information was known, the age was derived. The GCD age value was calculated and a new field generated to facilitate easier matching.

Violation and relationship codes editing and cleaning

61. Reviews were conducted of the violation codes and relationship codes within the HRVD and RMS identified codes that were not valid or conflicted with other data within an individual record (for example, a female being coded as a father). The paper source files for these records were reviewed and the corrections made to the database.

Geographic location code editing and cleaning

62. The geographic location data collected for the RMS and HRVD databases was coded to the East Timorese geocode standards established by the government and approved for use by the the Commission. Locations were divided into four administrative levels – District, Sub-district, Suco (Village), and Aldeia. For those locations that were outside of Timor-Leste, codes for West Timor and Java were created and when the location was not known, they were marked to a separate code for unknown. Each cemetery was given a unique code, called an 'id', in order to differentiate between cemeteries in the same geographic area.

63. The GCD was not collected with the East Timorese geographic code standard, so it was translated to the standard codes.

GCD de-duplication of cemeteries and graves

64. Several factors led to duplicate records of graves and graveyards in the GCD database.

- Different data collection teams inadvertently covered the same cemetery. Many cemeteries did not have posted names, making it hard to identify duplicated records strictly by cemetery name.
- The exact suco (village) and aldeia location was often hard to determine in some rural areas. Even if the cemetery had the same name, it might be coded to a different geographic location. Additionally, many cemeteries shared the same name (Santa Cruz being the most common name), which meant that cemetery name alone was not enough to determine duplicate cemeteries coded to different geographic codes.
- Many of the cemeteries in Timor-Leste were not organised linearly. This sometimes led to the team of enumerators crossing over the same gravestone, recording it more than once.
- Because of the massive amount of paper files required to gather all these data, it was possible that there were data entry duplications.

65. It was possible to find linkages between cemetery id's by examining the names of the deceased, cemetery locations, cemetery names, and complete dates of birth and dates of death after matching.* When rows of duplicates were found, one of the cemeteries was dropped from the dataset used for analysis. While it is common for people to have the same forename and surname, and possibly the same date of death, it is highly unlikely that they would have both the same dates of birth and death. Therefore, any records that had the same forename, surname, date of birth, and date of death were considered duplicates, and only one record was kept in the database for analysis.

66. The goal of the GCD de-duplication process was to ensure that the deceased were counted only once. It was initially thought that during the forced displacements people may have initially been buried where they died, with the body later retrieved by the family and interred at a cemetery in their home aldeia. It was also thought that if the body was not recovered, that a memorial marker in the local cemetery might be erected. While this may have occurred, careful review of the data did not reveal reburial or post-hoc marking with a memorial stone to be common practice. Furthermore, when the bodies were recovered, the first marker would likely have been removed or relocated with the body, thus preventing over-counting. People who were never buried, or who not were buried in public cemeteries, fall outside of the GCD. In order to account for the deaths that are missing from the HRVD testimonies, the RMS interviews, and the GCD grave data, we conducted multiple-system estimation of the total deaths. This analysis is described below.

Name-cleaning processes

67. The names of persons in the Commission data needed to be addressed in two ways. First, the names needed to be parsed into three categories – first, middle/nick and last – names. Once this was complete, name canonicalisation was required to facilitate record linkage. Canonicalisation is a process of reducing each name to the simplest and most significant form possible, without loss of generality.

68. Person names contained a significant amount of variation in the spellings, in apportionment to the three name fields, and in punctuation. Name variation has many causes. In open-ended narrative statements, such as the HRVD, the deponent may be a close relative, friend, neighbour or distant acquaintance of the victim, and he or she may or may not know how to spell the names of the reported victim. Transcription by the statement-taker may involve application of additional spelling and punctuation rules and even incorporate spelling errors. Similarly spelling and punctuation transformations may take place at the data coding and data-entry stages.

Name parsing

69. To address the significant variation in how names were apportioned to the three name fields; first, last, middle/nickname, the names were parsed according to strict rules. HRDAG decided to divide the names using the 'first' first name for first, and the 'last' last name as last, and all other names placed into the middle/nickname field.

* A complete record is defined as having day, month and year for both DOB and DOD.

Additionally the prepositions (for example, de, da, do, dos) were dropped from the name fields as their use was inconsistent in the data.

70. For example, the Portuguese name Maria Luisa da Costa da Silva may be been entered into the database as:

Table 4: Example of an East Timorese Portuguese name

First Name	Middle/Nickname	Last Name
MARIA LUISA		DA COSTA DA SILVA
MARIA	LUISA	DA COSTA DA SILVA
MARIA LUISA	DA COSTA	DA SILVA
MARIA	LUISA DA COSTA	DA SILVA
MARIA LUISA		SILVA

71. The name parsing process would have standardised these names so that the first name was Maria while the last name would simply be Silva. All other names, less the prepositions, were moved into the middle/nick fields.

72. The indigenous East Timorese name Mau Bere may have been entered as:

Table 5: Example of an East Timorese Indigenous name

First Name	Middle/Nickname	Last Name
MAU BERE
MAUBERE
		MAUBERE

73. The name parsing in this case would place Mau in the first name field and Bere in the last name field.

Name canonicalisation

74. Name canonicalisation was applied to the first and last name fields of the records after parsing to facilitate easier matching, especially the automated algorithms for record linkage. Spelling variants for names were distilled into a single representative form for each name. For example, the following spelling variations were canonicalised to AGUSTINO:

- AGUSTINUHO
- AAGUSTINO
- AGUSTIO
- AGUSTINUS
- AUGUSTINHO

- AGUSTINO
- AGUSTINU
- AGUSTONIO
- AGUSRINO
- AGUSTINHO
- AGUSTIMHO
- AGSSTINHO
- AGSTINHO
- AUGUSTINO
- AGOSTINHO
- AGUASTINHO
- ANTGOSTINHO
- AGUSTINHU
- AGOTINHO
- AGOSTINO

75. The indigenous East Timorese names were harder to canonicalise as they were generally four or five characters long and some records that appeared to be spelling variations were in fact distinctly different names. Conservative canonicalisation was applied to the indigenous East Timorese names and then tested with sample linkage of animist records looking at date, age and place information to determine additional canonicals to apply.

76. After several parses over the names to canonicalise them, a new field was generated with the name spelled out in reverse order. Then, by sorting on this new field, we were able to find additional names to be canonicalised to a single form as beginning letters could vary depending on pronounciation, but the ending syllable was likely to be the same. This process proved to be very helpful in finding additional canonicals.

77. There were Chinese, Indonesian (Muslim), and Anglo-Saxon names in the databases, as well as Portuguese names and indigenous East Timorese names. The relatively few numbers of Chinese, Indonesian and Anglo-Saxon names did not require special handling. East Timorese staff, in Timor, identified whether names were indigenous for the application of matching rules and algorithms, because indigenous East Timorese names are not always sex-specific.

78. The HRVD and RMS databases are smaller then the GCD, so we canonicalised them first. We then applied the lists of name canonicals to the GCD. The resulting names were then reviewed to identify additional canonicals.

79. During the canonicalisation process, some letters in names were found to be interchangeable with each other, most commonly with the Portuguese names. The letters S, J, G, and Z were often interchanged with each other in names. Also, the letters V, U, W, and B were often interchangeable. Less frequently, the letters H and E were interchanged, or simply dropped, for example Helder/Elder, Henrique/Enrique. An example of interchangeables would be for the name Virginia, which could be spelled with a B or V. For example, spelling variations found for the canonical VIRGINIA included BIRGINIA, BERGINA.

80. Names that began with these letters were compared to each other to assist in the canonicalisation process. Where names had more than one interchangeable or the interchangeable letter was in the middle or end of a name, it was very difficult to find potential canonicals. Therefore, a program was written that generated a list of names where combinations of interchangeable letters matched another canonical name. The record linkage expert reviewed these combinations to determine if they should be canonicalised or were distinctly unique names. Where there were additional canonicals due to interchangeables, the preferred letter for the canonical was S (for S, J, G, and Z), V (for V, U, W, B), and H (for H and E).

81. Additionally, in the canonical process, it was noted that ANJU and ANJO were often cited as the first name or the only name for a record. Anju is commonly used to refer to a dead infant and was found often in the GCD records when a child died before being baptised and therefore was not given a Christian name. Records with ANJU and a last name were used for the matching process because there was some identifying data, but records with only ANJU were too ambiguous to make reasonable judgments for matching.

Sex and ethnicity coding

82. During the canonicalisation process, the Portuguese first names were reviewed with the frequency of the sex codings male, female and unknown displayed.* Sex codings that were obviously incorrect were corrected. As with most Latin names, those that end with A generally are female and those ending with O (or U) are usually male. Where first names ended in letters other than A, O or U, the frequency between male codings and female codings was examined and when the disparity was great, indicating that a few records were miscoded during data entry, corrections were made to the database.

Data conversion

83. In order to expedite all the data processing steps associated with matching of duplicated records, each dataset was transferred from its original FoxPro or Excel database platform, to our Analzyer database platform.† The FoxPro database schema was first duplicated in PostgreSQL for importing into Analzyer. The relational database structures for the HRVD and RMS data were maintained in Analzyer.

84. The following table shows the total number of records from each dataset that were imported into Analzyer. Note that these totals reflect data cleaning changes which resulted in the dropping of duplicate and invalid records.

* Frequency is a count of the instances a name or code appears in a particular data field. Values with very low frequencies can reveal potential errors or misspellings in the data.

† Analzyer is a free and open source application used to collect, maintain, and analyse information about large-scale human rights violations. For more information about Analzyer, see HDRAG website at http://www.hrdag.org/resources/data_software.shtml.

Table 6: Total record count by database pre- & post-data cleaning

Database	Pre-Clean	Post Clean	Count/% Fatal	Count/% Non-Fatal
HRVD	41,456	37,651
RMS	4,883	4,619
GCD				n/a1*

* This field is not applicable for the GCD because by definition, someone buried in a graveyard is dead.

Record linkage overview

85. Individuals reported in the HRVD and the RMS are sometimes reported multiple times, by different deponents and may also appear as records in the GCD. To ensure the statistical analysis controlled for duplicate reports of the same person, the data required record linkage, also known as matching. Matching was applied to two general categories of violations for study - fatal and non-fatal violations. Fatal violations included civilian killings, deaths due to deprivation, disappearances, and combatant deaths. Non-fatal violation categories included attempted civilian killing, detention, torture, rape, sexual slavery, sexual violence, ill-treatment, displacement, forced marriage, impediments to reproductive rights, unfair trial, destruction of homes, destruction of livestock, extortion, threats, forced recruitment and forced labour.

86. There were two types of matching done for the purposes of statistical estimates; intra- and inter-system matching. Intra-system matching links records that identify the same person within a single dataset, and each record can match to zero, one, or many other records within that dataset. Inter-system matching joins two or more lists of unique records from different data sources together so that a multiple systems estimation of the violations can be applied. Records matching during inter-system matching can match only to zero or one other record in each of the other datasets.

87. Due to the complexity of inter-system matching and time constraints for the work, the non-fatal data in the HRVD and RMS only had intra-system matching performed for descriptive statistics. The fatal data, which included the GCD data, was both intra- and inter-system matched as the basis for multiple systems estimate calculations. Matching was done using three methods: hand-matching, computer-generated matching, and computer-assisted matching. Each of these methods may involve more than one pass.[*]

Matching rules

88. Each individual record was compared to all other records in each dataset for possible matches and was deemed a match when a significant number of the field values match exactly, were in close proximity, or did not conflict. The fields used for matching were: first_name, last_name, age, sex, DOB, DOD, place_of_birth (POB), and place_of_death (POD). The middle/nickname and interview_location fields were also available for clarification purposes, but were not fields available in all three datasets, and were often sparse where they were available. While not part of the matching rules, these data were taken into consideration by the record linkage expert. However, it was not used in any computerised auto-matching.

* A pass is a review of all the data in a dataset based on sort order or algorithm, to look for matches.

89. The matching decisions used for the Commission data tended to over-match records.* Over-matching reduces the number of unique records and therefore will tend to lower the estimates. Over-matching is preferred in cases where there is uncertainty that a match is accurate, to produce conservative estimates.

Matching names

90. The first and last name fields were not always complete; some had initials or were missing either the first or last name. Attempts were made to match every record even when it was incomplete, but for fatal matching, records with neither first nor last names or that had initials only, were dropped from matching as there was not enough data to make reliable judgements. For non-fatal matching, attempts were made to match violations with DOB, DOD, and death location information to other records with the same values in those fields, even when there was no name or the record only had initials. Records with less complete name data relied more heavily on perfect dates and places to be matched to other records. Many people could have died on the same day in the same place, and knowing which of those people to match an incomplete name to is difficult and unreliable.

Matching sex and ethnicity

91. Where the sex of the victim was known, it was only potentially matchable to records of the same sex or those with unknown sex. Records where sex was marked Unknown were matchable to records coded Male and Female, but within a matched group, the sex codes could not conflict with other records in that group.

Matching locations

92. Geographic location codes used for the CAVR data were divided into four levels: district, sub-district, suco (village), and aldeia. The GCD database was the only dataset to disaggregate location information to the aldeia level, so it was not used for matching purposes. The frequency of displacements made location information difficult for witnesses to pinpoint exactly, except in places where the violation occurred in the place where the witness currently resided or from where they originally were displaced. People may have been displaced multiple times, across multiple locations and because the conflict was spread over three decades, recall of exact locations was subject to a number of errors.

* Over-matching means that linkages are made between records that might not in fact be duplicates.

93. Additionally, the boundaries between geographic locations is affected by three factors – changes to place names and the geographic boundaries of administrative boundaries over time, the imprecision of boundaries, especially in rural areas, and potential data collection, coding, and entry errors. As a result, matches anywhere within a single district and between bordering districts was considered. Potential matches between a sub-district and suco that were closer to each other were given a higher preference as well. In studying the data closely, records that matched on a preponderance of data fields other than place provided substantiation for our judgments on location matching. Where the HRVD documented a death occurring in the same location as the interview location, it was assumed that the location information was likely to be accurate.

94. In rare cases matches were made that violated the rule for location data, but only when it was clear that the records identified the same person, and that common typographical errors accounted for the difference. When there was more than one possible match, the matching algorithm tried to match to the less-specific records in order to preserve more-specific records for later match candidates. When there was equal distribution between locations at any geographic level, the less specific location was preferred and if there one was not more less specific, than one was randomly selected to be the 'rep rec'.*

Matching dates

95. As the conflicts in Timor-Leste occurred over a long period, many respondents did not remember the exact dates and places in which events occurred. The GCD data were assumed to be more accurate for date and place information because bodies would normally be buried shortly after death, and close to the place of death. When matching on the date field, the record linkage expert would link records that were plus or minus three years from each other. The exceptions to this rule were rare, and only made when the other data fields were strong exact matches. Records with month and day data were often inaccurate in the HRVD and RMS data as memory tends to be faulty over such a long period. Therefore, more-specific dates were matched to each other where they were close, and to less-specific dates where they were not close.

Record level constraints

96. Matching constraints were implemented to prevent over-matching. Specifically, the following matches were not allowed:

- Records of victims from the same statement (because each statement identified unique victims who may have had the same names because of familial relationships)

* The 'rep rec' is the record that best represents that grouping of matched records by having the most complete data. Records with the most common date or place within that group or a record with a more precise place or date are considered more complete. The more complete the data, the better each subsequent round of matching for both intra- and inter-system matching will be. Because records were being linked together and the data unique to each record preserved, as opposed to deleting duplicates, it was necessary to look at the variation within the matched records to see if the differences would significantly change the analysis.

- Two non-fatalities could not be matched if they were reported in the same source record (because the data coding and database representation methods used prevented duplicate records from a single statement being entered into the database)
- A deponent could not match to a fatal violation
- A non-fatal record could not match to a fatal record if any dates associated with the non-fatal violations were before the fatal records DOB
- A non-fatal record could not match to a fatal record if any dates associated with the non-fatal violations were after the fatal records DOD.

Intra-system matching

97. Within a dataset a person may be identified by multiple witnesses. Intra-system matching links records that identify the same person to generate a list of unique named persons to prevent over-counting, and thus, over-estimations. Intra-system matching is very complex and difficult to perform in a database as a person can match to n other records in the dataset. Therefore, the data are manipulated in a spreadsheet which makes it easier to order and re-order the data in multiple ways to locate linkages that need to be made.

98. Intra-system matching a dataset before merging its records with other datasets can reveal patterns inherent in that data collection project. Some of these patterns may be systematic errors in data collection, coding or data entry, or may be the result of the structure of the data collection. The observation of patterns within each dataset allows for the investigation, and if necessary, the correction of the underlying errors.

99. The three datasets of the Commission would have been too large to do high quality data matching if combined because some of the patterns would not have been noticeable to the human eye. That is, if all three datasets were combined into a single list, the resulting list would include more than 160,000 records. Finding matching records in a list that long would have been very difficult for a human reader.

HRVD intra-system fatal matching

100. First, intra-system matching on fatal data in the HRVD was performed to link records that described the same victim. The records were imported into a spreadsheet and sorted on first name, last name, POD, and DOD, to find records that matched.

101. As records were linked, a 'rep rec' was chosen. After each sort, a matching pass was performed and the linked records within a match group hidden (but not dropped) from the outputted data file, leaving just its 'rep rec'. This reduced the noise within the data. Noise can be defined as the non- 'rep rec' records in a match group that distract the matcher from the potential relationships of the 'rep rec' to other candidate matches. The smaller the list of unique records , the easier it is to see potential matches and other patterns within the data. Each subsequent pass identifies additional matches, and finally, a list of unique records is distilled from the entire dataset. A minimum of five passes are done on each dataset.

102. The 15,043 fatal records of the HRVD dataset were reduced to a list of 11,145 unique victims. All the records are then imported back into the Analzyer data matching system. The matched records were linked back to the 'rep rec' for analysis when all matching was completed.

RMS intra-system fatal matching

103. The RMS intra-system fatal matching was performed in a spreadsheet after the HRVD intra-matching was completed. The RMS intra-system matching used the same fields as the HRVD intra-system matching and also looked at the source of the record. Records of fatalities collected from the same household were not allowed to match to each other as they identified unique individuals, even if they shared the same name and DOD.

104. The 4,883 fatal records of the RMS dataset were reduced to a list of 4,619 unique victims.

105. The resulting linkages of both the HRVD and RMS datasets were imported back into the Analzyer data model for use in computer-assisted and computer-generated matching, and to generate data for analysis. Information and patterns documented by the record linkage expert in the hand-matching phase was then used to generate matching rules and algorithms for the computer-assisted and computer-generated matching processes.

HRVD intra-system non-fatal matching

106. Computer algorithms were devised to clean and match non-fatal violations in the HRVD. This step is referred to as auto-matching. Automated matching algorithms for the non-fatal violations in HRVD were developed as time and resource limitations did not permit the use of a human record linkage expert. There were three times as many non-fatal victims as fatal victims reported in the HRVD.

107. The HRVD contained 41,546 records. The intra-system auto-matching yielded a list of 37,651 unique victims of fatal and non-fatal violations.

Auto-canonicalisation of non-fatal name values and matching

108. The first step in the auto-canonicalisation process was to build a table with the different cleaned versions of all (fatal and non-fatal) original names in the database. For the first name, the versions were normalised, normalised-terse, first word of normalised (called first-namefirst), and first word of normalised-terse (called first-namefirst-terse). The same method was applied to the last name, except the last word was used instead of the first word. Then, for each victim name of a non-fatal violation, an attempt was made to match the following combinations of the normalised non-fatal full names to all of the normalised hand-canonicalised full fatal names:

- namefirst + namelast
- namefirst-terse + namelast-terse
- first-namefirst + last-namelast
- first-namefirst-terse + last-namelast-terse

109. The matching program matched on a full set of information before trying to match on less information. This matching of non-fatal to fatal-names was only done for normalised fatal names that mapped to a unique canonical name; as the information became more terse, there were fewer and fewer 'allowable' normalised names to match on (which was offset by the fact that it was easier to make the match, because the less-terse information was more resistant to coding variability and data entry errors).

110. For those full names that could not be canonicalised, the first names and last names were canonicalised independently. The order of matching first names was as follows:

- namefirst
- namefirst-terse
- first-namefirst
- first-namefirst-terse

111. A subsequent matching process was developed to follow the preliminary matching round based on the auto-cleaning and auto-matching processes. This process targeted potential matches with the non-normalised names and identified the information-density per data-field of each name record. The percentage of records that contained non-blank values for the respective data fields was as follows:

- 9% had date_birth (all of these have birth_geo1)
- 44% had birth_suco_location
- 50% had birth_sub-district_location
- 53% had birth_district_location
- 70% had Firstname
- 94% had Sex
- 100% had Lastname (since it's a mandatory field required for matching).

112. Since the last name field was the only non-blank field for all records, it was the only field that could be used in the index blocking. Blocking looks at records where the field(s) being blocked share the same value. The blocking for the last name field was done on the first four letters of each name. The match algorithm had to be carefully calibrated: if there were many blank fields, then a closer match on the non-blank fields was required (also, matches on very common last names were given less weight).

113. There were three different kinds of 'closeness' that were varied:

- The number of letters in the name that matched (4, 8, or all)
- The number of levels in the birth location that matched (from 1 through 3), and
- The required-closeness of the dates (from 1/3 year to 3 years).

114. With two-thirds of the victim names auto-canonicalised, and a well-defined set of rules for required-closeness-of-match for different numbers of non-blank fields, the resulting match rate was approximately 15% (compared to about 25% for the human matched fatal-violations data).

115. A match rate of 15% for non-fatal violations seems plausible as:

- Only two thirds of the name records could be canonicalised, and

- It is usual to expect higher reporting density for fatal violations as they are more easily identifiable and easier to recall by a larger number of people in the victim's social network.

116. The automated inter-system matching on the non-fatals reduced the dataset from 44,203 records to a list of 31,568 unique victim records.

Data linkage expert review of HRVD non-fatal intra-system matches

117. The record linkage expert studied a sample of the auto-matched results to make sure there were no obvious mis-matches (ie. over-matching). No systematic pattern of over-matching was found in the review of a random sample of 10% of the matched group records. The largest group of records which were matched to each other was 20 records. A review was done of the largest groups to ensure that their match size was plausible.

118. Intra-system matching on fatal data generates a combined list of unique individuals who are all dead, even though the cause of death can vary. When intra-matching is done on non-fatal violations, a victim can suffer one or more violations, on one or more days, in one or more places. The non-fatal matching reveals the human rights violations suffered by individual victims, where a victim may have suffered other violations that may or may not have resulted in a fatality.

Inter-system matching

119. Inter-system matching links lists of unique individuals from multiple datasets and is done cumulatively in pairs or datasets. Inter-system matching is applied only to fatal data. First, inter-system matching is applied using the 11,126 intra-system matched records from HRVD to the 4,619 RMS intra-system matched records in the Analzyer Record Linkage application. The RMS fatal source dataset was matched into the HRVD fatal target dataset.*

Phase 1 – Computer-generated matching

120. Strict matching (referred to as P1 matching) automatically identified 'exact matches'.† Processing of 'exact matches' via the automated P1 process eliminates the inefficiency of having a human compare every record in, or between the databases, with every other record.

121. Matching based on algorithms was applied to the data to generate a list of potential matches that were deemed to be highly probable. Calculations based on probabilities

*The designation of source and target is determined by the number of records in the dataset. The smaller of the two datasets in the pair is the source and the larger is the target. This is to reduce the number or records that have to be compared, but each record from both datasets is compared to all of its potential matches.

† An 'exact match' occurs where two or more records in a database are matched together when all the fields on which matching decisions are being made are identical.

and frequencies of each data field within a record were weighted and ordered by rank, and a threshold level was established where the match being made was probably correct. The threshold was set after a review was made of the prospective algorithm-based matches, which eliminated the need for a human to compare every record for possible matches. Potential matches below that threshold were handled in one of two ways, depending on whether or not matching was for fatal or non-fatal, and intra- or inter-system matching.

122. For inter-system matching of fatal violations data the algorithm-generated match pools were imported into the Analzyer data matching system and the record linkage expert reviewed these computer-assisted match targets for each of the remaining unmatched source records. Non-fatal intra-system matching was completely automated with results reviewed by the record linkage expert to ensure that extreme over- or under-matching was not occurring.

Phase 2 – Computer-assisted matching

123. Computer-assisted matching, referred to as P2, was based on algorithms that generated pockets of potential matches between source and target records that were deemed to be likely matches, but required human review to select which of the closely weighted records was the best match. Calculations based on probabilities and frequencies of each data field between pairs of records were weighted and ordered by rank based on names, date of birth, date of death, place of birth and place of death. Using the Analzyer matching interface, the record linkage expert selected which target record from that pocket, if any, matched the source record being examined.

124. The P2 fatal inter-system matching rules were:

- The sex of source and target(s) had to be equal, where sex was known.
- The first initials of names between a source and target(s) had to be the same.
- For target(s), where DOB and DOD were known, one of the dates had to be within 5 years of the source dates.
- If the source and potential targets(s) had 'perfect' DOB or DOD, at least one of the other matching fields hand to match.

125. After the inter-system match work was done in Analzyer between the HRVD and RMS datasets, the resulting list of unique fatal victims was imported into a spreadsheet. The records were then sorted on the various data fields to determine if any other possible matches could be found. This not only served to catch matches missed, it also measured how good the matching algorithms had been. Additional fine tuning of algorithms was done as a result of the hand reviews by the record linkage expert, ensuring that successive matching passes would be more thorough and accurate.

Phase 3 – Vague data matching

126. In Phase 3 (P3) matching, records that contained too many blank fields, or were records of commonly-named individuals, from the same area, or who died in the same time period, were matched. These matches did not have enough data to be specific about which source/target pair was exact, so one was randomly selected from the targets.

For example, Mau Bere was a very common name in many parts of the country, and 1999 was a year when many of them died. It is unlikely that there were missed intra-system matches for two reasons. First, they were records that often came from the same statement which indicated they were family members with the same name. Second, the GCD recorded many deaths in the same cemetery with the same name and date (or no date), but there was not enough identifying information within the HRVD and RMS datasets to distinguish them as unique individuals.

127. The P3 matching process made matches where equal probabilities of a good match for a record existed, which did not require the judgement of the record linkage expert.

Pair-wise inter-system fatal matching

128. The inter-system matching pair of HRVD and RMS resulted in the new list of unique victims, named the HRVD/RMS dataset. This dataset included 10,594 records found only in the HRVD dataset, 4,087 found only in the RMS dataset, and 532 were found in both HRVD and RMS. These 15,213 total unique records were then inter-system matched with the 149,267 records of the GCD dataset, the HRVD/RMS dataset being the source data and the GCD the target data. The pair-wise matching between the HRVD/RMS dataset into the GCD resulted in 157,000 named deceased persons. This total includes records that were out of mandate or did not have dates of death to verify that they died within the mandate period. Only records having dates of death within the mandate period were used for analysis.

129. The linkages within and between these datasets are used in estimating the total number of dead due to the conflict. Records in this final list can linked back to a single dataset, or a combination of the three datasets. Below is a simple matrix showing the results of the final fatal inter-system matching linkages between the datasets.*

Table 7: Inter-system matching matrix

	HRVD only	RMS only	GCD only	HRVD & RMS	HRVD & GCD	RMS & GCD	HRVD/ RMS/ GCD	Total
Count	5,203	2,148	141,787	382	5,391	1,939	150	157,000
Percent	3.31	1.37	90.31	0.24	3.43	1.24	0.1	100

130. If the intra-system matching caught all possible matches, then only zero or one potential match would have been possible during inter-system matching. Matches may be missed if the records being examined had missing data fields that made it unclear if the two records should have been linked. Human error is also possible when looking at the large quantity of data that was involved in the Commission's work. Generally, a match is assumed when a majority of the data fields match, or the records' match weight is within tolerances. If there are not enough fields with complete data, then it is difficult to determine with reasonable certainty whether a record should be included or excluded from matching to another. The latter case was especially true for the very common indigenous East Timorese names, like Mau Bere where many people, from the same place, died or were killed at the same time.

131. After completing the inter-system matching in Analzyer, the data were imported into a spreadsheet for review by the record linkage expert. By looking at the data sorted on different variables, with multiple processes – both human and automated – it can be confidently concluded that all possible matches that should have been made were processed. Additionally, the inter-system matching process may be considered a measure of Inter-Rater Reliability (IRR) because it finds instances where matches were missed in the intra-system phase. By returning to the intra-system data and applying the missed matches, it was possible not only to measure the IRR but also to correct the data, producing more reliable data on which estimates could be based.

Data processing of reported violations involving groups of anonymous victims

132. During the statement-taking process a deponent may have talked about one or many victims. Sometimes when multiple victims were reported by a deponent, the deponent did not know some or all of the victims' names. In the Commission statement-taking process 1.9% (1,419/75,443) of victim-records which were documented by the Commission the deponent did not know the individual names of the victims, who suffered abuse as part of a larger group of people.

133. In order to integrate these data into the Commission's analysis, and thereby consider violations against named individuals as well as unnamed groups, some further processing of the data was required to account for likely duplicate records of violations against a reported victim group. The processing steps to control for this duplication

- identified violation records (against unnamed group victims) which appeared to describe the same victim group, and then
- chose a victim record from the pool of possible duplicate records to be retained as the 'rep rec' of this reported victim-violation.

134. Unlike data on violations against individuals (which by-and-large contain personal identifiers, such as names, ages and sex), violations reported against groups do not usually contain detailed identifiers of the victim-group. As a result, group-victim records were matched by comparing the following variables of each reported violation against a group:

- the district where the violation reportedly took place
- the violation-type into which the violation was coded, and
- the year and month in which the violation reportedly occurred.

135. Then after all the like group-victim records were matched together to form a cluster, the record with the largest group-size within each cluster was retained. All other records were regarded as duplicate records and therefore dropped from the dataset.

136. The level of duplication among group-victim records is shown below. This table shows how many duplicate violation copies per violation type were identified in the dataset and the number of surplus group violation records which were dropped for the Commission's analysis on violations against group victims. `

Statistical estimation techniques used in the analysis of fatal violations and displacements

137. This section presents the survey-based estimation techniques and multiple systems estimation methods used to make the estimates of the total extent and pattern of mortality and displacement during the Commission's reference period.

RMS weight calculations

138. The survey sampling was described earlier: in 2003, the CAVR field teams interviewed 1,396 households selected from 138 aldeias and groups of aldeias, called clusters. The clusters were selected by a method called 'Probability Proportional to Size' (PPS), and then ten (or 20) households were selected by simple random sampling in each cluster. If each cluster had exactly the same number of sampled households, the sampling probability of each household would be identical, a process known as 'self-weighting'.[8] Due to sampling 20 households in multi-aldeia clusters and non-response in other clusters, not all clusters had the same number of sampled households; however, 78.5% of the sampled clusters have exactly 10 sampled households. Non-response was 3.1%, and so no non-response adjustment was made. The weights were calculated as follows.

139. For each cluster, the adjustment for varying cluster size is:

- cluster_adjustment = median_cluster_size / cluster_size

140. The raw 1990 household sampling probability is

- sp_1990 = (total number of sampled HHs) / (total HHs in 1990) = 1,396/168,858

141. And so, for each cluster, the pps weight is

- pps_wt_1990_raw = (1/sp_1990) * cluster_adjustment

142. There was considerable population change due to migration and growth between 1990 and 2004, when the survey was conducted. Before the weights could be estimated, the total number of households in each aldeia was adjusted from the 1990 census using data from the 2004 census. During the sample design, the clusters were chosen using the household counts for each aldeia reported by the 1990 census. At the time these calculations were done (April 2005), the Census Timor-Leste 2004 enumeration data were available disaggregated only to the sub-district level, but not by suco (village) or aldeia.[*] Note that the 1990-2004 weight adjustments do not affect the total summed weight, which is fixed at the number of households that existed in 2004. The weight adjustments affect how much households in different places affect the projection.

143. Two sub-districts listed in the 1990 census were not listed in the 2004 census results: Fatumaca in Baucau was absorbed by Baucau sub-district, and in Oecussi, Pante Macassar B was subsumed in Pante Macassar. For these sub-districts, the number of households in 2004 was estimated by using the proportion of households in the absorbing and absorbed sub-districts in 1990 multiplied by the total in the absorbing sub-district in 2004.

144. Although the 2004 household totals are available from the census at the sub-district level, the RMS has too few responses at the sub-district level for the estimates of weights by sub-district to have adequate data (29 of the 59 sampled sub-districts have fewer than 20 responses). Therefore the 1990 weights were scaled to the 2004 district totals by the following calculation:

- district_adjustment = (Total HHs in 2004 in this district)/(Total 1990 weight in this district)pps_wt_2004 = pps_wt_1990_raw * district_adjustment

145. By forcing the weights to match the 2004 census district household counts, the weights were normalised to sum to the total number of households in 2004 (194,943). The errors given in the results are calculated using Stata's standard survey modules.[9] These modules use the survey design variables (stratum, primary sampling units and sampling weight) to make weighted estimates of the totals and Taylor-series approximations of the sampling errors. The error estimates assume random sampling with unequal sample weights. This assumption is conservative (i.e. it will tend to underestimate the sampling error) with respect to weights calculated using the PPS methods described above.[10] The data files used for these calculations are available at http://www.hrdag.org/timor

RMS date assignment for displacement analysis

146. The survey asked respondents when they moved from each of their locations during the period 1974-1999. When respondents were uncertain of the specific date of their move, they often identified the year of the move and the point in the agricultural cycle or whether it was the dry or rainy season. For each of these partial or seasonal dates, we assigned the displacement to the quarter in which the period or season fell. Where the partial date identification could fall in more than one quarter, it was randomly assigned to a quarter. Of the 2,024 moves defined by the respondents as displacement events, 76.6% were identified at least to the quarter, and 15.7% more were identified by the season. Only 7.7% of the displacement events were identified by year without specifying the month.

* See http://dne.mopf.gov.tp for the census data.

RMS weight adjustments for mortality estimates

147. The calculation of the weights assumes that events reported by each household could only have been reported by that household. This assumption is the result of the weights being simply the reciprocal of the sampling probability for the given household. Therefore, if there were more than one household that could have given information about a specific death, the true sampling probability for that death is greater than the probability for a single household. Deaths reported by the survey respondents violate the single-reporting-household assumption because for each death, there may have been more than one household which could have given information about that death. Among the 5,402 total deaths reported by respondents, 545 were reported more than once (the duplicate reports were identified and removed before estimation). The duplicate reporting implicit in the survey weighting was corrected by adjusting the weights in the way described below.

148. Before the survey weights can be used to estimate the total number of deaths, they must be adjusted to account for the number of households that were potential respondents for each death. That is, for each death, how many relatives survived until 2003 to be potential respondents in the survey? Much of the information required for this calculation is available in the survey because the respondent's relatives are also the decedent's relatives. The number of surviving relatives for each decedent D was calculated based on the relatives reported by the respondent R using the following rules:

- If D is a parent of R, the expected number of relatives surviving in 2003 is the sum of the following:
    - » Assume that D's parents are 25 years older than D (or 50 years older than R, if D's age is not reported); use age-specific conditional probabilities of survival (calculated from the survey) to estimate the expected number of parents alive in 2003
    - » Count R's siblings as D's children
    - » Given an average approximate total fertility rate of 5 prior to 1975, assume that D had four siblings with ages (-4, -2, +2, +4) years from D's age (if D's age missing, set D's age to R's age + 25), calculate the siblings' ages in 2003, and multiply each by the conditional probability of surviving to that age, and sum over four siblings.
- If D is a sibling of R
    - » D's parents are R's parents, count the survivors directly
    - » R's siblings are D's siblings, count the survivors directly.

149. Assume that D had the same number of surviving adult children as R.

- If D is a child of R
    - » R and spouse are parents, count the survivors directly
    - » Adult children of R are D's siblings, count the survivors directly
    - » Assume no surviving adult children of D.

150. This calculation yields the expected surviving adult relatives for each D, as well as indicating which of these surviving relatives live in R's household, and which live in other households.

151. To convert the expected surviving adult relatives of D into an adjustment for the sampling weight, the number of relatives must be converted to an expected number of households in which the relatives live. There are on average 0.5 relatives of D (in addition to R) living in R's household. Assume that other households in which D's relatives live have the same concentration of relatives per household as R's household (ie. 1.5 relatives per household). Thus, if D has L surviving relatives who live outside of R's household, there are $a = 1 + L/1.5$ households which could give information about D. The survey weights were adjusted for possible multiple reporting of D by dividing each D's sampling weight by this factor, a. This calculation assumes that the other potential respondent households are in the same cluster as R, or that they are in a cluster with a similar within-cluster sampling probability.

Sensitivity analysis of assumptions in mortality re-weighting

152. There are a number of assumptions in the weight adjustments for the mortality estimates, including the following:

- The period difference between generations (assumed to be 25 years)
- The number of siblings respondents' parents had (assumed to be four)
- The birth spacing of parent's siblings (assumed to be two years)
- The number of adult children respondent's siblings had (assumed to be equal to the respondent's children).

153. These assumptions were tested using the following variations, and the annual total number of deaths were calculated:

- The inter-generational spacing was varied to 18 and 30 years
- The number of siblings respondents' parents were assumed to have was increased to six
- The birth spacing was increased to five years between siblings
- The number of adult children respondent's siblings had was assumed to be double the number of the respondent's children.

154. For each variant estimation, the annual totals were tested (by a two-mean t-test) against the main model. None of the years in any of the variant models was significantly different at $p<0.05$. The minimum p-value was 0.13, and it was an outlier: the second-lowest p-value was 0.23. Therefore, the estimates are not substantially sensitive to the assumptions about family structure.

155. Although the estimates are robust to the assumptions about family structure used to estimate the number of surviving relatives who could give information about D, the magnitudes of the estimates are sensitive to the model used to transform the estimated surviving relatives to estimated households that contain relatives. The estimated number of surviving relatives is L, and the estimated number of households containing relatives of a decedent D, denoted a, is a = 1 + L/1.5. The denominator 1.5 comes from the average number of relatives for D (including R) living in R's household (0.5). Varying this average from 0 to 3 (ie. assuming 1-4 surviving adult relatives per household) varies the resulting estimates of the total estimated deaths (by all causes) from -14.2% to +19.6%. The effect of varying this model declines over time, with the largest variations found in the early years 1972-1975 (-21%, +26%) and the smallest variations found in more recent years 2001-2003 (-11%, +16.2%). The decline is consistent over time.

156. Given a constant number of surviving relatives, fewer surviving relatives per household means more potential reporting households, a higher estimated sampling probability per reported death, and a lower sampling weight per reported death, and therefore fewer estimated total deaths; more adults per household reverses this logic.

157. Although the total estimates vary with changes in the model transforming relatives into households, the patterns are constant. The correlation coefficients for the main model to the low (0) and high (3) models above are each 0.99. Although the model of relatives-per-household does affect the total magnitude of the estimated deaths, it does not affect the estimated patterns over time.

Multiple Systems Estimation (MSE): motivation and theory

158. The survey analysis is conservative in the sense that it corrects for potential duplicate reporting by matching deaths across households, and because there is an adjustment to the sampling weights based on the estimated number of households which could have given information about each death. As some deaths may be reported by several households, there are other deaths which occurred during 1974-1999 for which there are no surviving relatives in 2003. If entire households died during the mandate period, there would have been no collineal relatives who could have given information in 2003. Given these limitations, an alternate method for estimating the total deaths may provide a check on the survey estimates.*

159. MSE uses several separately-collected incomplete lists of the population. The lists are matched identifying the elements common across lists in order to estimate the number of elements that are missing from all of the lists. In this project deaths documented in the HRVD, RMS, and GCD were matched across the three systems using the name, date of death, location of death and date of birth.

160. The most basic form of this technique is capture-tag-recapture, which uses only two lists.

161. A technical explanation of how a count of the unknown members of the population can be estimated is as follows. Consider the case of two projects P_1 (a list of A individuals) and P_2 (a list of B individuals). There are M individuals who are matched across both lists, in a universe of N total individuals (N is unknown). If all of the people in the universe N have an equal probability of appearing in List 1, then the probability of a specific individual being reported by P_1 is

* This explanation follows P Ball, J Asher, D Sulmont, D Manrique, "How many Peruvians have died? An estimate of the total number of victims killed or disappeared in the armed internal conflict between 1980 and 2000", a report to the Peruvian Truth and Reconciliation Commission. Washington, DC: AAAS. 28 August 2004. Available online at http://shr.aaas.org/hrdag/peru

$$Pr(captured\ in\ list\ 1) = \frac{A}{N}$$

162. Similarly, if all of the people in universe N have an equal probability of appearing in List 2, then the probability of a specific individual being reported by P_2 is

$$Pr(captured\ in\ list\ 2) = \frac{B}{N}$$

163. The probability of a specific individual being captured in both lists is $$\text{Pr(captured in list 1 and list 2)} = \frac{M}{N}$$

164. By definition, the probability of an event composed of two independent events is the product of the independent probabilities. Therefore,

Pr(captured in lists 1 and 2) = Pr(captured in list 1) x Pr(captured in list 2)

Which is $\frac{M}{N} = \left(\frac{A}{N}\right)\cdot\left(\frac{B}{N}\right)$: given this equation, solve for N.

Rearranging the terms, $\frac{M}{N} = \frac{A \cdot B}{N^2}$ and then multiplying by N, $M = \frac{A \cdot B}{N}$ multiplying again $M \cdot N = A \cdot B$, and finally dividing by M yields $N = \frac{A \cdot B}{M}$

Note that with the final equation, the total number of deaths N can be estimated using the totals from A and B and from the matches between them, M.

165. There are many assumptions implicit in this solution. For example, that none of the lists has individuals reported twice and that matching between the lists is accurate. In this project these two assumptions were controlled during the data processing as described in the matching section.

166. Other assumptions inherent in the capture-tag-recapture model are more difficult to manage. First, the method assumes that individuals are not entering or leaving the universe during the process of creating the lists, and second that the lists were selected randomly from the population. In human rights documentation projects the first assumption is usually irrelevant because the documentation occurs retrospectively. The second assumption cannot be satisfied, and it must be replaced by the assumption that the estimation is robust to the selection process.

167. Another assumption is that the lists are independent, that is, that the probability that an individual is in list two is independent of the probability that the individual is captured in list one. The final assumption is homogeneity: that the individuals that compose the universe all have the same probability of being captured.

168. If either of these assumptions is violated, the capture-tag-recapture method will not yield an adequate estimate of the total population size. If there are more than two lists with adequate information, the problems of dependency or heterogeneity can often be managed through the specification and selection of appropriate models. However, in the data for the HRVD, RMS, and GCD, there are only two usable systems

(RMS-GCD for deaths due to hunger and illness, and HRVD-GCD for killings).* Alone these estimates would be insufficient, but in combination with the RMS estimates, they provide useful additional information.

Allocating GCD by type of death

169. The graveyard data do not include the manner of death. There were 89,894 graves with at least a first initial (or name), a last name and a year of death between 1972 and 2003. Of these 7,117 matched either the HRVD or the RMS (or both), and through this match, the manner of death can be learned from the matched record's manner of death. The remaining 82,717 GCD records need to be allocated to the four categories of manner of death (killings, deaths due to hunger and illness, combatant deaths, and other deaths). From the RMS, annual proportions of deaths by these four types are shown below. Note that these proportions exclude deaths for which the manner of death is unknown (204 of 3,235 deaths reported in the RMS between 1969 and 2004 have unknown manner of death).

Table 10: Estimated proportions of deaths, by period and manner of death

Period	Killing	Hunger/Illness	Combatant	Other
1972–1974	0.9%	95.9%	0.0%	3.2%
Margin of error	1.8%	5.1%	0.0%	4.9%
1975–1982	11.2%	83.0%	4.4%	1.4%

Total	8.3%	85.1%	2.4%	4.3%
Margin of error	2.7%	3.1%	1.2%	1.2%

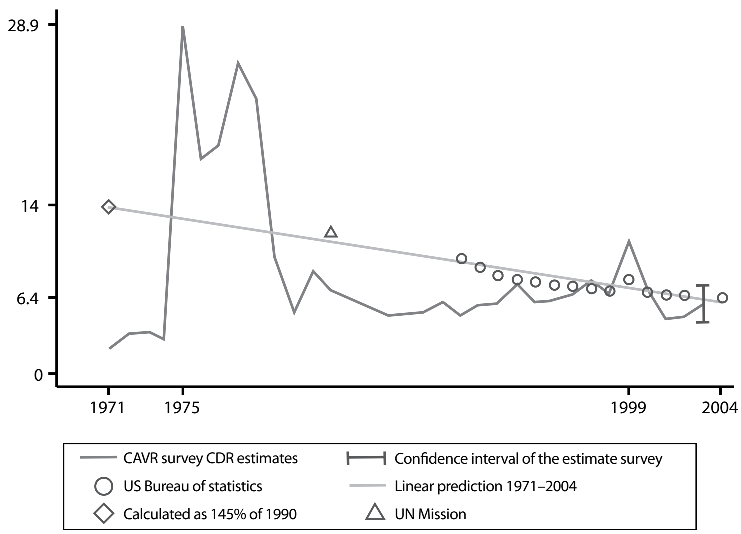
170. These proportions were used to allocate the unmatched GCD records to the distinct manners of death to be used in the MSE calculations for each year: the proportions from the period containing each year was used to allocate the GCD deaths in that year. The margin of error of the allocation was included in the estimated error for the MSE estimates.

* The initial application of multiple-systems estimation to demographic estimation was by C Chandra Sekar and W Edwards Deming, "On a Method of Estimating Birth and Death Rates and the Extent of Registration," Journal of the American Statistical Association, March 1949. A thorough discussion of the estimators for the dual-system approach and the relevant error calculations is available in Yvonne M M Bishop, Stephen E Fienberg and Paul H. Holland, Discrete Multivariate Analysis: Theory and Practice, Cambridge, MA: MIT Press. 1975. For commentary on the use of these methods in human rights analysis, see Fritz Scheuren, "History Corner," The American Statistician, February 2004.

Sensitivity analysis of the loss of social knowledge: adjustments for underestimates

171. The survey asked respondents about the deaths of their parents, siblings and children. However, some deaths left no parents, siblings or children still alive when the survey was conducted in 2004. If deaths occurred long in the past, even the decedents' children would have all died, leaving no one to report the deaths. In other cases small families may have suffered complete mortality, so that no one survived to report the deaths. As the survey estimates the number (or the rate) of deaths farther back in time, the underestimate resulting from the loss of social knowledge must become more severe. However, even in the nearly immediate past (for example, in 2003 for a survey conducted in 2004), it will be impossible to document some deaths which have left no survivors. For example, people who have no surviving parents, siblings or children who died in 2003 cannot be reported in the survey.

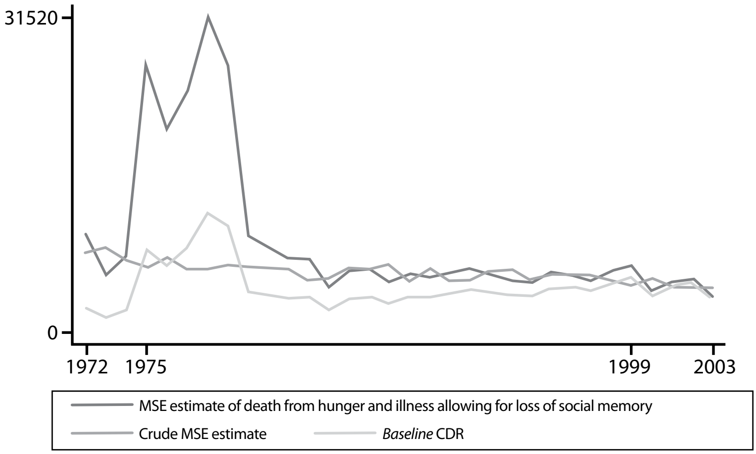
172. The crude death rate (CDR per 1,000 people) is an estimate of how many people died, in total, by year. It is a standard demographic and health indicator, usually estimated by indirect methods using census records. For Timor-Leste, these rates are difficult to estimate because the quality of the 1980 and 1990 census data has been in dispute.[11] The CDRs estimated by the US Bureau of the Census for Timor-Leste are shown for 1990-2004. The Indonesian overall rate is shown for 1983. The estimate shown for 1971 comes from an Indonesian government claim that in all of Indonesia between 1971 and 1990, the CDR declined by 45%; the 1971 estimate shown here is the 1990 estimate for Timor-Leste inflated by this factor. A projected CDR is also shown by linearly interpolating between the 1971 estimate and the 1990-2004 estimates.



173. In addition to the CDR estimates, the CDR from the Commission's RMS is shown. This estimate is the total estimated deaths divided by the estimated population for that year (multiplied by 1,000). There are several observations to be made about this graph. First, the CDR estimated by the US Census Bureau is within the confidence interval of the CDR estimated by the RMS beginning in 1993. In 2003 the confidence interval of the RMS CDR (4.2–6.6) contains the US Census Bureau estimate (6.4), as shown in the graph by the capped spike at the end of the CAVR line. That is, while the RMS greatly underestimates the death rate in the "normal" peacetime years 1972-1974, by the mid-1990s, the RMS agrees with the results obtained via the indirect methods employed by the US Census Bureau. This observation is consistent with the notion that the RMS estimates suffer increasing downward bias into the past.

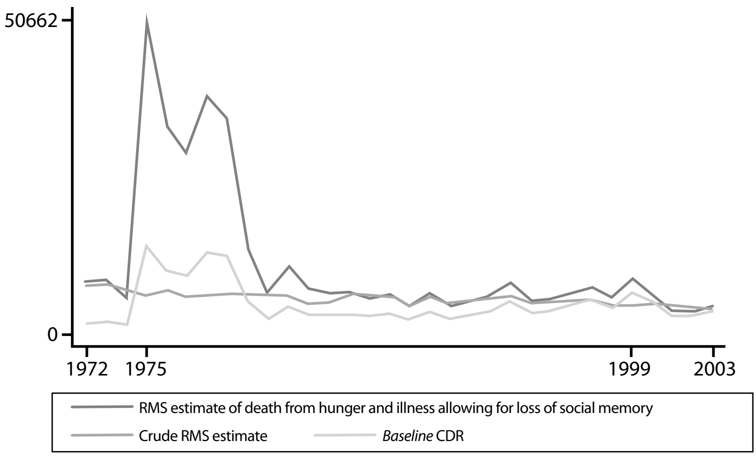
174. During years in which the historical record suggests that substantial excess deaths occurred, the linear interpolation of the CDR underestimates deaths. These years include 1975-1979 and 1999.This is consistent with the literal meaning of 'excess' deaths. (There are no census-based CDR estimates for the 1975-1979 period). Looking further into the past, the survey-based CDR captures a decreasing fraction of the total CDR (a similar graph can be drawn for the MSE estimates over time, with similar results).

175. To adjust the RMS, the deaths lost to the loss of social knowledge must be estimated over time. The model employed was the following:



- The number of deaths estimated by the CDR and the projected population for each year was estimated (CDR deaths), shown as a rate in the figure below;
- The fraction of CDR deaths that occurred due to hunger and illness was estimated using the fraction of all deaths reported in the survey that were due to hunger and illness (similar to the allocation used for the unmatched GCD data). In the survey the mean (and median) fraction of all deaths (over years) attributed to hunger and illness is 0.80, and 50% of all years are within the range 0.754–0.846;
- The ratio of estimated deaths to CDR_deaths was calculated for the peacetime years (1972-1974 and 2002-2003); this is the fraction of 'rememberable deaths', called the 'memory fraction';
- The memory fraction for 1975-2001 was estimated by linear interpolation using the following equations:
- Estimated memory fraction (MSE) = -39.1 + 0.0200*year
- Estimated memory fraction (RMS) = -43.9 + 0.0224*year
- The memory fractions for MSE ranges from 0.241-0.936, whereas for the RMS, they ranged from 0.228 to 0.846. This difference has an enormous impact on the outcome.
- The adjusted estimate was calculated as the original estimate divided by the memory fraction for each year.

Crude death rate estimate for Timor-Leste



176. The adjusted estimates are presented in the two graphs below. Note that in both graphs the raw estimates and the adjusted estimates converged as the year approached 2003. The impact of the higher memory fraction for the MSE relative to the RMS was apparent in the estimated total deaths in excess of the CDR baseline: the MSE adjusted estimate was 104,000 deaths while the RMS adjusted estimate was 183,300 deaths.

Total death rate estimate from hunger and illness in Timor-Leste (based on MSE)

Estimated total deaths on CDR baseline = 103,904

Total death rate estimate from hunger and illness in Timor-Leste (based on RMS)

Estimated total deaths on CDR baseline = 183,332

177. Both of these estimates depend on a number of assumptions, including assumptions about the shape of the decline of the CDR from the early 1970s through the late 1990s and about the nature of the loss of social memory. Smooth but non-linear changes in the loss of social memory (either concave up or concave down) would not change the estimate substantially. However, if the underestimates in the MSE and RMS due to social memory loss were somehow discontinuous or otherwise drastically different for 1972-1974 relative to the peak years 1975-1979, the adjustment employed here would not correct appropriately for the underestimate. Both of these models depend on CDRs calculated from the 1980 and 1990 census data and indirect methods used by the US Bureau of the Census. There is sampling and non-sampling error which is not represented in the graphs or the statistics, but the error is certainly substantial.

178. However, these models have the benefit of showing that with the adjustment, the estimated annual total deaths due to hunger and illness closely match the CDR baseline deaths for the pre-invasion period (1972-1974) and for the period 1984-1998.

179. There are several reasons to prefer the MSE estimate to the RMS estimate. Although the RMS more closely matches the CDR deaths estimate in the post-occupation years that approach peacetime, 2002-2003, the MSE more closely matches the pre-occupation CDR total deaths estimates. For the purposes of this estimate, the most relevant period is 1975-1979, and the choice of estimates should be guided by the best fit immediately before this period. A second reason to prefer the MSE is that it is based on considerably more data than the RMS alone: the MSE uses the GCD data in addition to the RMS.

180. The strongest conclusion which can be made is that the unadjusted RMS and MSE estimates must be too low. Vol. I, Part 6: Profile of Human Rights Violations, provides an examination of statistical support for findings in relation to the number of fatal violations during the Commission's mandate period.

Indictment Summaries

Indictment Summaries

Annexe 3
Indictment Summaries

This Annexe is not part of the Commission's findings. It is a summary of all the Indictments submitted to the Special Panels for Serious Crimes for trial by the Serious Crimes Unit. UNTAET (United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor) Regulation 11/2000 gave exclusive jurisdiction to the Serious Crimes Unit over all crimes of:

- genocide
- war crimes
- crimes against humanity
- murder
- sexual offences, and
- torture

committed between 1 January and 25 October 1999. The Serious Crimes Unit wound down in May 2005 with the end of the UNMISET (United Nations Assistance Mission in East Timor) mission as the UN withdrew support.* The Commission publishes this summary as an Annexe to the Commission's Final Report in an effort to bring together in one place all relevant information about those responsible for the serious crimes committed in Timor-Leste, and through this to help address the continuing problem of impunity for these crimes. The indictments are organised alphabetically by district.

* The UN Security Council reversed this decision in response to the 2006 crisis in Timor-Leste. It created the Serious Crimes Investigation Team (SCIT) to resume the investigative function of the former Serious Crimes Unit (SCU) in cooperation with the office of the Prosecutor General (OGP) of Timor-Leste. Unlike the SCU, however, the mandate of SCIT was limited to investigative tasks. (Ed.)

Introduction

We wish to put on the record our deep appreciation to all who contributed to this Report, whatever their role. Without the knowledge, expertise, dedication, generosity and self-sacrifice of many organisations, friends and colleagues - from Timor-Leste, Indonesia and many parts of the world, this magnum opus would not have been possible.

Those to whom we owe a debt of gratitude include all who provided the raw material for our work: our Timorese brothers and sisters who shared their experiences and information with the Commission through statements, interviews and public testimony; those who provided books, documents and submissions; our staff who collected and recorded data, and those who organised and archived this mass of information. We also give thanks to those who transformed this material through its various stages into this Report: our analysts, researchers, writers, translators, editors, designers, layout staff, and printers. And finally, we extend our warmest thanks to those who provided the means of production: our administrative and support staff and the governments, multilateral agencies and non-government organisations who generously supported the Commission with funding and in-kind assistance.

Their names and contributions are recorded in the pages that follow. We thank each and every one of them for sharing our vision of a Timor-Leste reconciled and committed to human rights and for helping us contribute to the realisation of that vision through our work.

Those who gave statements to CAVR

A total of 7,824 people from all walks of life gave statements to CAVR about their experiences during the period of CAVR's mandate. Their names are not listed here both for reasons of space and to respect the confidentiality under which some people gave their statement to CAVR.

CAVR wishes to publicly acknowledge and thank every individual whose statement to CAVR has helped us to establish the facts and seek the truth about the abuses of human rights throughout the mandate period.

Those who participated in CRP

A total of 1,541 people gave statements in relation to the Community Reconciliation Process of which 1,371 went on to successfully complete a CRP hearing. Again for reasons of space and confidentiality their names are not listed here.

CAVR wishes to publicly acknowledge and thank all those individuals and communities who participated in the Community Reconciliation Processes.

Note on usage

To facilitate usage, the page numbers of the respective volumes are given at the foot of each of the following pages.

It has not been possible to include every reference to each of the topics, places, events, organisations and individuals found in these volumes or, indeed, to include all of the items that fall under these headings. Further word searches can be conducted electronically using the cd of the full report.

Generally speaking, names are entered starting with the last or family name. Some Indonesian names, however, are entered according to Indonesian usage, e.g. Benny Moerdani not Moerdani, Benny.

Passabe. See massacre sites

After looking at forty truth commissions world-round, I concluded that the truth commission of East Timor was among the five strongest. It was an impressive, passionate and scrupulous exercise. And its report, Chega!, stands in testament to this careful and rigorous exercise, honestly reflecting the victims' stories as well as the far-reaching conclusions that emerged from this work. It is wonderful that this will now be available, in full, in English; it will be an important reference for others embarking on a similar path.

Priscilla Hayner,
Author, Unspeakable Truths: Transitional Justice and the Challenge of Truth Commissions (2nd ed., 2011)

"The extensive CAVR Report is an encyclopedia of our history, rich in both teachings and suffering. We must utilise its great teachings to better understand today's crisis and to help prevent future crises."

Jose Ramos-Horta,
Nobel Peace Laureate, former President and Prime Minister of Timor-Leste (July 2006)

"Chega! is troubling testimony. This report will jolt Indonesian readers who think that under the Soeharto regime everything was peaceful in Indonesia's then 27th province. Page after page recounts the stories of victims of massacres, rape, forced disappearances, torture and other unimaginable crimes ... Indonesia can learn from Chega! This report is an important contribution to democratisation and security sector reform in Indonesia."

Ifdhal Kasim,
Chair, Indonesian Commission on Human Rights (August 2010)

"The CAVR Report constitutes an important milestone in the search for justice, truth and reconciliation in Timor-Leste. It is my sincere hope that (it) will be an enduring contribution to building the Timorese nation and will help to prevent the recurrence of such tragic events in Timor-Leste and elsewhere."

Kofi Annan,
UN Secretary-General (July 2006)
